Part of the throng of children who took advantage of the Public Library's offer to receive "misplaced" books without penalty, shown as they stormed the West End branch to return hundreds of volumes.

More than 500 missing books were returned; 6400 borrowers' cards were restored, and approximately $35,000 in fines were cancelled yesterday, the first day of the Boston Public Library's "moratorium week," with 25,000 children storming the main building and the 33 branches.

In the course of the day, so great was the stream of borrowers, most children, who rushed to the various branches to get back cards which they had lost through default, that traffic police were necessary in some places, and other branches were forced to close down early to straighten out their books.

The moratorium week was initiated and sponsored by the director of the library, Milton E. Lord. The idea is to restore borrowing privileges to those who have lost them through failure to return books, or to pay fines they have incurred through holding books beyond the set limit.

25,000 Listed as Lost

All books lent from the library are put for a stated length of time. Beyond that time the borrower must pay a fine of two cents per day. Or, if they lose or mislay books, they lose the privilege of further borrowing.

Director Lord decided recently to try out the theory of a moratorium on fines in order to recover as many books as possible of the 25,000 which are listed as "lost" on the library's record; also, to restore the borrowing privilege and give a fresh start to as many as possible, particularly in view of the depression.

78,000 on Blacklist

The records show that 78,000 persons, mostly children, who have had borrowers' cards, have been on the blacklist and consequently forbidden the privilege.

A great many of these, particularly the children, have returned the books they borrowed, but have been unable to pay the fines they have incurred. Consequently, they have had to give up their cards.

Those latter formed the bulk of the tremendous crowd which actually took the libraries by storm yesterday, as the moratorium began, overwhelming the authorities completely.

Forced to Close Early

The North End branch estimated that 2000 children stormed its portals during the day, forcing closing at 6:30 in order to straighten things out. The East Boston branch had to enlist the services of a traffic policeman in order to control the eager crowds of children. More than 300 had to be refused admittance to the West End branch, so great was the crowd.

It is expected that, as the week goes on, hundreds of more books will be returned. Boxes have been placed at the main building and at each branch, in such places that borrowers who wish to return them may do so without attracting any official attention, or without any embarrassment to themselves.

RETURNS BOOK AFTER 29 YEARS

Boston, Oct. 17.—(AP)—A book borrowed from the Boston Public Library 29 years ago, was returned today to open "fine cancellation week" at the institution. The man who returned it said his boyish interest had been aroused by an eagle and a flag that adorned the cover of "Naval History of the United States." The book had become time-browned, first in his parents' home and later in his own home.

CHILDREN STORM LIBRARY BRANCH TO RENEW CARDS

Part of the crowd of children who stormed the branch library at Cambridge and Lynde streets, West end, after school yesterday to return books and get library cards renewed with cancellation of all fines. Two librarians in centre tried to keep things in order.

25,000 Children Rush to Regain Library Cards

Cancellation of Fines Results in Return of 504 Books—One Out 29 Yrs.

The first day of fine cancellation week at the Boston Public Library yesterday proved beyond a doubt the Pied Piper of Hamelin never sounded a tune half so enticing to children as the announcement that those whose library cards have been suspended for non-payment of fines are again free to borrow books.

At least 25,000 boys and girls of all ages stormed the doors of the main library in Copley square and its 33 branches. In East Boston police had to be called out to handle the hordes who wanted books, and a dozen branch libraries were forced to close their doors at 6 P. M. to keep the children out. The North end library closed at 4 P. M., with all its reading rooms filled.

On the first day of fine cancellation week 8000 cards were renewed "with no questions asked," and library officials estimated that before the week is over a large part of the 78,000 cards now in disuse will have been renewed.

The library's request that all books kept at home because of overdue fines or having been "inadvertently borrowed" be returned brought results that satisfied librarians, although they hardly kept pace with the number of cards renewed. Exactly 504 books were brought back.

Of these the most remarkable was a copy of "The Naval History of the United States," which had been missing for 29 years.

The middle-aged gentleman who brought it back said fine-cancellation week had brought him a welcome opportunity to return the volume, which has been a source of worry on his book shelf for a large part of his life.

"This book has been in my house, and earlier in my parents' home for 29 years," he said, placing it on the desk in the children's room at the main library in Copley square.

"I do not know whether I borrowed it myself or whether it was taken out by a friend, but I am glad to return it. At some time I must have read it, but I cannot recall its contents at this time."

Should the reaction to cancellation week continue at its first-day rate, the Boston Public Library should have at least 150,000 new borrowers and 3000 returned books when the week is over. School teachers have called the attention of their pupils to the fineless week, which explains the overwhelming response of boys and girls.

Restored Library Cards Total 12,139 As 20,000 Respond in Unique Drive

The appeal of the Boston Public Library to the 78,000 men, women and children whose borrowers' cards have been withheld because of non-payment of fines representing $35,068, to take advantage of the current "Fine Cancellation Week," has been heeded. Despite the downpour of rain yesterday nearly 20,000 persons stormed the central library and the 33 branches to get their reading privileges restored.

The total of library cards restored in the last two days is 12,139. Yesterday 561 books, which had been given up by library officials as lost, were returned, bringing the total of the two days to 1085 returned books. Before the unique drive to recover the books began there were 27,790 books missing from the shelves.

The new library cards issued yesterday numbered 9790, while on the previous day 7419 cards were restored. At many of the branch libraries traffic officers had to be called to maintain order.

The directors of the library announced that "Fine Cancellation Week" will not be an annual event.

CITY RECORD.

CANCELLATION OF FINES BY THE LIBRARY DEPARTMENT PROVES HIGHLY SUCCESSFUL.

The Mayor received the following communication from the Director of the Boston Public Library, Milton E. Lord:

HON. JAMES M. CURLEY,
Mayor of Boston.

DEAR SIR: The trustees of the Public Library feel it their privilege to bring to the attention of your Honor the interesting results that have followed from the first three days of the "Fine Cancellation Week" which they have decreed for the week of October 17 to 22. In his inability to come himself the president of the Board has directed me to convey to you personally the following report.

In three days' time 17,880 borrowers who had been deprived of the use of the library because of unpaid fines have been reinstated with new borrowers' cards. One thousand six hundred nineteen missing books have been returned. Eight hundred twelve new borrowers have been registered. "Fine Cancellation Week" was launched to bring back to the library books which were long held by the public and to cancel unpaid fines which were depriving 78,193 residents of the City of Boston of the privilege of using the library. Thirty-five thousand six hundred dollars ($35,068) in fines have been cancelled.

Very truly yours,
MILTON E. LORD,
Director.

AND THE BOOK CAME BACK

ALICE MASON

FLORENCE STANLEY

Back on the shelves of the Boston Public Library after 29 years. That's the story of this book—the Naval History of the United States. In 1903 it was taken out. Fines rolled up. Then came the 1922 moratorium on book fines. So in walks a Bostonian with the book. Of course he confessed his regrets and added that he was conscience stricken. The book is back. No fines administered. Florence Stanley and Alice Mason are taking a peck or two at the old volume. They are library attaches. This is just one of the many books that have come in following the suspension of fines-week.

No Moratorium on Library Book Fines Here; Many Lost, Misused

By MELHEM NASSER

An average of 25 volumes a year journey from the local public library to the Port of Missing Books, according to the estimate of Miss Grace Blanchard, librarian. Generally the disappearing books have been borrowed legally by card holders who then become victims of that insidious malady—bookworm's amnesia.

The loss of but 25 books annually out of the many thousands in the library makes it unnecessary to declare a "moratorium on fines" such as now in progress in Boston, says Miss Blanchard, but the attention the matter is getting may prod the memories of local delinquents.

Some Stolen

Some of the missing books have been stolen, of course, and they are gone forever, but others return much in the manner of Enoch Arden—quite unexpectedly.

Not long ago, a canoe was observed floating down a local stream. Perhaps in the moonlight of many a summer night that canoe had contributed its bit to romance, but in this instance the vessel was merely attempting to do right by the public library. Human cargo it had none, but it did bear a book, a library book, entitled "How to Improve the Memory." The absent minded reader had merely forgotten the book, the canoe, probably how to swim. Another good story that some accuracy addict will probably "spike."

Books belonging to the taxpayers are often found in street cars, in restaurants, even in ash cans. They may be in foreign lands or in many of the cities and towns of this large country, because some people when they leave town, leave nothing behind them, with the possible exception of bills. Quite often the books are taken to Los Angeles, Cal., or Jacksonville, Fla., unintentionally and are promptly returned by mail. That it is difficult to understand, when one considers the weakness of the average human in the matter of retaining books borrowed from any source but it does occur.

Seriously, however, the local library does not lose many books, the real loss is incurred through mutilation, sometimes wanton and vicious, but generally for a good reason. The librarians of this state have asked school authorities to end the practice of requiring the pupils to illustrate their themes and compositions. The children only too often ruin a valuable and useful encyclopedia or history just to improve their standing in the English class.

High Mortality

The mortality among the magazines placed on the reading tables is terrific, largely because the advertisers persist in urging their readers to "Clip the coupon now! Don't Wait an Instant! Learn How You Too Can Become Independently Wealthy As a Newspaper Reporter!" It is difficult to refrain from clipping coupons, especially when the advertisers are so earnest about the necessity of haste, and so magazines with coupons to clip are carefully retired to the shelves, to be loaned only to obsolescent strong characters with excellent reputations.

On the whole however, the local librarians have little cause for complaint, as compared to their colleagues in other cities. That may be a compliment to the local honesty level and on the other hand it may mean that local people do not read much. In any event, all those who have forgotten to return a book borrowed last spring early enough to be nice about it and return the volume. This fine is only one cent per day, the lowest in New England, if not in the country.

Not a Perennial

FINELESS week at the Boston Public Library and its branches this week, during which the public may return books without questioning by officials, and without paying fines, no matter how many years the books have been out, is not to be an annual custom.

The library trustees are giving one week of grace, the first and perhaps the last in the history of the library. It is not to be expected that the opportunity will be repeated except under the most extraordinary circumstances.

If you have a library book that should have been returned long ago, take it back. You will not be fined and you will be reinstated as a borrower at the library.

WHY THEY FAILED TO RETURN BOOKS

One Fell in Sauerkraut---Another Got in Borrower's Bookcase and He Thought It Was His

"It fell in the sauerkraut barrel, and had to be left on the fire escape to take out the smell."

That's an alibi, in case you're worrying. That's an alibi offered with all due solemnity by a person who borrowed a book from the Public Library and who didn't want to pay a fine for returning it late.

That's not only an alibi, but it's just one of many equally startling alibis, of the sort which have had something to do with the current "moratorium week" at the library, with concurrent cancellation of fines for offenders.

It's just one of many compiled by the director of the library, Milton Edward Lord, one of the kind which are offered frequently by borrowers who think they shouldn't pay fines, or have their privileges revoked for keeping books overtime, or for losing books.

ORIGINAL, TO SAY THE LEAST

Maybe that sounds like the champion excuse. But Director Lord has compiled others which are so unusual as to be almost unbelievable. Here are a few of them:

"The book was put in the ice chest so that the baby could not get it, and it fell behind it." This for a book whose return was unduly delayed.

"The house was burned, and the book burned with it." This for a book that couldn't be accounted for.

"I put the book in the gas stove oven, and my mother went to light the fire. When I smelled the smoke the book was burned, like you see."

"My baby attacked the book with his teeth."

"The book got packed with a lot of things, and it got sent to the storage warehouse."

BOOK BURIED WITH HIM

And here's a dandy one: "I was sick, you see, and I just stuck the book under the mattress and forgot it. When I cleaned house this spring we found it." (!)

And this: "The book got in my book case, and I thought it was mine."

And this: "There surely must be some mistake. I didn't get this book the time you said I did. Why, it was only last Friday I was here in the library."

And this one: "I lent the book to a fellow. I thought surely he'd bring it back by this time."

And the best of them all: "You see, the person died soon after coming to my house to live. He was very fond of books, and he had one from the public library which must have meant a good deal to him. In accordance with the request made before he died, the undertaker buried the book with him."

THIS IS LIFE

Stricter Rules for Libraries—Even Cash Deposit Plan—Advisable

By Robert E. Rogers

IT IS PROBABLY JUST as well that the directors of the Boston Public Library have announced that "Fine Cancellation" week will not be an annual event. That would make it a little too easy!

As it is, the device to get readers back to the library, from which they have been debarred for not returning books or not paying their fines, seems to have worked very well. Incidentally, this week's results show unmistakably the fact that people do read the newspapers and pay a good deal of attention to what the newspapers contain. That is, about one-sixth of them do.

The library calculates that about 78,000 former users of the library have been missing because of overdue books and unpaid fines. At the date of writing on Wednesday morning, some 12,000 cards have been restored and during the rain of Tuesday some 20,000 persons showed up at the central and various branch libraries. On that basis it will not be surprising if nearly 50 per cent of the outstanding card privileges are found to have been restored by the end of the week.

Most of these cases are obviously the result of carelessness or procrastination, running on until the amount of the fine gets beyond the ability or the convenience of the average person to liquidate. By the time a book has been out for 29 years, of course, the case is usually hopeless. But most examples the library has published are more trivial . . . and more amusing. The book that fell in the sauerkraut barrel, for instance, and was not fit for decent society thereafter.

Professional Thief Usually Caught

The book that fell behind the ice-chest. The book that was burned in the gas oven. The book that was put under the mattress during sickness and forgotten. Apparently some people never turn the mattress. The book that had been in the bookcase so long that it was thought to be part of the family library. Any college professor using his college library can o. k. that alibi. The book that was lent to another fellow. And the book that was buried with a dead man because he liked it so. I wish I knew the title of that book!

I also wish I knew the system on which the library officials work. Apparently, 12,000 cards have been restored to date and fines remitted, out of 78,000. But out of 27,000 books missing, only about 1100 have been restored. Which is a wide discrepancy. That means, of course, that a large proportion of books have been deliberately stolen in such a way that there can be no record of them. The borrowers who have had their cards restored must have a reasonably clean bill of health and are not suspected of intentional conversion of books to their own use. With the deliberate thief there is probably nothing retroactive to be done.

But every public and college librarian knows that deliberate theft is one of its greatest problems. It seems to be the method by which a certain type of high school or college student—one with brains, perhaps, but no moral training—builds up his library.

The professional thief on a large scale is usually caught in the long run, as was proved at the Widener Library at Harvard last year. The college or high school student who steals an occasional needed reference book from the open shelves—or even from the stacks with the connivance of an employee—is harder to deal with. Many of those thefts, too, may begin as an extended borrowing for convenience, with the hazy and half formulated hope of returning the book some day. Usually, it is never returned.

Many Pages Cut Out of Books

I see no reason why public libraries should take such chances at tax-payers' expense, simply by carrying out a fine democratic tradition which is incomprehensible to such a proportion of our population.

Is there any reason why even a free public library should not require a small cash deposit before any books are allowed to be taken out? Say $2.00, which would cover the price of the average book. Many service businesses require deposits for protection. If the book is kept out too long, it can be automatically considered lost and the deposit forfeited. Any argument that this will be a hardship on many poor people has very little validity in these days when we are beginning to be painfully aware of how much expensive free service the non-taxpayer is being given at great cost (and enormous waste) to the taxpayer.

At a recent meeting of the American Library Association the librarian of the Providence public library pointed out the great loss libraries suffer from the habit of library habits—again, especially, students—of cutting out pages of books and magazines, charts and tables, pictures and statistics, simply to save the trouble of copying. The wide-spread use of the project method of the public schools is held responsible for this vandalism. Obviously a certain proportion of our public school and college products cannot be trusted.

A return to policing is indicated. Harvard, I believe, threatens to frisk the bags of students leaving the library. But anybody knows that it is absurdly easy to evade such surveillance as exists at present in most large libraries. Continuous patrols of reading rooms might help. Some kind of identification or check-up of names and addresses on withdrawal slips (before the book is issued) is advisable. For many reasons it is becoming increasingly apparent that every individual ought to carry with him habitually some kind of registration or police card for identification.

Democratic Slackness Is Costly

Old European police methods, you say! Exactly—and the more conditions in our cities approximate conditions in Europe, the more we shall have to use European methods. Democratic slackness and carelessness and negligence of control, which simply invite carelessness and dishonesty of response, have always been an American fetish. We are beginning now to see what it has cost us. One of these days it will be stopped.

Even for the benefit of those 78,000 outlawed card-users and those 27,000 book losers and book thieves this is necessary. How much more necessary, then, for the benefit of the honest majority who suffer from the slack and the dishonest—on whom most of our concern and pity and sympathy has always been lavished.

Let us hope that the 12,000 and more who are being allowed to make a fresh start without penalty will profit by their second chance, that they will learn to care for public property and promptness and honesty from this experience. Incidentally, the present director of the library has drawn attention to the services of a public library in an undeniably forcible and effective way, one which cannot help but draw favorable attention to library work and to the need of larger appropriations to take care of such matters.

Mr. Lord has shown that he can use the velvet glove. He ought to be allowed to show that he can use the iron hand as well—if, when, and as necessary.

12,130 BORROWERS AGAIN GIVEN BOOKS

561 Volumes Returned on Fine Cancellation

"Forgiveness Week" continued in full swing at the Boston Public Library and its branches yesterday, despite the downpour of rain. Keeping up with the frenzied pace set by borrowers on Monday, the second day of "Fine Cancellation Week" saw an outpouring of books that long ago had been given up in despair by Director Milton E. Lord and his assistants.

Exactly 561 books—every one long ago checked off as unrecoverable—found their way back onto the library shelves, without payment of fine by the tardy borrowers. And what is more, a total of 12,130 men, women and children have had their cards returned and their fines remitted during the two days of the novel scheme to discover the books "absent without leave."

The total for yesterday was 5790 cards, all of which had been tucked away in library files because fines had not been paid. Mr. Lord reported that the "general amnesty" was only slightly dampened by the rain and that the crowds yesterday kept the libraries busy from morning to night.

Mr. Lord announced last night that because of many inquiries, he wished to correct the erroneous impression that "Fine Cancellation Week" was to be an annual occurrence at the Boston Public Library.

"Fine Cancellation Week," he said, "is an emergency measure only and was instituted at the Boston Public Library to restore borrowers' privileges and to expedite the return of library books. We are now extending it all an invitation to bring back their books and to start with a clean slate, but this will not be an annual invitation."

SEIGE ON LIBRARY FORCES CHILDREN'S HOURS LIMIT

Children are besieging the branch libraries of the Boston public library in such great numbers to take advantage of "fine cancellation week," that it has become necessary to curtail the hours when children's borrowing cards will be issued. Children will not be given borrowers' cards after 6 P. M.

Director Milton E. Lord declared the measure was taken in order that adults may come to the library evenings and in order that the now overburdened staff may meet the demands made upon them. Yesterday at the public library 4942 cards were restored and 579 books recovered. There were 397 new registrations.

BOOK MISSING 40 YEARS BACK IN HUB LIBRARY

Borrower Offers to Pay for Volume: Fine Cancellation
Week Ends

A book missing 40 years from the Boston Public Library was returned by a conscience-stricken borrower as fine cancellation week ended last night.

The title was "In Far Lochaber," a mid-Victorian novel by William Black which was published in 1888 and extremely popular with readers of the naive decade. The sender mailed the book with this letter:

"This book I am mailing you, has been in my home for about 40 years. As I recall it has always looked as it now does. If you want me to pay for it as new, I will thank you to tell me, and I will send a check. Please tell me the amount."

The name of the borrower was withheld by library directors. The tome was musty with age; its corners were dog-eared. It is understood the borrower will not be assessed.

Another book, "The Naval History of the United States," by William J. Abbott, which had been gone 29 years, reappeared Monday, the first day of the drive.

It was announced that more than 2923 unrecovered books had been returned up to Friday night. Complete figures for the entire week including yesterday were to be announced later.

A total of 27,395 borrowers' cards which had been made void because of non-payment of fines, were restored.

It was believed by library officials, that last week's rainy weather retarded persons with missing books from returning them, and it was expected yesterday's returns would be the largest of the week.

"Fine Cancellation Week" was started as a campaign to secure return of missing books without punishment to borrowers. The move was also made because of the depression, which made it hard for readers to pay fines on overdue books.

It was announced any book inadvertently borrowed could be returned and no questions asked.

17,680 REINSTATED AT PUBLIC LIBRARY

1619 Missing Books Returned in First Three Days of Fine Cancellation Week

MAYOR CURLEY RECEIVING REPORT FROM DIRECTOR MILTON E. LORD OF THE BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY ON CANCELLATION OF FINES

A report of the results of the first three days of the fine cancellation week of the Boston Public Library was contained in a letter to Mayor Curley today signed by Milton E. Lord, director, representing the trustees. Owing to the depression it was the desire of the trustees that children and grown-ups, who because of fines had been deprived of the use of the library, should have their privileges restored. Reinstatement in three days was given to 17,680 borrowers; 1619 missing books were returned and $35,068 in fines were cancelled.

Director Lord said that over a period of six years 20,000 books were un-recoverable, not counting those that disappear without any record behind. Last year, he said 15,000 books disappeared, and though the number at first glance appears very large, in fact it is not large considering that 5,000,000 books are circulated a year.

The report of Director Lord to Mayor Curley said:

The trustees of the Public Library feel it is their privilege to bring to the attention of Your Honor the interesting results that have followed from the first three days of the "Fine Cancellation Week" which they have decreed to the week of Oct. 17 to 22. In his inability to come himself, the president of the board has directed me to convey to you personally the following report:

"In three days' time, 17,680 borrowers who had been deprived of the use of the library because of unpaid fines, have been reinstated with new borrowers' cards. There have been returned 1619 missing books, and $12 new borrowers have been registered.

"Fine Cancellation Week" was launched to bring back to the library books which were being held by the public and to cancel unpaid fines which were depriving 78,100 residents of the city of Boston of the privilege of using the library. Fines of $35,068 have been cancelled.

FINE CANCELLATION WEEK AT LIBRARY ENDS

Fine cancellation week at the Boston public library ended yesterday with 30,918 cards renewed out of 78,000 that had been withheld because of non-payment of fines and 3637 books returned. The library officers announced that persons who allowed their library privileges to lapse because of non-payment of fines only may receive their new borrowers' cards, fines cancelled, at any time. Those who have held books and have not returned them during fine cancellation week, however, have lost the privilege of having their fines cancelled and may obtain new cards only when they return the books.

BOOK COMES BACK AFTER 38 YEARS

"Fine Cancellation Week"
Climax at Library

After an absence of 38 years from its home on the shelves of the Boston Public Library, a book was returned yesterday as a climax to the "Fine Cancellation Week" activities. "In Far Lochaber," a novel by William Black, was borrowed from the old Boston Public Library on Boylston st. where the Colonial Theatre now stands.

For some reason the original borrower did not return the book. Whatever the cause, the book was not abused and is in good condition today. It arrived in the afternoon mail accompanied by the following letter: "This book has been in the library of my home for about 40 years. As I recall it has always looked as it now does. If you wish me to pay for it as new, I will thank you to tell me, and I will send a check. Please tell me the amount."

So many books poured into the Public Library in Copley sq and the Greater Boston branches yesterday, that it was impossible to make an estimate of the total number returned despite the heavy storms on three days this week; the returns were most gratifying, and the good weather yesterday brought by far the greatest number.

The returns up to 6 p.m. Friday totaled 2932 books returned. There were 27,398 cards restored and 1721 new registrations taken out. Friday more books were returned than on any previous day. There were 734 returned Friday and 570 books on Thursday, which was the second largest day. Thursday scored the highest in number of cards restored, 4942 being certified. There were 522 new registrations on Friday.

16,000 to Face Court Unless Overdue Books Come Back

Approximately 16,000 Boston book lovers now face the prospect of prosecution by police. That is, those 16,000 who have borrowed public library books so much that they have failed to return them even when they had a chance to do so without paying any fines. Milton F. Lord, who conducted the drive for the return of overdue books last week, revealed today that only about 4000 out of 20,000 books had been returned. The total value of the returned books was about $6000, while fines on the 20,000 books amounted to approximately $35,000.

Under Lord's direction, an intensive drive will start to force those who still hold books to return them or face prosecution.

BOOK MISSING 38 YEARS

Here is a book that was missing from the Boston Public Library for 38 years. It is now back on the shelves of that organization. It's the record book holdout since the opening of public libraries in Boston. Look at its title, "In Far Lochaber," by William Black. Miss Alice Mason poses with the book.

Does a Librarian Have to Be a Policeman?

By Louis M. Lyons

AS Boston Public Library begins its second week of remission of fines, Hiller Wellman, director of the Springfield Public Library, contributes the information that 100 years ago in that city fines were not so much for keeping books overtime as for spilling candle grease on the pages, and the amount of the fine depended on how many leaves the spot penetrated.

In writing the history of Springfield's library, Mr. Wellman takes a left-handed dig at the Boston Public Library which this city can perhaps stand now that its new librarian has already made a beginning of humanizing the Boston library system. "The Boston library for a generation was the leader in America," comments the Springfield librarian.

He calls attention to a significant incident in the beginning of the Boston library, citing a letter of George Ticknor, who took an active part in founding the Boston Public Library as the first tax-supported library under the Massachusetts Public Library law of 1851. "I would establish," Ticknor wrote, "a library which differs from all free libraries yet attempted . . . that not only the best works of all sorts but the pleasant literature of the day shall be made accessible to the whole people when they most care for it, that is when it is fresh and new. I would thus, by following the popular taste—unless it should demand something injurious—create a real appetite for healthy reading. The appetite once formed will take care of itself."

"The ideal thus expressed was revolutionary and was not followed by the Boston trustees without some shaking of heads. Indeed, it has hardly yet been realized, though it is surely one of the aims for which the public library strives," says Wellman.

It is clearly the ideal for which the Springfield librarian strives. Springfield is hardly a fifth the size of Boston, yet it has a book circulation half as great as Boston's. Boston lost over 13,000 books last year. Springfield lost 138 books. These contrasts are too sharp to have escaped the attention of so informed a library administrator as Mr. Lord.

The strange thing is that Boston has lost so large a number of books—almost as many as the vastly larger New York library—though it keeps the greater part of its books out of circulation. Sixty percent of the books in the Boston central library cannot be taken out of the building, without special permission. The greater part of all the books are not directly accessible to the public, as they are in Springfield. The chances for stealing books would seem to be immensely greater in Springfield.

"Liberality," says the Springfield librarian in his annual report, "has been the settled policy of the library directors. But liberality in privileges does not mean looseness in management. Thus, out of a circulation of 2,269,847 volumes the past year, only 109 were not returned or paid for—an extraordinary record creditable alike to the Springfield public and to the library assistants, or perhaps 'persistents,' who follow up delinquent borrowers. A reader may take at one time any reasonable number of books, 'reasonable' being interpreted according to circumstances. One man, for example, was allowed to borrow 88 books to be kept six months for serious literary work; but a halt was called in the case of an enterprising woman who drew numerous novels, paying for them at the rate of one cent a day, when she was found to be renting them out again at two cents per day.

Springfield's librarian believes that the books are there to be used by as many people as can be got to use them.

"A public library like ours cannot become a research library. It must not gather and preserve out-of-date material. It must rather be a working library," he says. Yet nobody goes farther than Wellman to recover a stolen book. He will cheerfully spend $25 to get back a $2 book, counting the cost as protection to all other books. "The record seems to have got around that you can't steal a Springfield library book and get away with it. Boston has yet to develop the organized pursuit of the library's handicaps is the construction of the library buildings which in many cases place the exits far from the watchful eye of the desk. A greater problem is that Boston's state of mind resents too strict a guard over its books. It would not stand for the turnstile inspection used in some large cities. But neither does Springfield and Springfield gets along without it by trusting the patrons of the library with all the books and being alert to protect the public from the untrustworthiness of the few without making all feel like criminals.

Springfield gets its two and a quarter million of circulation from 400,000 books. Boston has four times as many books, but 50 percent of its home circulation comes from the 495,000 books in its branch libraries. Only 10 percent is from the more than 1,000,000 books that are kept in the central library, from which most of them may not be taken. To get this hoarded wealth into circulation is Mr. Lord's problem.

Turning again to Boston's beginning, Wellman says: "It was difficult to slough off the old notion that the first duty of the library was to gather and preserve treasures for posterity, rather than to furnish books for present use. Thus, in the late 60's we find the Boston trustees virtually congratulating themselves that the poorest books were the most read, for, noting that ephemeral fiction was oftenest called for, they stated, 'It is in many respects fortunate that the wear and tear of the library falls mainly upon the class of works of the smallest relative importance.'"

This "old notion" was built into the very structure of the Boston Public Library and that is why Milton E. Lord has one of the hardest jobs in Boston. He has already made it clear that he will not be bound by irrevocable tradition and that he means to emphasize the "public" in Public Library.

NOW THE FAIRY STORIES ARE OFF THE SHELVES AGAIN

No Pied Piper Ever Called Such a Following as When the Children Came to the Call of the Boston Public Library During the Fine Amnesty Period—"I Couldn't Get 10 Cents And I Didn't Dare Bring Back the Book"

By LOUIS M. LYONS

No Pied Piper ever called such a following as came to the call of the Boston Public Library, announcing that all library cards withheld for non-payment of fines might be recovered during "fineless" week.

Twenty-five thousand children besieged the libraries the first day. Two thousand children an hour poured through one of the larger branches in the hours between school's end and supper. Traffic officers had to apply the methods of a crowded moving picture theatre, letting in only as many, at one time, as would take places made by those who left by another door.

In four days 26,600 cards were returned to applicants, and the greater part of the number were children. Struggling through scenes that beggared any description of a political riot or the thronging of a football stadium, the library assistants, reinforced with extra help for the week, have done a third of a year's business in registrations in one week. Four days of the heaviest rain of the year caused no letup in the storm of children. The first "no-school" day there were children waiting at the steps of the West End branch at 7:45. The library opens at 9. In many branches the doors had to be closed in midafternoon just because the buildings would not hold any more people.

Books Their Only Recreation

In one of the branches every single book of fairy stories was gone in the first hour of the children's rush. In another branch I watched a surging mass of children, four deep, around the empty shelf where "easy readers" are kept. When the assistant brought over an armful of books scrambled for them like hungry puppies at feeding time.

What, then, must a book mean to one of these children? Some of them waited hours for their cards. They brought their little brothers or sisters, too young to read, too small to be left alone, and with no one to care for them at home. Above the tumult in one large branch rose a baby's shrieking cry. His brother had left him in a corner while he went to get a book. Suddenly the strange roomful frightened the baby. Johnny came a-running and had to leave without waiting for his book in order to quiet the baby.

"A book means the only recreation that many of them can have now," says Fanny Goldstein, who has served the West End branch for 10 years. She showed one of the cards restored in the general amnesty. The last charge was for "Tom Sawyer," which had been returned in July with a fine of 14 cents due. The child had not had 14 cents and not been able to raise it. Library rules required that his card be taken away from him. He had lost his library privilege.

Filling Gaps of Empty Time

That is the story, compounded of the 78,000 former patrons of the Boston public library who had lost their borrowing privilege when the new director, Milton E. Lord, decided that something must be done to restore the service of the library to this great group, numbering almost one-half as many as all the active borrowers from the library.

More than half of them were children who had been unable to raise 14 cents or 4 cents to pay for their lack of promptness in returning a book. The librarian—every librarian—feels that public libraries have a duty in the depression to fill the gaps of empty time, when pockets too are empty. Mr. Lord felt that the library could not afford to let these victims of the depression remain cut off from the timely service the library sought to give.

The different problem of the return of library books through the "consignments boxes" at the doors of all the branches, has been partly solved. Four days saw the return of 2189 books out of 20,000 which were on the library's lost list. One of these books had been missing 29 years.

The explanation made with the return of one long-missing book was that it had been put on the ice chest to keep it away from the baby, and somehow got down behind the ice chest. Another book had fallen into the sauerkraut barrel. Another had been put under a mattress by a person, reading in bed, and it stayed there until the family moved.

Keeping Warm Till Bedtime

But far more common was the explanation of a timid little boy that he forgot to take the book back when it was due, then he couldn't get 10 cents from his mother for the fine, and he didn't dare to return it without the fine.

Some losses of books are expected by a public library that serves all kinds and conditions of readers. Some increase in losses is to be expected when the circulation of books leaps up from about 2,000,000 in 1922 to nearly 5,000,000 in 1932, as it has in Boston. Through the last three years of hard times, book circulation has risen with the rise of unemployment by 12 to 15 percent a year.

There are various uses of a library. A little girl brings her very small brother to one of the branches. The rule is that no child comes under school age. "But mother is sick and they told me to bring him over here to take care of him," she said.

At one of the branches children come in larger numbers and stay later in the evening than in other branches. Some come to read and some to study. But it is plain to the librarians that more of them come to keep warm until bedtime. The dwellings in that district are very generally without heating systems.

A Haven of Shelter

It is largely a boys' audience that throngs the story hour. It is chiefly a boys' group, reading magazines at the children's tables. "Girls have to help at home and take care of the smaller children," explains the staff assistant. "Girls are more likely to get a book and take it home."

A young girl who registered as a salesgirl at a 5 and 10 cent store took the four books permitted at one time on one card. They were Nicholas Nickleby, Emerson's Essays, "Dante," by Ozanan and "The Guardsman," by Molnar.

The library maintains a close tieup with the schools. Peter comes with a note from his teacher, who feels that Peter has been reading too many Wild West stories and that their influence is shown in the increasing violence of his behavior. Can't the library help him to select some different reading? "Aw, doncher mind, I'll read some of your books bimby," says Peter.

"A Polish book for my fader, a Yiddish book for my mudder and a love story for my sister," one small boy places his order with the desk.

On a cold wet day the intown branch library is a haven that shelters much wretchedness. Old men, broken men, and men who on a closer glance are neither so old nor so broken as their clothing is, fill all the seats in the reading room. Others wait for a chance to sit down. Here and there a hardy individual ventures to use the radiator to dry his coat. One even takes off his shoes to sit down to the business of drying both feet and shoes.

Terrific Human Problems

A sudden disturbance at one end of the room draws the library attendant. A man has fainted for lack of food. It is necessary to call an ambulance and meantime to hold back the crowding children and restore the atmosphere of a reading room. Such is not a rare incident of library management in these times.

When a northeaster blows it makes a heavy night in the library. Wet clothes steam. The reading room is packed. The antiquated ventilating system gives up the struggle with the odors of the room. What happens to the reading room habits when the library closes?

The librarian has inquired about these men who live in the library for the comfort of its warmth and chairs. "All we can learn about them is that when they apply for aid they are given a night's lodging and a breakfast," she says. "The rest is in the hands of the Lord."

At the West End branch on Cambridge St., the main reading room is crowded every day from early morning. Men wait in line for the doors to open. In bad weather. Many of them stay nearly all day. The library is one place they can stay.

One man volunteers the statement that if it weren't for the library he would be "behind the bars." He has been out of work for a year and often hungry. He reads to keep his mind from thinking about his plight.

Most of the men are reticent. A librarian like Fanny Goldstein, who appreciates the terrific human problem presented by the daily evidence of her reading room, can identify the mechanic of 35 whose job was lost to an improved machine after a lifetime's skilled labor, and the cabinet-maker whose idleness followed the failure of the work that had employed him 20 years.

A man of 70 asks for a rousing adventure story, "something I can bury my troubles in." Miss Goldstein quickly indicates the condition of the clothes and the faces of children that tell of empty purses and scant larders at home.

Used by 14 Races

Along with trouble and struggle has come an increased demand for serious books and an enormous increase in hard questions which often put the library assistants to their wits' end to run down the information in their reference files.

Even when there is no siege of an amnesty week, 2500 patrons a day flow through the West End branch. More than half are children and the children all come from 3:30 to supper time.

A girl sits on guard outside the children's room at the head of the stairs. As they file past her, she looks at books, cards, hands. If hands don't make the grade, she sends them home for washing.

On a rainy afternoon some hands are red from the color of the book binding. She has an armful of newspapers on a chair beside her, and as the children file past her on their way out, she has them wrap up their books before they go out into the wet.

This branch keeps half a dozen copies of most books. But they have 23 copies of Pinocchio and 15 each of Haidée, Clematis and Pollyanna, 15 of The Fairy Reader and a dozen each of Tom Sawyer, Penrod and Sam, and The Pet pony. They have to have more copies of Popular Mechanics than of any other magazine.

Almost every child, after getting a book for himself, stops at the shelf of "easy readers" and takes a book for a little brother or sister at home. Or perhaps that is a charitable view of the selection. "A lot of our lazy readers take them to read themselves," says a sharp-eyed assistant.

Fourteen races use the West End branch. Out of 224 registrations of a recent count, just 34 were by native-born Americans. This group was outnumbered by three others, and by three to one in comparison with one other race group.

The library was already deep in Americanization long before the word was ever used.

New Problems of Discipline

The racial confusion has complicated the problem of discipline, or, better described, has created a new problem of discipline, in recent years. Miss Goldstein is widely recognized for her sympathetic understanding of the human problems of library service. It is therefore significant that she reports:

"With a change in racial elements we have had an increase in gangs and lawlessness in the children's room. We were formerly little concerned with discipline. Now rowdiness is one of our major problems. Many boys and girls no longer have any fear of authority, even of a uniformed policeman. The littlest ones are defiant." Miss Goldstein has coped with this problem by a method of her own. Last week she received first prize from the Beacon Hill Garden Club for the library garden.

EAST BOSTON'S GONE "BOOK-MINDED" SINCE MORATORIUM ON FINES

19,774 BOOKS TAKEN OUT OF THREE BRANCHES
DURING WEEK. NUMBER OF CARDS RESTORED
IS 3,119. ONE BOOK OUT 12 YEARS HERE!

From the figures available through the local branch libraries it would seem as though East Boston had become book-minded over night. During the past week, thousands, including adults and children responded to the offer of the Boston Public Library to restore all cards heretofore held for fines.

The overwhelming response from boys and girls necessitated the services of police officers to prevent traffic congestion in front of both the Jeffries Point and Meridian Street branches. When the children, who stormed the doors of these libraries were finally placed in orderly files the lines extended for blocks. With the children's rooms filled to capacity the assistants had a difficult task maintaining order among hundreds of enthusiastic youngsters eager to secure their cards and take out books. Story books, fairy tales and easy readers were in such great demand that the shelves were soon empty and children had to form in lines and wait until books which were being returned were shipped and distributed. On the whole the children were very patient and cooperative.

The circulation for the week in the three East Boston branches was 19,774 books. Each branch issued an average of over 1,000 volumes daily.

The number of cards restored to borrowers "freed of charges" were 3,119. It is estimated that one-third of this number, taking advantage of renewing their library privileges, were adults. Many volunteered the information that they were unemployed and were very grateful for the opportunity to secure books for home reading. There were numerous cases of whole families, parents and children applying for cards. Through the publicity given the library regarding "Fine Cancellation Week" many new readers were attracted. The new registration figures in the adult departments were much larger than usual.

One of the most gratifying results of this unique drive in this district was the return of about 200 books which had been overdetained by cardholders or inadvertently borrowed. There were "no questions asked" although some of the books had been missing from library shelves for years. One volume "Dante's Divine Comedy" returned to the Meridian St. branch had disappeared 12 years ago, while another volume had been lost in 1923.

Although "Fine Cancellation Week" is over all residents of the island are invited to familiarize themselves with the advantages offered by our local branch libraries.

MAYOR NAMES CARDINAL PUBLIC LIBRARY TRUSTEE

Mayor Curley yesterday appointed Cardinal O'Connell a trustee of the Boston Public Library to succeed Rt. Rev. Msgr. Arthur T. Connolly, who was forced by illness to decline a re-appointment.

In a letter to Msgr. Connolly the Mayor said:

"The splendid services which you have so graciously and generously given without recompense has been of great value to the people of Boston and in their name I beg you will accept of their sincere appreciation and gratitude."

ASSISI IN BOSTON

by
MARGARET MUNSTERBERG
OF BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY

In this summer of economy and restriction, a number of people who have been accustomed to travel abroad and refresh their nerves by contact with old-world relics and atmospheres, will no doubt have to stay at home. It is the purpose of this little sketch to draw the attention of these mildly unfortunate to the consolatory aspect of the treasures that may be found in the great libraries right at home, and more especially in the Public Library of Boston.

When Mr. Lord, the new Director of the Boston Public Library, entered upon his office at the beginning of this year, he expressed the hope that American libraries would be enabled to have facsimile reproductions of the rare works in European libraries so that research scholars would be able to examine the appearance and the contents of source works without being obliged to travel to the Vatican, to the British Museum or the collections in Paris or Vienna. But the resources of scholars and students are in many cases open also to amateurs and to those who wish to travel with their minds. It may therefore be not wholly inappropriate to describe a facsimile rich in associations which may be seen in the Paul Sabatier Franciscan Collection housed on the third floor of the Boston Public Library.

This collection is a remarkable library of books, pamphlets and sets of periodicals pertaining to the life of St. Francis and the Franciscan Order which has recently been bought from trust funds for the city of Boston. The late Paul Sabatier, who as the author of his beautiful Life of St. Francis and as editor of early Franciscan writings started a revival of enthusiasm for the Little Poor Man of Assisi, collected this library and, what makes it especially valuable, annotated many of the books with marginal comments and references. During his life-time it had been the wish of M. Sabatier that his collection might come into the possession of an American library, and his widow, hoping to fulfill his wish, communicated it to their friend Professor Vida Scudder of Wellesley, herself a Franciscan student; and it was through Miss Scudder's mediation that the trustees of the Boston Public Library came to purchase the French scholar's library. It is now being classified and catalogued by an expert librarian of long and wide experience.

It would be a tempting task to describe the Franciscan collection, if this had not already been done by Mr. Zoltan Haraszti in the September number of More Books, the bulletin of the Boston Public Library. Suffice it to say that the collection is extraordinarily comprehensive, that one may find in it works in various languages and dating from a thirteenth century breviary to recent controversial literature. There are abundant works of hagiography, notably lives of the Franciscan St. Anthony. Many of the old books are bound in parchment and adorned with

OUTSIDE

They talked last night
In a stuffy room,
Over the wrong and the right.
Outside the moon was spilling
Her beautiful silver light.

They drawned the voice
Of the Whippoorwill
Discussing the news of the day,
While out of the woods came pixies
And nymphs and fairy-fay.

They laughed and told strange stories,
I couldn't stay—could you?

impressive frontispieces: one may mention at random three such works—the Vita Patrum, the Chronica Seraphica, and an ecclesiastic history of Piacenza, printed respectively at Antwerp, Madrid and Piacenza in the seventeenth century.

But keeping in mind the nostalgic would-be traveler, it is a humbler item, yet one with a special appeal, that the present writer wishes to describe. If that hypothetical traveler should be an Italy lover, he would undoubtedly want to visit Assisi, the birth-place and shrine of St. Francis, and if he had the opportunity to do so, he would go first of all to the famous church which bears the remains of St. Francis and which is adorned by the great iconographer Giotto.

But it is in the secret sacristy of the church that the devout Franciscans thrill with delight as they are permitted to see the intimate relics of the Saint. Here is the tunic which St. Francis wore in his last illness, here are his sandals, his cord, his hood and a chalice which he used. But the most touching of all is a parchment benediction for his companion Brother Leo. The parchment, which measures 14 by 10 cm., has been kept in a silver case, in spite of the fact that the back side is equally precious, as it bears the Laudes or Praises composed by St. Francis, also written in his own hand.

It is of the treasured Benediction that the Paul Sabatier collection contains a facsimile. Besides this reproduced parchment, the mental traveler has at his disposal a number of photographs in various volumes describing and discussing the Benediction.

As Brother Leo to whom the blessing was given carried the revered parchment with him for forty-seven years, it may be imagined that it is well worn and frayed at the edges. The Praises on the back have become effaced in parts, but have been emended with the aid of early copies. The Benediction itself is difficult for the layman to decipher, but here, too, scholars have come to one's aid.

What strikes the eye first is a drawing at the bottom of the page, roughly in the center, of a nondescript object which, as will be seen, has been the subject of much controversy. Out of this rises a large T-shaped cross. When one looks at the writing on the parchment, one sees above and between the text written by Saint Francis, lines in a smaller hand which were originally written with red ink. This inscription was made by Brother Leo, to whom the Benediction was addressed. The words of Saint Francis and of Brother Leo are all in Latin.

The Librarian

Rambles Among the Bookstacks

MILTON E. LORD, director of the Boston Public Library, writes a friendly note calling to the attention of the Librarian a complete statement of the results of Fine Cancellation Week, printed in the latest issue of More Books. The Librarian, who had overlooked this interesting article, begs leave to share it with readers. It reads as follows:

"Fine cancellation was held at the Boston Public Library between Oct. 17 and 22. It was an emergency measure employed because of the depression which had made it difficult for many people to pay fines for overdue books. All such fines were declared void, and borrowers who had lost their library privileges because of non-payment of fines were invited to take out new cards. At the same time, such borrowers as had kept back overdue library books were emphatically requested to return these books. It was made clear that their fines could be cancelled only on this condition. And since many of the books missing from the library shelves had been 'inadvertently borrowed without charging,' a plea was also made for the return of such books.

"No less than 78,000 individuals—many of them children—had lost their library privileges because of non-payment of fines. It was to be expected, therefore, that the response to the appeal would be substantial. In actual fact, it turned out to be so extraordinarily eager that no one could have foreseen it.

The first day was indicative of what was to follow. The morning was quiet everywhere, for the children were in school. Soon after lunch-hour, however, the avalanche began. Hordes of children were pouring into the libraries, until the rooms were all filled and police had to keep the lines in order outside the buildings. At some of the branches 1500 to 2000 children presented themselves for new cards. The first day brought about 25,000 children to the branches.

"The results were amazing in regard to the renewal of cards: in a single day 7419 individuals were added to the cardholders of the library. As regards the return of books, however, the results proved less gratifying. Out of about 20,000 books, the recovery of which seemed extremely difficult, 534 books were received on the first day.

"The weather, as will be remembered, was exceptionally stormy during the larger part of the week. Yet the siege of the branches by the crowds of children suffered no relaxation. In drenching rain they kept coming for the renewal of their cards. The number of recovered books increased constantly throughout the week. Meanwhile, the publicity attending the campaign had apparently awakened new interest in the library. Hundreds of individuals, altogether new to the library, registered every day for cards.

At the end of the sixth day a halt was called. Fine Cancellation Week was over. And as the figures have been counted the results, in their totals, seem even more extraordinary: in all, 30,922 people had their cards renewed during the week; the number of recovered books was 3642; and the number of cards issued to people who were not borrowers before was 2218.

In a statement Mr. Milton E. Lord, director of the library, announced to the public that people may still take out new library cards any time after Oct. 24. That is, the cancellation of fines as declared during Fine Cancellation Week for all books returned prior to the end of the week remains valid. Those people, however, who have failed to return the overdue library books during Fine Cancellation Week have lost the privilege of having their fines cancelled. They, too, may obtain new library cards, but only if they return the library books and pay their fines.

The Providence Public Library's views on official "conscience days" were set forth in those columns last week. In the latest issue of "Books for All," the library bulletin, the officials at Providence admit that while opposed to the "conscience days" plan both in principle and in practice, they are willing to temper justice with mercy during the present economic crisis.

The editorial, in part, follows: "The economic depression is manifested in its effects upon the use of public libraries. Because it is a free form of recreation, reading is more popular than ever before, and perhaps it is more than ever valuable as a means of temporary escape from troubled thoughts. On the other hand, because of irregular work or complete unemployment, many persons are unable to borrow books from their public library since their library cards are not in good standing, due to unpaid charges for overdue, lost or damaged books.

"The Library has stated its belief that its readers should and must meet their library responsibilities. But every reasonable consideration is being made in favor of those adults and children whose domestic finances have been seriously affected by unemployment, and whose library cards are not usable because of their inability, not unwillingness, to pay overdue charges. (Persons who have lost or damaged the Library's books and have not settled the accounts are not included in these provisions.)

"In accordance with this objective, any reader who, since Jan. 1, 1930, (when the depression's effects began to appear), has incurred charges for overdue books and has not paid because of unemployment in the family, may make arrangements so that the library card's use may be continued. The account may be settled on an installment basis. If this is impossible, subject to the approval of the circulation department librarian or the children's librarian at the Central Library, the branch librarian or children's librarian at a branch library, the charges may be extended for twelve months. In either case, the use of the card is continued.

"The plan does not in any sense cancel library obligations. It postpones their settlement for the person who is sufficiently interested in books and reading to ask for this special privilege.

"It is to be understood that this arrangement terminates at once if the reader incurs further delinquency, and that it is for 'duration of depression' only."

Which is the "why" of our introduction in this section where the English custom of making hedges has been adapted as at "Blighly." The blue-berry and blackberry bushes, as well as cut fairly deep to ensure young growth more easily trimmed and kept at a uniform height. It is interesting in this instance to note that one man is kept busy at "Blighly" solely in the work of cutting back, pruning and removing these hedges. From their appearance at the time of our visit, we were sure there would be no English line for the Premier's hedges if he happened to have been a resident here.

In connection with our tour with Superintendent Dean, we learned that he was born in a lodge on the grounds of Windsor Forest in England where his father was stationed in royal service.

The writer knows of no other estate in this section where the English custom of making hedges has been adapted as at "Blighly."

The Premier's property which has been established at Eastern Point for the past decade consists of about 100 acres of fine shore land skirting Niles' pond, around which Colonel Premiss has had built a number of excellent roads. The property extends from the one side from the east end of Niles' pond beach boulevard about a mile and some distance beyond Niles' pond and the most important road at the Bass Roads shore. Colonel Premiss has had built a splendid road in the golf course section for automobiles, this leading back to Eastern Point and thence to the western end of the property.

The air of generous hospitality for which this back shore estate at Gloucester is noted pervades the very grounds.

ASSISI IN BOSTON

by MARGARET MÜNSTERBERG

Brother Leo, it must be remembered, was the companion of St. Francis when he fasted and meditated on the mountain La Verna in the Apennines, and it was during this retreat, in August 1224, that the Saint in ecstasy received the stigmata. To this miracle the words written by Brother Leo at the top of the parchment bear witness:

The blessed Francis two years before his death kept a fast in the hermitage of Alverna in honor of the blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God, and of the blessed archangel Michael. . . And the hand of God was laid upon him. After the vision and the speech of the seraph and after receiving the impression of the stigmata of Christ on his body, he made these praises written on the other side of the sheet and wrote them with his hand, rendering thanks to God for the benefit conferred upon him.

Underneath his explanation of Brother Leo, one may try to decipher the more conspicuous letters of St. Francis: "Benedicat tibi Dominus," etc., the familiar benediction from the Book of Numbers:

The Lord bless thee and keep thee; The Lord make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; The Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace.

Let there should be any doubt about the authenticity and the purpose of this blessing, Brother Leo has furnished this assurance, written beneath the lines of the Saint:

The blessed Francis wrote with his hand this benediction for me brother Leo.

And underneath these words one may see the special blessing in St. Francis's writing: "Frater Leo, te dñs [dominus] benedicat (Brother Leo the Lord bless thee). The name Leo is separated in two syllables, one on either side of the cross, according to an old custom.

And finally, underneath the T-shaped cross and the strange drawing beneath it, Brother Leo wrote this explanation: "In a similar manner he made this sign T with the head by his hand."

This reference to a head and the mysterious drawing beneath it have, as mentioned above, been the subject of scholarly controversy. Some examples of conflicting interpretations are at hand in the Sabatier Franciscan collection.

Monsignor Pulignani, for instance, described the hieroglyphic simply as "a kind of flower." Others had the theory that the drawing represented Mount Calvary with a skull upon it, and that Brother Leo's mention of a "head" referred to this skull. The Franciscan scholar Montgomery Carmichael offers an elaborate theory. According to him, the drawing represents indeed a mountain, but another one, namely Mount Alverna or La Verna where St. Francis received the stigmata.

The interpreter insists, moreover, that a comparison of a photograph of Mt. Alverna with the drawing on the parchment must inevitably convince one of the resemblance. He points out that the cross is not placed on the summit of the mountain, as on Calvary, but on the side at the point where St. Francis received the stigmata. Further Mr. Carmichael sees in the letter T a symbolic representation of a gallows, an expression of St. Francis's extreme penitential humility. And Brother Leo's reference to a head is explained in an extraordinary way. At the top of the T one may, if one looks closely, observe a little hump, which, according to Mr. Carmichael, was intended to represent St. Francis's own head as the head of the malefactor on the gallows.

A far more convincing interpretation is offered by Reginald Baltour, a member of the Third Order of St. Francis, whose readings of the Latin text have been adopted in the above description. Mr. Baltour recalls a story told by Thomas of Celano, St. Francis's first biographer, in his Second Life of the Saint and also in his Treatises on the Miracles of Saint Francis.

The story goes that a poet known as the King of Verses, on meeting St. Francis at the retreat of the Poor Clares, saw upon the Saint a cross made of two crossed swords, extending from head to foot and from hand to hand. The poet thereupon was converted to the Franciscan life and was called Brother Pacificus. Mr. Baltour further points out references made by Thomas of Celano and St. Bonaventura to St. Francis's custom of signing with a T-shaped cross.

The Leta Sanctorum, moreover, explain his use of the sign as a response to the exhortation of the Prophet Ezekiel: "... mark Thau [T] upon the foreheads of the men that sigh . . ." Therefore, Mr. Baltour concludes, the drawing at the bottom of the T, which is a sign of blessing, represents the head or forehead of the penitent thus blessed, and he quaintly remarks that the clumsiness of the drawing does not for him detract from the greatness of the Saint.

If these controversies seem somewhat remote to the modern reader, they serve at least to show in what veneration the relics of the humble friend of birds and lepers have been held by men of learning. Possibly they may serve also to waken a little curiosity, enough to make one or another resident of Boston and its environs want to see for himself the faithful likeness of an Old World treasure and further to explore the almost inexhaustible riches of the Franciscan collection in Boston.

The Librarian

Rambles Among the Bookstacks

MILTON E. LORD, director of the Boston Public Library, writes a friendly note calling to the attention of the Librarian a complete statement of the results of Fine Cancellation Week, printed in the latest issue of More Books. The Librarian, who had overlooked this interesting article, begs leave to share it with readers. It reads as follows:

"Fine cancellation was held at the Boston Public Library between Oct. 17 and 22. It was an emergency measure employed because of the depression which had made it difficult for many people to pay fines for overdue books. All such fines were declared void, and borrowers who had lost their library privileges because of nonpayment of fines were invited to take out new cards. At the same time, such borrowers as had kept back overdue library books were emphatically requested to return these books. It was made clear that their fines could be cancelled only on this condition. And since many of the books missing from the library shelves had been 'inadvertently borrowed without charging,' a plea was also made for the return of such books.

"No less than 78,000 individuals—many of them children—had lost their library privileges because of nonpayment of fines. It was to be expected, therefore, that the response to the appeal would be substantial. In actual fact, it turned out to be so extraordinarily eager that no one could have foreseen it.

The first day was indicative of what was to follow. The morning was quiet everywhere, for the children were in school. Soon after lunch-hour, however, the avalanche began. Hordes of children were pouring into the libraries, until the rooms were all filled and police had to keep the lines in order outside the buildings. At some of the branches 1500 to 2000 children presented themselves for new cards. The first day brought about 25,000 children to the branches.

"The results were amazing in regard to the renewal of cards: in a single day 7419 individuals were added to the card-holders of the library. As regards the return of books, however, the results proved less gratifying. Out of about 20,000 books, the recovery of which seemed extremely difficult, 534 books were received on the first day.

"The weather, as will be remembered, was exceptionally stormy during the larger part of the week. Yet the siege of the branches by the crowds of children suffered no relaxation. In drenching rain they kept coming for the renewal of their cards. The number of recovered books increased constantly throughout the week. Meanwhile, the publicity attending the campaign had apparently awakened new interest in the library. Hundreds of individuals, altogether new to the library, registered every day for cards.

At the end of the sixth day a halt was called. Fine Cancellation Week was over. And as the figures have been counted the results, in their totals, seem even more extraordinary: in all, 30,922 people had their cards renewed during the week; the number of recovered books was 5442; and the number of cards issued to people who were not borrowers before was 2218.

In a statement Mr. Milton E. Lord, director of the library, announced to the public that people may still take out new library cards any time after Oct. 24. That is, the cancellation of fines as declared during Fine Cancellation Week for all books returned prior to the end of the week remains valid. Those people, however, who have failed to return the overdue library books during Fine Cancellation Week have lost the privilege of having their fines cancelled. They, too, may obtain new library cards, but only if they return the library books and pay their fines.

The Providence Public Library's views on official "conscience days" were set forth in these columns last week. In the latest issue of "Books for All," the library bulletin, the officials at Providence admit that while opposed to the "conscience days" plan both in principle and in practice, they are willing to temper justice with mercy during the present economic crisis.

The editorial, in part, follows:

"The economic depression is many-sided in its effects upon the use of public libraries. Because it is a free form of recreation, reading is more popular than ever before, and perhaps it is more than ever valuable as a means of temporary escape from troubled thoughts. On the other hand, because of irregular work or complete unemployment, many persons are unable to borrow books from their public library since their library cards are not in good standing, due to unpaid charges for overdue, lost or damaged books.

"The Library has stated its belief that its readers should and must meet their library responsibilities. But every reasonable consideration is being made in favor of those adults and children whose domestic finances have been seriously affected by unemployment, and whose library cards are not usable because of their inability, not unwillingness, to pay overdue charges. (Persons who have lost or damaged the Library's books and have not settled the accounts are not included in these provisions.)

"In accordance with this objective, any reader who, since Jan. 1, 1930, (when the depression's effects began to appear), has incurred charges for overdue books, and has not paid because of unemployment in the family, may make arrangements so that the library card's use may be continued. The account may be settled on an installment basis. If this is impossible, subject to the approval of the circulation department librarian or the children's librarian at the Central Library, the branch librarian or children's librarian at a branch library, the charges may be extended for twelve months. In either case, the use of the card is continued.

"The plan does not in any sense cancel library obligations. It postpones their settlement for the person who is sufficiently interested in books and reading to ask for this special privilege.

CURLEY IGNORES CRITICS; REFUSES TO CUT BUDGET MORE THAN $1,000,000

DEPARTMENTS ASK $3,677,936 MORE FOR 1933

Few Curtailments, No Salary Cuts Contemplated
By Mayor

CIVIC BODIES PLAN FIGHT FOR INQUIRY

Executive's Position Brings City's Financial Crisis To Head

Mayor Curley last night ignored civic and commercial organizations which have demanded that the city reduce its municipal expenditures at least $9,000,000 in 1933, by announcing that he intended to make $1,000,000 reduction in budget allocations for departments under his control.

The mayor's brief statement revealed that no marked curtailment of departmental costs is contemplated, and that he is not considering reductions in salaries of city and county employees or the inauguration of a more economical administrative policy.

His action is expected to bring to a head the opposition which has been directed at his policies by the chamber of commerce, Massachusetts Tax Association, Municipal Research Bureau and the Boston Real Estate Exchange. Representatives of these organizations last night interpreted his statement as a challenge to prosecute to the limit the proposed legislative action to curtail municipal expenses and to authorize an investigation of the entire city administration.

CURLEY GRATIFIED
The mayor previously had declared that the budget must be cut at least $3,000,000, and flatly told department heads that their estimates for 1933 must be lower than the amounts they received in 1932.

Instead, the list of departmental estimates for 1933, given out by the mayor, were $3,677,936 in excess of budget allowances this year. Estimates for public welfare and soldiers' relief work absorb $3,562,677 of this amount.

Curley expressed his gratification because estimates exclusive of relief and hospitals are $40,000 less than 1932 allowances.

In all, requests for 1933 totalled $44,340,558.29, compared with 1932 appropriations of $40,662,621.60.

A $1,000,000 reduction in this latter figure amounts to a cut of slightly less than 2.5 per cent. in the 1933 budget.

"It is my purpose," he said, "to reduce the allowances at least $1,000,000 below the amount allowed in 1932, or a total of nearly $5,000,000 less than department estimates."

It was immediately pointed out that department heads ask for more money than they expect to receive, and that their estimates are valueless as factors entering the financial problems of the city.

Many department heads deliberately ignored the mayor's order to limit their estimates for 1933 to the allocations granted this year. In 33 instances estimates exceed 1932 allowances and in 29 departmental activities less money is asked for than was made available this year. Two show no change.

Police Commissioner Hultman asked for $249,709 more than the $6,154,870 allotted this year, but Fire Commissioner McLaughlin reported that his department will be able to get along with $83,955 less than the appropriation for the current year.

Other increases in allocations were asked by the park department which requested $118,047 more than this year; Long Island Hospital, $87,133; City Hospital, $65,284; collecting department, $69,471; child welfare division of institutions department, $46,210; street lighting, $44,559; public library, $35,845; health department, $34,293; and public buildings department, $32,577.

MAYOR'S STATEMENT

The mayor, in his statement, said: The departmental estimates, as submitted to me this day by the budget commissioner, are $3,677,936.69 in excess of the allowances made for the year 1932, and, exclusive of the public welfare, soldiers' relief, City Hospital and Long Island Hospital, departments, are some $40,000 less than the actual allowances for 1932.

The greatest increase this year is that for the public welfare and soldiers' relief departments, these two departments alone accounting for $3,562,677.75, almost the entire increased cost.

While the departmental estimates as contrasted with the actual allowances for 1932, with the exception of the public welfare, soldiers' relief, City Hospital and Long Island Hospital estimates, are most gratifying in that they represent a less expenditure than for the year 1932, it is my purpose to reduce the allowances at least $1,000,000 below the amount allowed in 1932, the total of nearly $5,000,000 less than the departmental estimates.

Exclusive of public welfare and soldiers' relief, departmental estimates for 1933 are $115,538.94 in excess of the actual allowances for 1932. As indicated in the attached table the gross increase in the 1933 estimates over those of the 1932 allowances is $3,677,936.69. Public welfare and soldiers' relief account for $3,562,677.75 of this increase.

No specific indication was made by the mayor of the appropriation items which will be slashed, but an analysis of his statement revealed that a saving in excess of $300,000 in the sanitary service of the public works department will be due to the fact that because of the expiration this year of the garbage disposal contract and the consummation of a new contract, double payment was necessary. The cost next year will be the annual amount specified in the contract until 1942, the year of its expiration, when another double payment will have to be made.

The decrease of $471,418 in the needs of the sanitary service is due primarily to the elimination of the double disposal payment and to a reduction in costs which has been manifest this year. The election department, because there will be but one election next year in contrast with two primaries and a major election this year, needs $69,942 less while the Matamoras sanatorium cost is estimated at $27,611 less and the estimated cost of the paving division of the public works department is $26,732 below the appropriation this year.

In the relief departments it is obvious that the executives do not anticipate any reductions in demands. The welfare department asks for $12,519,426.

Whiteside Comments On Curley Statement

Alexander Whiteside, vice-president of the Massachusetts Tax Association, commenting last night on the announcement by Mayor Curley that he proposed to cut the 1933 budget by $1,000,000, said:

"That's about what I supposed he would do. It's true to form."

Bentley W. Warren, chairman of the Boston municipal research bureau, said:

"That's about all we could expect from him."

Frederic S. Snyder, president of the chamber of commerce, said he would comment later.

In comparison with budget allotments of $9,229,245 this year, while Soldiers' Relief Commissioner Lydon, who has had $712,797 at his disposal this year figures that his department will need $985,294 in 1933.

It is certain that neither estimate will be the figure included in the budget. The mayor intends to continue the so-called "voluntary" contributions of city and county employees to welfare department funds and the schedule of assessment may be larger than this year.

Overseers of public welfare anticipate spending more money next year than has been disbursed this year because monthly costs have during the final quarter of the year been brought down to $900,000 by a drastic demand for curtailment in order to insure adequate funds during the present month.

A detailed statement of 1932 allowances and 1933 estimates does not include the school department, debt requirements, or revenue producing departments and it is in reality a consideration of only one-half of the factors entering into the budget.

Critics of the cost of government this year have virtually demanded that budget allocations of $79,000,000 be reduced to $70,000,000 next year.

At a conference in City Hall last month, Frederic S. Snyder, president of the chamber of commerce, presented a program of retrenchment in behalf of the four interested civic organizations. This program included reduction of salaries of city and county employees; reduction of personnel by abolition of unnecessary positions and centralization of the welfare and supply departments; real competitive bidding for all purchases; discontinuance of non-essential activities.

"We suggest," the program said, "that city officials and private agencies set as their goal, a reduction of total requirements for 1933, as far as possible below $70,000,000, and that they should plan ahead to effect a further reduction in 1934. We recognize the fact that a large proportion of these requirements lies outside the sole control of the mayor, and that as to other requirements there is divided control. But a well conceived program of retrenchment on which city officials and private agencies can agree, should have an effect on all requirements of the city government, regardless of where the primary responsibility lies."

Robert McLaughlin were sent to the library last night with a package of false money.

They placed it behind the Paris directories and then retired to a distant corner of the hall. An hour later they saw the boy go directly to the book shelf, reach behind the directories and remove the package.

He was arrested and taken to police headquarters, where he was questioned by Deputy Supt. James McDevitt and Lt. John A. Dorsey. He steadfastly denied being responsible for the note.

ARREST STATE WARD ON EXTORTION CHARGE

Youth Accused of Threat Note to Banker Phelan

Herbert Dudley Nutter, 15, a State ward living with a family at 194 West Canton st., South End, was arrested in the Boston Public Library, Copley sq., at 8 last night, charged with attempted extortion of $500 from James J. Phelan, prominent Boston banker.

Three days ago, Mr. Phelan received a letter demanding that $500 in cash be placed in the open shelf room in the Public Library behind a copy of the Paris (France) Directory. This was to be done before last night. The letter ended: "This is a cheap price for a life."

The banker told the police and two officers from Police Headquarters were detailed to keep the book in question under constant surveillance. A small bundle of paper resembling a roll of bills was placed behind the book.

At 8 last night, special officers Raymond A. Thayer and Robert McGeouch claim they saw young Nutter enter the room, take the book from the shelf, and reach for the roll behind the book. Rushing at him from the nearby vicinity, they placed him under arrest and took him to Police Headquarters.

Deputy Supt. James McDevitt was notified and came to Police Headquarters from his home to take personal charge of the questioning of young Nutter. He is said to have been placed in the family several months ago by the Children's Aid Society. He is a graduate of Sylvester High School, Hanover, Mass., and, according to the police, is suffering from slight mental trouble.

After being fingerprinted and photographed, he was placed in the City Prison for safekeeping for the night. Mr. Phelan is a member of Hornblower and Weeks, bankers and brokers.

Phelan Death Note Laid to Gang Plot; Boy Held

Police saw a gangster plot plot today in the threatening note sent James J. Phelan, the banker, as 16-year-old Herbert Dudley Nutter, arrested at the Public Library on suspicion of sending the message, withstood two hours of grilling and handwriting tests at police headquarters.

The authorities discovered similarities between this note and one sent last September to E. B. Badger, engineer and fire extinguisher inventor, of Pitts st., West End.

The Badger note, kept secret until today by the police, demanded $5,000 under a threat of death. It was mailed from the north postal station, three blocks from Badger's place of business.

HELD FOR COURT.

The Nutter boy, a state ward living with a family on W. Canton st., South End, was taken to juvenile court despite his success against the police tests. A hearing was scheduled for tomorrow.

Inspector George Augusta, an expert on this type of investigation, who was assigned to the case this afternoon with Inspector Joseph Decker, said he believed the Nutter boy did not write the note, but that he was sent to the library by some man.

The boy fell into a trap laid by the police at the library, where a decoy package was left at a spot where the writer of the Phelan note asked to have $500 placed.

But today he insisted he was at the library to get a book and picked up the package out of curiosity.

"I didn't write that note and I didn't print it," the boy said.

His steadfast denials reopened the whole investigation and forced police officials to return to a theory that the $500 demand was no boyish prank but a real underworld plot.

CAUGHT IN LIBRARY

The note to Phelan read:

"Leave $500 in a package behind the Paris directory in the open shelf room of the Public Library, Dec. 1, before 10 p. m. "P. S.—$500 is a pretty cheap price for a life."

Special Officers McGeouch and Thayer, in plain clothes, left a bundle of clippings wrapped in plain paper at the designated spot and sat at a nearby table, pretending to read. Just before 10 o'clock they made the arrest.

GRAB BOY IN THREAT TO PHELAN

Confesses to Writing Blackmail Letter,
Police Say

ARRESTED IN TRAP IN PUBLIC LIBRARY

State Ward, Living Temporarily in the South End

Reaching for a package which police allege he thought contained $500 he had demanded in a blackmail letter he is accused of having written to James J. Phelan, prominent Boston banker, Herbert Dudley Nutter, 15, a State ward making his home temporarily in the South End, was arrested at 10 o'clock last night in the Boston Public Library.

Two officers, Robert McGooch and Ray Thayer of headquarters, seemingly poring over books in the open shelf room of the library, seized the boy as they sprang the trap which resulted in his arrest. They were amazed at his youth. Later at headquarters the boy is alleged to have confessed to writing the blackmail letter to the banker.

The letter received by the banker at his home on Chiswick road, Brighton, read as follows: "Leave $500 in a package behind the Paris directory in the open-half room of the Public Library, Dec. 1, before 10 p. m. P. S. $500 is a pretty cheap price for a life."

Upon its receipt he turned it over to Deputy Superintendent McDevitt and Officers McGooch and Thayer were assigned to the case. The letter was carefully printed with pencil from a cheap grade of note paper.
Last night they prepared a bundle of newspaper clippings, wrapped them in plain paper and placed them behind the Paris directory in the designated room. Then they sat at a table in the big room and appeared to bury themselves in the absorption of the books they were reading.

Takes Package
Just before 10 o'clock, the boy, neatly dressed, pale and somewhat nervous, came in, they said. He made a round of the room, looked all about him, and then left the building. He returned at 10, and went directly to the place where the Paris directory was on the shelf. He took the book from its place in the row and reached for the package. As he turned to go, the two officers took him into custody.
"What are you going to do with that?" he was asked.
"What do you want to know for?" came the reply from the boy, who appeared extremely nervous.

Denial at First
"We are police officers," he was told, "you'll have to come with us."

For some time at headquarters he flatly denied writing the letter or knowing anything about it. Then he is alleged to have confessed. He said he did not know why he wrote or how he had come to choose Mr. Phelan.

At the request of the arresting officers the juvenile was taken to the City Prison last night and this morning he will be arraigned in juvenile court.

In Boston Three Weeks
He has been in Boston only three weeks. During that time he made his home with Mrs. Frank Shears at 194 West Canton street. He had been placed there by the Children's Aid Society.

Mrs. Shears said last night that the boy had previously been living in Hanover, and had been attending Sylvester High School there. During his three-weeks' stay, she said, he was always well behaved, being extremely willing to run errands and help all he could about the house. She said she understood he had been somewhat backward in his studies before coming to live with her, and for this reason she insisted that he spend much time with his books.

Said He Was Going to Liberty

She declared he seemed to take a big interest in his studies and did not object to her insistence. He left home last night, she declared, after telling her he was going to the Public Library. At 10 o'clock when he failed to return she became a bit worried and at 10:30 a police officer called upon her checking up on the boy.

She said she believes both his parents are living but that they are now separated from each other.

CHARGED WITH ATTEMPT TO EXTORT

Herbert D. Nutter, 15, who was arraigned in juvenile court yesterday on a charge of attempting to extort $500 from James J. Phelan, banker. Special Officer R. C. McGooch is with the boy.

DENIES ANY PART IN EXTORT ATTEMPT

Boy, 15, Is Held for Hearing
Next Week

Herbert D. Nutter, 15, ward of the Children's Aid Society, steadfastly denied yesterday that he had any part in the attempt to extort $500 from James J. Phelan, banker, by threatening death to Phelan unless the banker placed the money behind a set of Paris directories in the Boston public library. Nutter was arraigned in juvenile court yesterday morning. Judge Perkins continued his case for one week. From the court, the boy was taken to police headquarters and given a lengthy questioning. He clung to his denial of participation in the extortion attempt.

Judge Perkins placed the boy in the hands of the probation department. Nutter lives on West Canton street with Mrs. Maude A. Shears.

Police said that they placed an envelope behind the directories mentioned in the threat note, and that they arrested Nutter when he walked up to the shelf and reached behind the books in question, Thursday night.

Boy, 15, Arrested in Threat On Life of James J. Phelan

Seized in Library Taking Bogus $500—Held for Mental Examination

MAN ADMITS KIDNAP
NOTE IN MARBLEHEAD

Two inspectors sent to the Boston public library last night with a package of bogus money supposed to represent $500 which had been demanded of James J. Phelan, prominent Boston banker, under penalty of death, were astounded when they entrapped a 15-year-old boy whom they believe to be the author of the threat.

Earlier in the day at Marblehead police had trapped a mentally deranged man who confessed he was the author of a $50,000 extortion note sent to State Senator Malcolm Bell, as well as other threatening notes mailed to prominent persons.

HIGH SCHOOL STUDENT

The boy who was arrested at the public library gave the name of Herbert D. Nutter, proved to be a ward of the Children's Aid Society and a student at the Sylvester high school and lives with Mrs. Maude A. Shears at 194 West Canton street. He will be examined for mental abnormality.

The note he is alleged to have sent to Mr. Phelan, member of the firm of Hornblower & Weeks and one of the most prominent Catholic laymen in the United States, read as follows:

JAMES J. PHELAN

On or before 10 P. M. Dec. 1

leave $500 sure in small notes behind the Paris directories in the open shelf room in Bates hall at the Boston public library or else you will suffer the penalty of death. P. S. $500 is a cheap price to pay for the life of a man.

It was written in a boyish scrawl. Inspectors Raymond Thayer and Robert McGooch were sent to the library with a package of false money which they placed behind the Paris directories soon after 8 P. M., after which they took books from the shelves and started to read with one eye on the shelf that held the Paris directories.

About 9 P. M. they were amazed to see a boy go directly to the shelf, remove the directories and take out the package. They arrested him at the door and took him to police headquarters to be questioned by James McDevitt, deputy superintendent of police, and Lt. John A. Dorsey.

Under questioning he broke down and cried loudly and long. Charged with being a suspicious person, he was finger printed and booked and was taken to the city prison for the night. Although he is a juvenile, under the law he is charged with suspicion of a felony and was held at the request of the arresting officer.

This morning he will be placed in a line-up at headquarters.

Although police were at first inclined to the belief he was the tool of a group of men, later they adopted the theory he alone was responsible for the extortion note and the plot.

Phelan's home is at 11 Chiswick road, Brookline, where his wife and three daughters also live.

Carol Singing at Branch Libraries

At the Parker Hill branch of the Boston Public Library carols will be sung by the Boys' Glee Club, including alumni and students, of the Mission Church High School, under the direction of Mrs. Anna Noonan, this evening, at 8:30. Weather permitting, the carol singers and trumpeters will be on the steps of the library on Tremont street. In the event of rain, snow or extreme cold, they will be in the auditorium of the branch.

The West End Branch Library is decorated with Christmas trees and greens contributed by the Junior League of Boston, immediately facing the front entrance is the beautiful Madonna of Nuremberg loaned by the courtesy of P. P. Caproni & Brother.

On Christmas Eve, at 8 o'clock, carols will be sung by children of St. Joseph's Parochial School, Harry E. Burroughs Newsboys' Foundation; members of the library staff, with violin accompaniment by Miss Dora Feldman and Miss Alina Askounth; Ford Hall folks; Polish Singing and Dramatic Society and boys of the West End House. A group of bell ringers trained by Mrs. Arthur A. Shurcliff will play carols.

Port of Boston Exhibit Shown at Public Library

The exhibition room of the fine arts department of the Boston Public Library, beginning today and continuing throughout the month, will be devoted to an exhibit pertaining to the Port of Boston. The exhibit, sponsored by the Boston Port Authority, includes a collection of old ship prints, photographs of activities in and about the harbor, models, flags of all steamship lines now serving the port and other material of interest.

Port Exhibit Opens in Public Library

A pictorial exhibit of port development at Boston over a long period of years has been arranged by the Boston Port Authority and was opened to the public this afternoon in exhibition room on the third floor of the Boston Public Library. Additions will be made to it during the next few days, as material is still being accumulated, and it will remain on show throughout January.

Practically all the available space in the room is used to display pictures, paintings, etchings, drawings, photographs illustrating some phase of port activity during the past two hundred years, and perhaps longer. There are vivid scenes of the harbor picturing the Boston tea party, paintings and posters of the modern ocean greyhounds, and of the water-front facilities which are of the best in Boston, even if they are not new being used to their fullest extent.

Considerable space is given to a layout of illustrations of the Commonwealth's dry dock in South Boston, and surrounding property developed in 1913. The Cunard Line, Anchor Line, Canadian National, White Star, Eastern Steamship, the Boston Towboat Company, which operates Boston's oldest towboat fleet; the Dollar line, and other steamship interests are well represented in the exhibit, and there are large ship models of the S.S. Saint John of the Eastern Steamship Company, the Georgic of the White Star Line, an old modern trawler built at Fore River, a fine model of Old Ironsides and a full-rigged model of the famous sailing ship the Flying Cloud of almost a century ago, which was built at East Boston. Industrial plants that make a part of the Boston development are represented among the pictures. Many of these enterprises have been loaned to the Boston Port Authority by individuals and by Boston bank and commercial and industrial houses, and are treasured highly by their owners. Ten show cases are well filled, and the wall space on the four walls are used for the larger displays, posters, and the galleries. The exhibit is open to the public free of charge and will remain there until the end of the month.

Ship Model Masterpiece on View in Port Show at Public Library

"City of Savannah" Built by Chief Engineer in Three Years

If you made this model steamship exactly 96 times larger, she would be the City of Savannah, one of the boats on the Savannah line now running from Boston to Savannah.

At present the model is among the exhibits at the Port show at the Boston Public Library. She is encased in a handsome glass case, the ship's bottom standing on brass supports inside the case.

NOTHING LACKING
Seafarers, experts in the art of building models, and landlubbers by the hundreds have clustered around this case and stared at the masterpiece of manual effort.

Increased to full size, nothing would be lacking aboard this ship as to rigging and outside gadgets to make her 100 per cent. "City of Savannah." She is built on a scale of one-eighth of an inch to a foot and the master mechanic, her creator, is also at present chief engineer of the City of Chattanooga of the same line. He has been sea 43 years, and spent three and more years building the model liner.

His name is Harry M. Wilson, and, if a capacity for infinite pains constitutes genius, he has it. One glance at the model and you no longer doubt that. The person who in two or even 10 years—could create the spick and span model now reposing in the case at the Library building possesses few rivals in the business of manual craft. Experts say so.

NOTHING TO CHANCE
The engineer chief left nothing to chance. With blueprints, with pencil and pad, he went over the Savannah, on which he was then chief, getting details of construction etched in his mind. Then he began methodically to "build up his ship." There were to be no mistakes for skeptics to point out with more or less disdain.

First-class marine architects and seafarers who came to pick flaws remained to study the vessel with something akin to awe.

The model, unlike the ordinary miniature of the kind, has been "built up" just as any ship, with the keel laid down in regulation fashion. The little steel plates overlap in their regulation series just as they do on the full-sized Savannah.

EVEN A FIRE LINE
The only things that were readymade for the task were a bit of fine brass chain and another of fly screen for deck gratings. Everything else was turned out under the fingers of the master builder.

All manner of nautical instruments are in evidence in their respective places. There is the propeller with the four blades fixed into the shaft, wheel, wheelhouse, fore chains, windlass, boats on davits, and hundreds of stanchion parts, cargo gear, booms, rigging blocks, tackle, even a fire line for the hydrants.

There are ventilators for the inside staterooms and angle irons around the edge of the deck hatchings into which wedges are driven to keep fast the water-tight canvas.

The ship, as completed, is 52 inches in length from stern to bow, and weighs 100 pounds.

MANY DIFFICULTIES
Sitting in with the maker of the model, he will tell you quite modestly that the task spread itself into many series of troubles. At work upon an exacting model of the kind is doubly difficult if carried on when a ship is rolling in the swells of the sea.

You have to make your model fast, and then, as the details of the building increase, the job of securing the vessel in a fixed position becomes more and more difficult if you are not to undo what has already been accomplished.

LOTS OF TALK
Then the engineer admits that the work all had to be done on time off and, though an engineer's time is his own, there are hours and days often when he is as busy as the proverbial bee.

Lastly, he tells you with a grin, there is all the talk which brother officers hand out as to the foolishness of any such work for an able seaman and officer.

"Sometimes you feel that you are really getting nowhere and sometimes, particularly along toward the end of a three-year task of this kind, you feel as if what you had done was utterly a work of nonsense."

Officials of the Savannah line have different things to say about the chief—things that might cause his sun-banned ears to redden. His model is one of the prized trophies of the company. Nothing like it has even been done before.

Wilson declares that he will never undertake any such manifold plan again. And yet, when he says it, his eyes light up and twinkle and the close student of seafarers knows that the urge is still there.

Side Show

Behind the big bronze doors at 10 1/4 Beacon street a woman is in charge. The Athenaeum, Boston's world-famous private public library, by one neat gesture has quietly refuted insinuations that it is "fossilized." Ellnor Gregory, capable, alert and obliging, has been appointed to succeed C. K. Bolton, retiring after 35 years of service as librarian.

The choice was an obvious one. For ten years she has been chief assistant to Bolton, and lately has practically run the place. But the action was absolutely unprecedented. Therefore it was supposed to be impossible. The reverberations of the shock are still echoing along the quieter reaches of Marlborough street, and down the back streets of the hill.

For the Athenaeum has always been considered a gentleman's library. Gentlemen's wives have only been freely admitted during the last 75 years. And for 20 years after it was founded, in 1807, no woman dared cross its threshold. As late as 1830 the librarian wrote, in protest to the trustees, that the presence of women "would occasion frequent embarrassment to modest men."

Now Ellnor Gregory inherits his chair. The split boxes which used to be filled with clean sand twice every week are gone. A notice on some of the tables warns men to take off their hats. It is no longer necessary to warn them to keep their feet off the tables. The world has changed a lot since the prosperous merchants of Boston founded their Athenaeum. And somewhat to the surprise of the world, the Athenaeum has changed with it.

The fourth floor belongs to Miss Gregory. It is filled with reference books, card catalogs, Shakespeare, and half a dozen attendants. It teems with life. And the whole is dominated by Miss Gregory. Her pleasant voice, with its distinctive foreign accent, is everywhere. Educated abroad, the daughter of one professor and the granddaughter of another, she is up to her job. She proves it by finding references for one old gentleman, and translating a page of German for another.

She is a woman of quick smile, and a little less than medium height. Decidedly not the angular, frigidly intellectual type. The militant feminists gain nothing by her elevation to an important post. The fact that she is a woman, succeeding to a chair which has been considered the prerogative of men, like the presidency of Harvard or the U. S. A., is forgotten in her interest in her work. The work is so much more important than the individual.

The great Back Bay mystery is solved at last.

For years the moisture was disappearing from the ground, the subterranean water level was showing an alarming tendency to sink. Residents of the section and trustees of big public buildings were deeply concerned. For nearly all the buildings of Back Bay were erected upon piles. These piles, chemically treated, resist water. But if the water sinks to expose the tops, decay sets in.

Ever since the Back Bay was filled in and building began upon it, engineers have watched the level of the underground water. When the dam was built to create the Charles river basin, when the Boylston street subway was built, and when various sewers were installed, the effect of these improvements upon the water level was an important consideration.

Only in recent years, however, has this level threatened to become a serious and costly nuisance. Since 1880 the height of the water had been recorded by means of test wells, many of them located in the cellars of buildings. When it became evident that the Public Library foundations were on the way to dangerous impairment, more of these reading wells were sunk in the basements of large buildings in the vicinity of Copley square.

City authorities set about further investigations, a group of engineers under the leadership of Prof. Norton of M. I. T. went to work on the problem, and private firms of engineers were engaged to seek a solution.

For under the Public Library, the lower water level had exposed the tops of the piles to the action of the air. The tops were rotting, leaving frail cones of wood, and in some cases gave no support whatever to the building. Readers will remember the light board fence which for many months surrounded the stone platform in front of the library. Behind the fence, the foundations of the front of the library were undergoing repair. The decayed tops were cut off and steel columns supported by concrete were put in their place.

The bill for these repairs ran to about $200,000, a sum sufficiently alarming to owners of other buildings to cause immediate action. Members of Trinity Church, fearing that they, too, would have to undergo the expense of recapping the piles that support the building, became involved in the mystery of the sinking water level. In July, 1929, two large test wells were sunk in the basement to discover the condition of the piles. This work alone cost about $1200. The pits disclosed that the piles under the northeast and southwest piers were in sound condition, but that some decay had begun on the pile heads under the east wall of the south transept. Then six test wells, costing $240, were sunk around the church. The plot thickened. It was discovered that the ground water level was not uniform. It was higher on the north side than on the south. Where was the water running to, and what was draining it away?

Mr. Robert Treat Paine, chairman of the committee in charge of the work, explains that at this point several possible causes were suspected. One was the checking of the filtration of the water from Charles river basin into the Back Bay territory. Another was the prevention by the Boylston street subway of a flow of ground water from the north side of the subway to the south side. Syphons under the subway were considered; another plan was to install a large conduit to bring water from the basin to the Copley square territory; still another to discharge into that territory a great quantity of water pumped out by the subway at Church street. But a chart showed that the ground water level rose very markedly after heavy rain falls; soon it dropped sharply away again. Therefore the immediate object became, not to bring more water in, but to find out why the water ran out so rapidly.

An old abandoned drain was suspected. It was of the wooden box type. It runs from Arlington street, along Providence street under Trinity Church and the Public Library. Was this drain the guilty party?

Once again the readings of the test wells were consulted. There are 150 of these wells in the Back Bay section, and from their readings the whole tendency of the ground water level may be plotted. A mass of findings have been made. There are huge charts with series of lines which shoot up in Himalayan fashion and then descend into the valleys like a 1930 production curve. There are maps of the Copley square section with lines showing high and low water levels. Mr. X. Henry Good-nough, Boston engineer, and his colleague, Mr. B. F. Snow, have prepared these graphic surveys of the situation at the request of Trinity Church.

The charts established the fact that the old box drain was innocent, for the water level was higher near this drain than at distances somewhat away from it. It was another false clue.

Four other possible causes presented themselves. In recent years a deep drain had been laid to carry off the water from the Boston & Albany road bed. Could this be the reason? There are a number of sump pumps in the basements of buildings in the vicinity, some of which operate at low levels.

The building department the city was consulted, and a map of the location of 26 of these sumps, with their levels and capacities, was obtained. And one institution in the neighborhood was pumping out of the ground and devoting to its own use some 10,000 gallons a day. There were two sets of pumps of the Boston Elevated, which sometimes took out as much as 100,000 gallons.

All these things were investigated, although the work was somewhat complicated by the fact that the Public Library was at the time pumping out water so that the repair of its pile heads might be carried on, and the proposed Professional Arts building in the rear of the Copley-Plaza was also pumping to facilitate construction work.

Meanwhile, the water was below the level of the Trinity pile heads, and it seemed necessary to do something about it, even though the cause had not yet been discovered. So the rain-water conduits were disconnected from the city sewer pipes and turned into deep dry wells or trenches in the cellar of the building, that the water might help to keep moist the vast forest of piles.

Last May four more test wells were sunk along St. James avenue, and later with the co-operation of the city, four more wells were sunk in places where Trinity had no jurisdiction. The readings of the new wells were co-ordinated and classified. Where data were incomplete, more holes were made.

Finally the lines of the charts and maps told a clear story. All the suspected causes mentioned above were exonerated. The evidence pointed to some cause lying in St. James avenue and Dartmouth street.

A conference was called between owners of estates in the Copley square section and officials of the city sewer department. As a result, the chase grew hotter, and a suggestion made by Frederick A. Lovejoy, engineer of design of the sewer department, brought about what is expected to be a successful solution.

Since the charts showed that water disappeared in the vicinity of St. James avenue and Dartmouth street, attention was directed to the sewer which runs down beneath the avenue, turns an elbow corner at Dartmouth street, and proceeds in front of the library to Boylston street. It was Mr. Lovejoy's suggestion that a dam be installed in the sewer at a point near the corner of Dartmouth and Boylston streets. This was done. A concrete bulkhead was installed, the top four feet above sea level. It can be raised higher, if necessary, and a valve arrangement beneath provides for periodical flushing.

The dam was closed on Jan. 5. Many anxious property owners awaited the result. On the very next day it was apparent that the culprit had at last been unmasked. Readings all over the section showed that the ground water level was rising. Since then it has proceeded in a steady upward curve for all the readings in the Copley square section. Best of all, it is known definitely that the dam was the cause of this return to normalcy.

READING AND GAME ROOMS OPENED TODAY

City-Wide Program for the Benefit of Unemployed

For the benefit of unemployed men and women in the various sections of Boston 11 free reading rooms in municipal buildings and libraries were opened at 10 o'clock this morning. These places are in charge of the City.

MILTON E. LORD

Wide Emergency Committee on Health and Recreation of which Park Commissioner William P. Long is chairman.

There are also in some of the buildings rooms where a variety of games may be enjoyed or where persons may piece together jig-saw puzzles. Newspapers, magazines and other reading matter have been contributed.

There are two municipal buildings in the South End and others in the West End, South Boston, East Boston, Dorchester, Charlestown, Roxbury, Jamaica Plain, Hyde Park and Roslindale.

Milton E. Lord, director of the Boston Public Library, and chairman of the reading and quiet-game room committee, said "The Public Library of the city of Boston and other neighboring libraries are cooperating in this comprehensive program of activities, especially in the provision of reading material and games for the municipal rooms and in the registration of those attending the afternoon educational courses at the Old South Meeting House."

Mr. Lord is assisted by Richard G. Hensley, assistant to the director of the Boston Public Library, and Pierce E. Buckley of Bates Hall, Public Library. The branch directors include: Mary P. Curley, North End; Fanny Goldstein, West End; Clara L. Maxwell, South End; Edith Guerrier, supervisor of branches; Charles Knowles Bolton, librarian Boston Athenaeum; Alfred Claghorn Potter, librarian at Harvard College; Edward H. Redstone, librarian of the State Library; Howard L. Stebbins, librarian of the Social Law Library; and Rev. William J. Sullivan, S. J., librarian of Boston College.

Activities started Tuesday at the gymnasium in the municipal buildings, and at the swimming pools at Cabot, Roxbury, and in Curtis Hall, Jamaica Plain. The schedules have been extended to 10 to 2 p.m. daily except Sunday, Mondays and Thursdays the gymnasiums and pools are reserved for women, and the other days of the week for the men.

READERS' ARMY GROWING FAST

Increase in Public Library
Patrons Amazing, Says
Director Lord

NON-FICTION BOOKS MOST IN DEMAND

By ELIZABETH BORTON

The great reading room of the Boston Public Library, Bates Hall, was pervaded by a busy silence; nothing could be heard but the rustling of pages, the squeaking of pencils and pens making notes, the occasional tinkle of a female bracelet, and the faint but unmistakable grating and grinding of mental wheels within wheels.

Underneath those dozens of green lamps are many bent backs and bowed heads; on those dozens of heavy tables are many opened books. What are they? What is everyone reading? Let's see. Silent as mice, let's creep from table to table, breathing down necks and looking over shoulders, writing industriously on our cuffs.

Here is a stout lady who paused not to take off her imitation-imitation seal, or to loosen her scarf, or to remove her leatherette gloves, so feverish was she to get into the Massachusetts Decennial Census of 1915.

PORES OVER ENGLAND

There is a middle-aged rather shabby man, with thick mud on the soles of his shoes, and a fuzz at the edges of his cuffs and his shirt collar, who takes his pipe-and-glasses out of a case and adjusts them with an air. He lifts a scholarly hand and tenderly turns the pages of Dibellus's "England."

A young lady in a green knitted dress, with a racoon coat over the back of her chair, and on her brow a furrow which has been ploughed there by thought, is absorbed in Havard's "Military Hygiene."

There is a man obviously studying. Every line of his heavy, earnest, laboring face indicates concentration and earnestness. His calloused hands, with enlarged knuckles and broken nails, hold open a copy of "The Job, The Man, and The Boss."

Pierce Buckley, who is in charge of Bates Hall, at the suggestion of Milton Lord, the director of the Boston Public Library, checked through the cards in Bates Hall to see what type of books had been called for all day. Out of dozens which had been given out for reading at the tables, only two were fiction.

The rest fell generally into the following classes: general biography, American biography, English biography, French biography, economics and sociology, English history, American history, the World War, genealogy, and the classics of literature, especially foreign literary classics in translation.

INCREASE AMAZING

"There has been an amazing increase in the amount of reading done, according to library statistics, since the beginning of the depression," says Mr. Lord. In 1929, 43 per cent. of our readers were adult; the other 57 per cent. were children. At present the figures are exactly reversed—57 per cent. are adult and 43 per cent. children.

"In public libraries all over the country, an increase in the amount of reading done by the American people since 1929 amounts to an average of 37 per cent. In Boston we have noticed an increase of 43 per cent. Thirty-five per cent. of that increase has occurred during the last two years. And in our month-by-month compilations of the numbers of our borrowers, we observe a steady increase."

"This means, for one thing, that people are reading generally and widely—rather than in any one field. It means that they are not reading late fiction or new books, because libraries themselves have felt the depression in the funds they can spend, and very few new books are being bought."

The Boston Post

FOREST HILLS LIBRARY

To the Editor of the Post:

Sir—A careful check recently disclosed that the people of Forest Hills have been trying for nearly 30 years to get a library with no results. Prior to each election in Ward 19, candidates make promises but when successful are not heard from again. It's a disgrace to the city when we consider small children walking to Roslindale or Curtis Hall during the inclement weather, to procure books that they must use in connection with their school work.

Up to the time of the depression the people were fed up with numerous empty promises, but in the last couple of years the smoke screen of depression and lack of funds is used in an effort to quiet a disturbed people. There was money enough to build an elaborate library on Centre street, notwithstanding the fact there was a library at Boylston street and another near Curtis Hall, also Roslindale and Brighton. Each time we questioned this we were given the same old line: "Forest Hills will be next." Evidently the people in those districts refused to take no for an answer. How much longer are the people of Forest Hills going to put up with this nonsense?

Samuel A. B. Abbott Died Today in Rome

A cable message announces the death today in Rome, Italy, of Samuel Appleton Brown Abbott, formerly of Boston, who has made his home in the "Villa Lontana," on the Ponte Milvio, in Rome, where since the late nineties he had lived. He had been ill during the past month.

Mr. Abbott was born in Lowell on March 6, 1846, the son of the late Hon. Josiah Gardner Abbott and Caroline (Livermore) Abbott. He was educated at Harvard University, where he was graduated in 1866, A. B., and where he received his A. M. degree in 1872. Following his graduation he studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1868 and then began to practice his chosen profession in Boston.

Mr. Abbott served here as police commissioner for two years, from 1887, and as trustee of the Boston Public Library from 1879 until 1892. He was president of the board from 1889 until 1894 and from 1890 was acting librarian for four years.

Other interests which occupied Mr. Abbott were his membership in the American Institute of Architects, also of the Boston Society of Architects and the Loyal Legion. His clubs included the Somerset and Harvard in Boston and the Porcellian, as well as the Century in New York and University in that city. In his church affiliations Mr. Abbott was an Episcopalian. He served as a director of the American Academy in Rome from 1897 until 1903.

Mr. Abbott married on May 21, 1869, Mary Goddard of Boston. Following her death, he married on Oct. 15, 1878, Abby Frances Woods of Providence, R. I. Mr.

NON-FICTION LEADS

"Most of this increased reading is being done in the non-fiction field. Through some careful observation, I have reached the conclusion that about half of it takes the form of study. Whenever a civil service examination is announced, we have an immediate and heavy call for books in the subjects of the examinations. Many people, obviously, are trying to ground themselves in new professions, and new skills. Some of them, undoubtedly unemployed, are trying to find guidance toward and preparation for new jobs."

"As is always the case, a great many people who read in public libraries come here for solace—for more than mere entertainment or to pass the time. They expect their reading to restore something of what life and experience have robbed them of. But this reading is more in the field of philosophy and the classics than in the field of light fiction or new books. We have had, since the depression, an extraordinary increase in reading on religion."

"These observations are based not only on figures from our central library, which has become in many respects a reference library, but also on figures from our branches."

Talking It Over with Unusual Bostonians

This is the second in a series of interviews with interesting and unusual residents of Greater Boston. Another will follow next Sunday.

By ELIZABETH BORTON

There are a good many people who do not know that the scholarly and lively articles which appear regularly in the Boston Public Library Bulletin "More Books" are written by a man who went into library work 10 years ago in order to learn English, a tongue with which he was not familiar, though he knew well a number of others. He is Zoltan Haraszti, Hungarian by birth, a former writer and journalist in Budapest, now in charge of the library publications and of the library treasure room of rare books.

But he's not an old-style bibliographer—a "dry as bones," hidden-away scholar, deep behind thick glasses, blowing the dust off pages of blurred print. My aim as editor of "More Books," said he yesterday over the proofs of his next edition, "is to acquaint the public with the resources of the library. No, in a merely desultory manner, but in a series of well-considered articles on books and phases of literature which the library can supply. I strive to keep my finger on the pulse of public interest, and in this my journalistic training comes to my assistance. The news-paper-trained writer is always conscious of the public, and of what is likely to interest it."

"When I am tired of a subject, such as my recent series of studies on Dryden, I assume that the public may be too, so I drop it for a time. In my next issue of 'More Books,' for example, I shall print the hitherto unpublished comments of John Adams on the Abbe de Mably, an 18th century French philosopher."

SCOPE OF THE WORK

The bulletin contains, besides Mr. Haraszti's literary and bibliographical essays, notes on current books, and on other library matters, as well as a classified list of new books. It therefore serves as a comprehensive guide to the library. Such is the public interest in "More Books" that, though it is issued on the first of every month, the edition is frequently exhausted before the 20th, and back numbers are always in demand.

Mr. Haraszti was for some time a political writer and literary and dramatic critic for one of the largest Budapest papers; after that, editor of another. Before he was 28 he was well known in Hungary for his essays and other contributions to literary periodicals.

No. 2—Zoltan Haraszti

"I always felt two ambitions," he said, "though my family insisted upon my taking my degrees as a lawyer. I wanted to be a teacher, and I wanted to write. As editor of a library bulletin in which essays designed for scholars I fulfil something of both ambitions. I am present recognized as one of the foremost American authorities on 15th century literature. Mr. Haraszti, at- tributes his mounting reputation to the opportunities afforded him by his work. In the last seven years he has prepared articles covering an astonishingly wide variety of subjects—from Americana to essays on art and archeology and to studies of such poets as Paul Claudel and Emily Dickinson. He has written about dime novels and about Washington's army. About an early Franciscan breviary and about Daniel Webster. Yet, no matter how specialized the subject, it is always couched in terms understandable and interesting to the layman. One can see people on trolley cars reading his articles on the first editions of "Paradise Lost" or his deftly written notes on new books, while constantly to the library comes a stream of appreciative letters from scholars in libraries and universities all over Europe and the United States.

"The Boston Public Library was founded before many of the great university libraries came into being in this country," he said, "and as such it fell heir to the splendid libraries of such men as Edward Everett, Theodore Parker, George Ticknor, and others. We have here one of the finest collections of Shakespeareana in the world; an exceptionally rich Spanish collection; a fine body of Americana, including two copies of the original Bay Psalm Book, the first book printed in America; a first folio of Shakespeare; a large number of the original Shakespeare quartos, and many other treasures.

Since Mr. Haraszti knew and had written so exhaustively about many of the library's rare books, it was natural that when, three years ago, the treasure room was opened to the public, he should be placed in charge of it, and should be selected to arrange the exhibits of the library treasures there. The exhibits and his articles in "More Books" run parallel with each other, the one supplementing, explaining and enhancing the other. He lectures frequently in the treasure room, to visiting students or professional groups, the find for his talks being great, since he combines an accurate and interesting memory with a scholar's taste and the journalist's sure sense of what is likely to catch and hold attention."

A tall figure in a long black coat, a wide-brimmed gray hat crushed down over his extraordinarily thick, curling brown hair, he is to be seen at concerts, at plays, or walking along the streets of Boston, his head sunken on his chest in deep thought, a smouldering cigar between the small tight fingers of his ring hand. His face is large, sharply aquiline, with bold but delicately cut features, his glance at once reserved and candid.

At the library he has a small study underneath the great central stairway—there, surrounded by books, he reads, considers, writes.

His office is not unsuited to his scholarly, almost monastic work in pouring over old volumes. It is a small room, with a vaulted low ceiling, and the wide open window to the patio gives him a glimpse of the old-world Renaissance court, reminding him of the libraries of Europe. Or you may see him, crouched over a table in the Barren-Ticknor room, annotating and correcting proofs.

Mr. Haraszti feels that his work—"More Books"—is in keeping with the character of the Boston Public Library itself.

"The Boston Public Library is different from other public libraries in that it is very rich in rare book collections," he said. "There are indeed very few university libraries which could compete with the rare books department of the Boston Public Library. The institution, too, is patronized by many persons interested in scholarly research and study."

"Boston has a tradition of learning and culture in its library. I appreciate and love this tradition, and it is my hope to preserve it in the treasure room as well as in the library bulletin."

Hint for Book-borrowers

AWHILE ago the Boston Public Library, one of our favorite institutions, had a "fine-cancellation" week. People who had had books out so long that they were afraid to show their faces in the library or unable to pay the accumulated fines, were notified that all would be forgiven if they would only bring the books back. It worked. Books came rolling in with joyful thumps from all parts of the literate world. We forget the exact figures. The amount of fines wiped out was of course far in excess of the value of the books retrieved. But most of the fines would never have been collected anyway, and the books are back at work. Besides, many a person who thought himself an exile from the library can now enter its portals with head held high and dip into its treasures with an untroubled hand. And—we were going to say something about the relief to so many consciences, but had a book-borrower ever any conscience?

Which gives us an idea—why not have a National Book-return Week for the benefit of private as well as public libraries? We ourselves have several books belonging to the neighbors which we've kept so long that we're ashamed to take them back. In a general and well-advertised orgy of exchange we'd muster up courage and do it. Likewise we remember wistfully certain well-loved volumes of our own, lent to So-and-so in a burst of enthusiasm and regretted these many months. Books are not like Mary's lamb. Leave them alone and they never come home. Wouldn't it be a graceful act of expiation if some flagrant habitual procrastinating book-snitcher would start the movement for a National Book-return Week?

Stained Glass Exhibit Boston Public Library

Boston, as we have frequently remarked in these columns, has long been recognized as a centre for ecclesiastical art in the United States. In the field of stained glass it is especially notable. This contention of ours is proved once more by the exhibition of stained glass, executed by Reynolds, Francis and Rohstock, local craftsmen, which opens tomorrow in the Fine Arts Department of the Boston Public Library. This exhibition, which will remain open for three weeks, is held in connection with an illustrated lecture on "The Story of Stained Glass Told in Color" to be given by Joseph G. Reynolds, Jr., in the Lecture Hall of the library on Thursday, March 23, at 8:30 P. M.

The reason that Boston has become known as a centre for the art of stained glass is obvious. This city has long been famed as the home of many of the leading church architects of this country. Under their patronage there has arisen a distinct Boston school of stained glass workers. Examples of their windows may be found not only locally but in ecclesiastical edifices throughout the nation as library officials announce.

The work in this exhibition is a record of achievements by this one Boston group. The exhibition consists of original designs, drawings, and stained glass panels for windows in college chapels, churches and cathedrals. An international note is introduced by photographs, designs, and a replica of one of the windows for the American Memorial Cemetery Chapel at Belleau Wood, Belleau, France. In addition there are water color sketches as well as photographs and color reproductions of ancient windows in Old World cathedrals.

One of the outstanding ecclesiastical building projects of our time is the great Cathedral of St. John the Divine on Morningside Heights, New York City, Crann & Ferguson architects. When it came to the question of designing and making the permanent windows, the cathedral authorities turned to Boston artists and craftsmen.

The theme of one window is "Healing, Physical and Spiritual," and it is to be placed in the so-called Medical Bay. The subjects in the central circular medallions are Biblical in character and they show forth Christ's Miracles of Healing. The subordinate semi-circular medallions depict outstanding personages in medical history from the time of the ancient Egyptian Imhotep, the first physician whose name still survives, to Edith Cavell, Red Cross nurse in the World War. The subjects are clearly defined against the background and will be easily legible from the floor of the nave. The distinguishing characteristic of this window when finally installed will be its wealth of glowing color. The dominating reds and blues will admit a flood of glorified light to aid in creating the spiritual atmosphere appropriate to a great cathedral.

Another salient feature of the exhibit is a replica of a section of the Scholars' window, one of the series of ten nave aisle windows which this studio designed and made for the Riverside Church, the so-called Rockefeller Church, New York City. The replica of the central window for the Apse of the American Memorial Cemetery Chapel at Belleau Wood, France, completes the actual stained glass which is to be on view.

On the east wall are to be found charcoal drawings for seven of the nave aisle windows for the Colorado College done in the same vigorous spirit as others for this chapel mentioned below; a stimulating large scale drawing in brilliant color of the music window for the Riverside Church, New York City; the figure of an angel symbolizing religious aspiration, the central panel of the children's window in the Second Church in Newton, Mass., and the graciously drawn Mother and Child forming the central panel of the children's window in the First Congregational Church, Winchester, Mass.

High on the south wall and by reason of size and position dominating the room, are being shown the cartoons of a rose window for Colorado College Chapel.

The subjects are great teachers of the arts from Alcibiades of the eighth century to Comenius of the 17th century. These drawings are worthy of nation.

It will give several numbers on the national reputation. Karl Feldman will be to soloist, famed for his singing. Mrs. Hall, Melrose Highlands, and Mrs. Hall, former concert and orchestra singer, and the past two years in the chairman of the Melrose Highlands Club.

Youth Divides The Week-End With Maturity

Vitalized Chamber-Concert by The Manhattan Four. Strauss Again

FOUR CHAIRS, set in a row across the otherwise empty platform of the Lecture Hall, awaited the audience for the chamber concert at the Public Library last evening. At eight o'clock four youngish men from New York—Messrs. Weinstein, Danziger, Shaler and Edel as the Manhattan String Quartet—rearranged those chairs into crescent-shape; seated themselves; withdrew more ado than the usual bows to the auditorium, began to play the Quartet in C minor which is number four in Beethoven's Opus 18. So far as they were concerned, there might never have been music-stands and sheets of notes to be opened upon them. Consequently no squaring, turning or close following of outspread pages. In the heads of the four was Beethoven's quartet; from those heads they also played it. So likewise with the two short pieces that followed: An Interlude in the Ancient Style which is one of Glazunov's "Five Novelettes"; a Rondo in B-flat major out of a quartet by Mozart. So, finally, in Debussy's one and only Quartet for Strings.

Beyond doubting, there was a sense of direct communication between players and audience, hardly to be gained when there are intervening music-stands and sheets of ruled and printed staves. Likely enough, the Manhattan four played with a freedom they might have lacked had their eyes and minds been following those pages. Certainly this departure from custom brought into a chamber-concert an air of youth, independence and innovation. Such concerts run always the risk of over-performed performance. Minor rebellions from routine were also to be noted: a short program; a detached movement from a whole quartet; bows sitting in answer to intermediate applause.

The Manhattan Quartet, as schooled by Mr. Kortschak in and since their days at the Neighborhood School of Music, makes a sensitive and admirably reciprocating ensemble. In mature quartets the second violin sometimes falls of its just place. Among these young men it loses no opportunity that the composer may proffer. Neither the first violin nor the violoncello tends to overdo its part. The timbre of the viola is never covered. A pleasing euphony, whether two, three or all four instruments are playing, also distinguishes the newcomers. Throughout the concert, their tone held to the golden mean of quartet-playing, neither thick, coarse nor driven, neither thin, calculated nor over-refined. Nowhere was it dried and dull; everywhere it was vitalized into warmth and motion. (Resonant always was the chording.) A mutual sensibility shaped, conducted, colored, it. A mutual understanding had agreed to pace, accent, gradation and transition until each seemed a common impulse, at once sure and plastic.

Four minds, four temperaments, eight ears and eight hands, stood agreed upon the music before them. So fortified, they played in every number with the imparting freedom that is born of just confidence. There are string quartets that refine upon refinement until there is no juice left in either the piece or the playing. Others that at every stroke must make the bows bite the strings, would have every measure seethe with "expression." These young men overdo neither vigor nor finesse. A true instinct for music first grasped, then sounded, directed them.

The approach of the Manhattan Quartet to the pieces in hand, the sum of their accomplishment, also praised them. The quartet in C minor passes for the gravest and the most personal of Beethoven's youthful six. Unmistakably a vein of seriousness recurs in it; while it loses nothing elsewhere of the freshness and the lightness of the other five. The young gentlemen from New York set light hands to the two middle movements, Scherzo and Minuet, kept to well-judged pace and sufficient formality. They were as apt with the vigors and amplitude of the first movement, clearly prefiguring a maturer Beethoven, with the finale in which there is less hint of salon-piece and of the olden style than of an individually expansive Beethoven.

From Glazunov's Interlude the four caught its mannered grace. In the Mozartean Rondo they were light and animated, precise and sparkling, to the ear's content. With Debussy's Quartet there were no subliming, no tinkling, no pursuit of an evanescent music. To these young men substance maintained it; while form shaped it. Upon both, to their minds and ears, were the harmonic dress and the instrumental timbres laid. The first movement, and still more the finale, they played with characterizing breadth and freedom, vitalizing inclusiveness of rhythm and modulation. The deftness and vividness of the Scherzo nowhere escaped them; while from the Andantino, they drew the quality that we name beauty, that the French call pathos, that by either term is a poetry of tones. These youthful virtuosos heard Debussy freshly and directly, through no mistle of precedent or tradition; were as sympathetic toward a Beethoven of another century but of their own age. . . . A concert of youth has its interest and stimulation, though more than half the audience be middle-aged. Nor is it frequent opportunity in a city where "old favorites"—with assured audiences—too often possess the stage.

Saturday Excitements

Trust the evening audience for appreciation—to use a bookish word—at the Symphony Concerts. At the end of Strauss's "Don Quixote" on Saturday, there was long, insistent applause to recall Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Platigorsky, to summon Mr. Lefranc from his usual seat in the orchestra where he had played the viola of Sancho Panza as characteristically as the guest had played the violoncello of the knight. Once and twice the three made their acknowledgments; finally at the third recall the orchestra joined them. And becomingly. Though the performances of last season were remarkable, the performances of last week excelled them. Dr. Koussevitzky set a light hand to Strauss's music. Above all, he would have it transparent, so that the listener might miss nothing of the total narrative and the tonal characterization. Above all, he would keep it musical, since by its musical quality it intensifies the one and colors the other. Only to very old men is "Don Quixote" still a piece in which sheep beat in the brass and a wind machine from the theater is added for a moment to the orchestra. We others have forgotten both.

For us the tone-poem is a masterpiece of characterization that penetrates the listening mind and at will, as in the night-vigil or the death-scene, may also touch the heart. It is also a masterpiece of narration, not because it defines every adventure that the variations attempt, but because it wraps them all in the atmosphere of the age of chivalry as from Cervantes onward succeeding generations have looked back on it. With Don Quixote, how exalted and how deluded, how deep-seated and how futile! Nowhere else has Strauss exceeded the invention and resource by which the development of the music, the definition of the personages, the progress of the narrative go hand in hand. In no other tone-poem is he so rich in atmosphere, so abundant in imagination. Read "Don Quixote" musically, as Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Platigorsky, Mr. Lefranc and the orchestra did; read it imaginatively and projectively as they also did, and it cannot fail. Once more two audiences were the witnesses. . . . Years on, there will be additions to the book that recounts the history of the Symphony Orchestra through its fiftieth year. They will not overlook Dr. Koussevitzky's versions of the four longer tone-poems of Strauss. H. T. P.

Manhattan String Quartet

In the lecture hall of the Boston Public Library, last night, a concert was given by the Manhattan String Quartet (MM. Rachmael Weinstein and Harris Danziger, Julius Shaler and Oliver Edel). The concert—one of those made possible by the beneficence of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge—was largely attended and warmly applauded.

These young players, brought together and coached at the Neighborhood Music School of New York by Mr. Hugo Kortschak, perform in public without recourse to the printed notes. Whether the liberation of the player's attention from the necessity of turning pages fully compensates musically for the inevitably added slightly apprehensive tension must remain in doubt.

Certainly yesterday's performance betrayed no hesitations and revealed a finesse of ensemble which players unable to keep so constantly watchful an eye upon one another might not so quickly have attained. By the same token, however, it hinted, here and there, at the danger of falling into an over-meticulous preoccupation with mechanical delicacies of precision, with loss of vitality at the music's core. Yet these signs were not so numerous as to impair the extraordinarily favorable impression given by the concert as a whole. In Beethoven's C minor Quartet, opus 18, No. 4, in Debussy's Quartet and in two shorter fragments, Glazunov's "Interludium in modico-antico" from his Five Novelettes, on 15, and Mozart's B flat Rondo (K. 159), the group played with admirable intelligence and spirit, with tone that could be keen-edged and firm, or warm and flexible. Their quick response to changes of mood and feeling, the wide scale of their tone palette, stamped them as a quartet to be reckoned with.

Most successful in conveying the dark beauty, the tenderness, the terse vigor and dry humor of Beethoven's quartet, they failed to clarify sufficiently the sharply etched and acidulous first movement of Debussy's. The fault was partly one of balance: the first violin failed to bite clearly enough above the heavy chords of the supporting instruments. Yet the Andantino was played with an enchanting perfection of balance, with an unbelievably delicate beauty of muted tone that restored the listener's confidence that here was a quartet of exceptional attainment and promise.

CITY EMPLOYEES TO GET PAY CUT OF 5 TO 15 P. C.

Curley Announces Sliding Scale—Workers Charge
Discrimination

14 P. C. SAVING ON PAYROLL SEEN

Mayor Curley yesterday announced that as soon as he receives legislative authorization he will cut the wages of all city and county employees on a sliding scale of 5, 10 and 15 per cent.

His statement on the classes affected and the savings to be made follows:

1—Where the rate of pay or compensation on an annual basis is less than $1000, a reduction of 5 per cent. shall be made.

2—Where the rate of pay or compensation on an annual basis is between $1000 and $1600 a reduction of 10 per cent. shall be made, but no compensation in this group shall be reduced below $950.

3—Where the rate of pay or compensation on an annual basis is in excess of $1600 a reduction of 15 per cent. shall be made, but no compensation in this group shall be reduced below $1440.

It is estimated that the above schedule of reductions will result in the course of a year in payroll savings of $5,000,000. A division of this amount according to the budgets affected is as follows:

City	$2,675,000
Schools	1,930,000
County	295,000
Loans and spec. approp.	100,000

$5,000,000

Official records revealing the classification of city and county employees

City Employees to Get Pay Cut Of 5 to 15 P. C., Mayor Reports

show that 6113 of a total of 18,537 receive $1600 or less per year; 1293 are paid from $1601 to $3000; 1301 and the salary class between $3001 and $4500 and 243 receive in excess of $4500. Mayor Curley proposed to effect a payroll saving of 14 per cent. by an assessment of 5 and 10 per cent. on the salaries of 6113 and an assessment of 15 per cent. on the salaries of 12,424.

The mayor's statement making the reductions contingent on adoption by the Legislature of the Parkman bill, which vests him with the power to cut salaries only for the remainder of the current year, said that "the salary and wage schedule herein determined upon shall not continue in effect for a longer period than salary and wage schedule revisions adopted and applying to state employees."

The bill, however, authorizes the mayor to reduce salaries for only the balance of the current year.

15 P. C. MAXIMUM

In setting the maximum reduction at 15 per cent. the mayor refused to comply with demands for a range of from 5 to 25 per cent. Representations that he had determined to accede to such demands proved yesterday to have been no more than "feelers" calculated to produce spurious reaction.

The mayor's decision created an immediate uproar among employees whose compensation is in the range between $1600 and $2000 to which was added the voluble roar of protest of the employees who must accept a 10 per cent. cut.

Charges of discrimination and favoritism to the highest paid officials were hurled at the mayor by employees of practically every department. Policemen and firemen were quick to make known their protests and the imposition on the salary of every member of the police and fire departments of the same percentage of cut to be applied to officials receiving from $3000 to $12,000 per year started a political bonfire which threatened to develop into open rebellion.

The error made by the mayor in announcing that his order would remain effective as long as the reductions of state salaries continue was immediately made the basis for the charge that the mayor was unaware of the authority which the Parkman bill contemplates should be given him.

SEEN AS CAMPAIGN ISSUE

Almost simultaneously with the mayor's announcement, city employees who were cognizant of the phraseology of the Parkman bill, predicted that the salary cutting will become one of the chief issues in the coming mayoralty campaign.

The bill provides that Mayor Curley may reduce salaries for the balance of the current year but leaves to his successor the determination of the question of continuing the reductions in 1934.

The bill authorizing reductions in the salaries of state employees limits the time in which they will be effective to Nov. 30, 1934.

In determining the classes of employees to be affected by the reduction order, the mayor made no discrimination between policemen who have been denied an annual step rate increase of $100 for the past three years and the patrolmen who have been receiving the maximum salary of $2100.

On the basis of the mayor's estimate of an annual salary saving of $5,000,000 the actual drop in payroll disbursements, for a period of nine months will be approximately $3,700,000. To April 1, city and county employees have had deducted from their compensation $600,000 as voluntary contributions to the maintenance of the welfare department. The mayor's figures disclose a total payroll saving for the full year of $4,300,000, or about $1,700,000 in excess of the amount which would have been added to the welfare department fund by the continuance of the contributory system.

As soon as salary reductions become effective, the deductions from salaries for the welfare department will be terminated.

Theodosia E. Macurdy Once with Boston Public Library

Miss Theodosia E. Macurdy, who was for many years head of the ordering department in the Boston Public Library, is dead at 248 Edgell road, Framingham Centre.

After her retirement from the Boston Public Library she lived with her sister, Professor Grace Macurdy, at Vassar College. Since her illness she had resided with her cousin, Miss Amelia Hayes, at her sanitarium in Framingham. Besides her sister, Professor Grace Macurdy of Vassar, Miss Macurdy is survived by a brother, John O. Macurdy of Ohio, and a number of nephews and nieces.

She was a direct descendant of Governor William Bradford, Governor Brewster, Rev. John Avery of Truro, Simon Baxter, and many other notable Colonial folk.

Mr. Lord, who was maintenance expert at the Whitall Associates Carpet Mills here, last June was married in Gloucester to Mrs. Gertrude Rollins, socially prominent there.

Mr. Lord ranked high in Masonic circles.

was also a member of the and Compass Club of Boston, the Worcester Engineering Society, the American Society of Safety Engineers and had served on the Governor's committee on street and highway safety. He had held office in state and national safety organizations, and during the war served in the engineer corps and the quartermaster corps.

LIBRARY AS BAROMETER

The statistics of the Boston Public Library provide a barometer for an estimate not only of the reading habits but of the social trends of the population served by our library system.

The figures show that since 1929 there has been a gain of 42 per cent. in the borrowing of books for home use in the whole library system. The change began with only a 5 per cent. increase in 1930 over 1929, but the next year the figure was 14 per cent. above 1930, and 1932 was 19 per cent. in advance of 1931. Similar reports come from libraries elsewhere. Moreover, in the first quarter of the present year, there has been a local circulation increase of 30 per cent. over the corresponding period last year.

The most striking change of the last three years is the reversal of the ratio between adult book borrowers and children. In 1929 there were 57 children and only 43 adults in every 100 borrowers. Last year these percentages were precisely reversed. This may be due in part to the fact that grown persons have more time to read, but it signifies also that books are being used less for pleasure and more for profit.

There has been a marked turning of late years to the study of the social sciences. The Kirstein Memorial or business branch in City Hall avenue, which is intended entirely for serious investigators, had an average daily attendance of 608 in January, 1931, 806 in 1932, and about 1000 last January. As a matter of course the unemployed scan the dailies in the newspaper room at Copley square, but elsewhere are many persons intent upon self-improvement.

IN the Central Park controversy we are definitely on the side of the art or "New York Times" group, and against the Sheehy or "sandlot" group. We are against ballfields on the site of the old reservoir. The old reservoir should have been left alone anyway.

instead of being turned first into a jungle and then into a battleground. To reclaim it for baseball-players sounds to us like the beginning of the end (first up!), and Mr. Sheehy seems to have a rather sketchy idea of the purpose of park space. Forgive us for mentioning Boston again in this department, but Boston has a more civilized attitude about parks than we have—in Boston they have free books in the Common. You can help yourself to a book from the stands, and sit down to read on a bench. Even tramps like it; they lie down for a nap with a book over their face.

JEWISH BOOK WEEK TO BE OBSERVED

Boston Public Library to Cooperate

The annual Jewish Book Week, devoted to Jewish books and to the Jew in literature, will be observed in Boston beginning May 14 as it will be throughout the country. This is the seventh observance of the week and it is designed to interest the public in books of Jewish significance and to focus attention on valuable Jewish literature and outstanding authors with the view of creating greater good-will and better understanding between Jew and non-Jew.

Libraries, temples, synagogues, religious schools and study groups will stress Jewish Book Week throughout the city. The Boston Public Library is cooperating with the Boston Jewish Book Week Committee, composed of prominent men and women of the city, by holding special exhibits at the main library and branches.

At the West End Branch a special exhibit on the Jew in art, drama and literature will be shown. In addition the library will issue a new edition of "Judaica," a bibliography of books of Jewish interest and significance, compiled by Fanny Goldstein, librarian of the West End Branch.

The first part of the program will take place next Sunday evening in the main lecture hall of the Boston Public Library at 8 o'clock. Every phase of Jewish literature and scholarship will be covered by the speakers. Milton E. Lord, director, Boston Public Library, will speak on "The Public Library and Jewish Book Week"; Dr. Isaac Goldberg, author and literary critic, on "Significant Jewish Books"; Lee M. Friedman, on "Zola and the Dreyfus Case, a Hitler Parallelism," and Prof. Robert B. Rogers of M. I. T., on "Our Jewish Literature: The Spur to Our Intent." The musical program will be furnished by Fannie Lewis Friedlander, Dr. Albert Ehrenfried, chairman of the Boston committee, will preside.

Next Wednesday evening an informal gathering of book lovers and collectors will show and discuss rare and unusual books in the Temple Israel Meeting House, Riverway and Longwood av.

Mattapan Branch Library will devote Thursday evening to a special program. Dr. Isidor H. Coriat, famous neurologist, will speak on "The Work and Influence of Freud." Mildred E. White, children's librarian, will speak on "Some Recent Books for the Jewish Child," and Louis H. Weinstein on "The Jew in Modern Drama." Dr. Coriat will act as chairman of the evening. D. Jerolyn Barnett, coloratura, soprano, will sing.

MISS FANNY GOLDSTEIN
West End Branch Librarian

The sponsors for the week's program includes Dr. Albert Ehrenfried, chairman; Fanny Goldstein, secretary; Rabbi Samuel J. Abrams, Hon. Esther Andrews, Dr. M. I. Berman, Alexander Brin, Dr. Isidor H. ### Our Public Library and Book Week

The Boston Public Library again takes the lead this year in the observance of Jewish Book Week. Programs of an informative and cultural character are being presented during the week. All the Branch Libraries are co-operating in the observance of Book Week and will feature the subject on their bulletin boards, with exhibits and special reserve shelves for books of Jewish interest.

In the Treasure Room of the Central Library there will be an exhibit of rare books of Judaica and Hebraica. The West End Branch exhibit will be devoted to the Jewish Woman in Literature grouped around a portrait of the Jewish Woman suggesting her historic role of Matriarch in Israel. This painting is the most recent work by the noted Palestinian artist, Joseph Tepper. The Mattapan Branch Library will feature a selection of subjects by many of the Jewish artists of Greater Boston. Another interesting exhibit there will be one of Palestinian life illustrating arts and crafts in photograph and handicraft form. This exhibit has been loaned through the courtesy of Rabbi and Mrs. H. H. Rubenovitz and was collected on their recent visit to the Holy Land.

It may be interested to note here that probably over 300 requests have been received at the Boston Public Library from libraries and other people interested in the idea of promoting the message of the Jewish book. These letters have come from all over the United States, Canada, Nova Scotia, England, Holland, Germany, Italy, and France.

In addition to the programs and exhibits, the Library has also added about 80 new titles to its Jewish collection especially for Jewish Book Week.

It will also bring out a new edition of Judaica, compiled by Fanny Goldstein, the Librarian of the West End Branch. Miss Goldstein as the initiator of the idea of emphasizing the gospel of the Jewish book, has been working quietly and effectively for the promotion of Jewish culture. She is quoted as saying that it is her belief that "the book is a potent factor for the promotion of World Peace. That through the spreading of information on Jewish life and culture to Jew and non-Jew alike the world over, through literature, a greater understanding and tolerance must be attained."

People in search of information on all phases of Jewish life have sought Miss Goldstein for advice, who has always cheerfully responded. Boston is particularly fortunate in having a Librarian who understands the best policies of library work, Americanization and assimilation, and who at the same time has been an exponent of retaining Jewish identity and integrity.

The Jewish people of Boston are much indebted to the sympathetic response and co-operation of Mr. Milton E. Lord, the Director of the Boston Public Library, who has taken a personal interest in every phase of the work connected with the promotion of Jewish Book Week. They are also indebted to the Board of Trustees, and the other Library officials who have co-operated most generously.

Jewish Book Week Program Announced

Professor Rogers Among Speakers --- Public Is Cordially Invited to Lectures and Exhibits May 14

Special programs devoted to Jewish books and to the Jew in literature will be presented in this city next week, beginning Sunday, May 14, in connection with the annual observance of Jewish Book Week, which will be commemorated throughout the country from that day through May 20. This is the seventh national observance, and each year the movement has grown in popularity. Designed primarily to re-awaken the Jewish consciousness to an appreciation of its literary treasures, it has since its inception seven years ago spread to a more extensive and wider sphere of usefulness. Today Jewish Book Week serves to interest the public in books of Jewish significance and to focus attention on valuable Jewish literature and outstanding authors with a view to creating greater good will and a better understanding between Jew and Gentile as a result of the knowledge gained through reading.

Libraries, synagogues, religious schools and study groups will stress the gospel of Jewish Book Week throughout the city during next week. The Boston Public Library is co-operating with the Boston Jewish Book Week committee, composed of prominent men and women of the city, by holding special exhibits at the various branches of the Library. Rare Hebraica and Judaica will be on display in the Treasure Room at the Library. At the West End branch, an exhibit will be devoted to the Jewish woman in literature, centered around the portrait of Mrs. Joseph Tepper, wife of the artist, called "Jewish Madonna." Several of the other branches will also have special exhibits on the Jew in art, drama and literature. In addition, the Library will issue a new edition of "Judaica," a bibliography of books of Jewish interest compiled by Fanny Goldstein, librarian, West End branch, noted authority on Jewish books, and augmented annually for Jewish Book Week.

Welfare Funds Are Voted by Council

To provide for the Public Welfare Department for the first four months of the year the City Council at yesterday's session appropriated $4,575,000 on the recommendation of the mayor. Under the law, city departments may expend before the budget is passed, one-third of their allotments for the preceding year. The welfare department had exhausted its resources.

The appropriation consisted of $3,850,000 for care of dependents, $350,000 for mothers' aid, $375,000 for old-age assistance and $300,000 for soldiers' relief. Expenditure has been going on at a rate of more than $1,000,000 a month.

A pension of $1000 a year was voted to Mrs. Elizabeth P. Goode, widow of Deputy Superintendent of Police Thomas P. Goode.

A resolution asking that a reward be offered for information leading to the finding, dead or alive, of Helen Lindeman and Jean Bolduc, missing Roxbury girls, was offered in the name of Councilor Gleason, who is at the City Hospital.

Recipients on the welfare rolls should be paid in cash and some provision should be made for payment to landlords with welfare tenants, according to orders offered by Councilors Fish and Ruby.

The order for $75,000 for police radio passed its second reading by a vote of sixteen to one.

Thank You

We deeply appreciate the gifts of 10 hymnals from Mr. Martin Wax in loving memory of his dear wife (Mrs. Martin) Florence Wax; 5 Sabbath Prayer books from Mrs. Albert R. Rosenthal in loving memory of her husband Albert R. Rosenthal; 10 Sabbath Prayer Books from Mrs. Anne V. Becker in loving memory of her brother Fred Vorenberg; 6 Sabbath Prayer Books from Mrs. S. W. Prussian in loving memory of her mother Lillian Cohen; 1 Sabbath Prayer Book from Mrs. Samuel Tishler in loving memory of her husband Samuel Tishler; 4 Sabbath Prayer Books, and 2 Hymnals from Mrs. Jacob H. Hirshson in loving memory of M. & H. Salmansohn; 1 Prayer Book from Mrs. Joseph V. Finkelstein in loving memory of Joseph V. Finkelstein; 25 Hymnals from Mrs. David Bendetson in loving memory of her husband David Bendetson; 5 Sabbath Prayer Books from Sarah B. Israel; thanks also to Mrs. Abram Bernard Fox and Mrs. R. K. Gurney for the very beautiful plant sent to the Meeting House.

Last Tuesday Rabbi Levi was asked to try to secure a wheel chair for an invalid. Five minutes after his announcement, Mr. Morris Morgese presented a chair to the congregation, which was immediately placed at the disposal of the invalid. We are very grateful for the prompt and generous response.

Parent-Teacher Association

The Parent-Teacher Association will hold their last meeting of the year on Wednesday evening, May 10th. The evening will be devoted to a consideration of two vital problems facing our educational department and the effectiveness of the Temple.

1. How shall we integrate Jewish people more definitely with the life of the Synagogue?
2. Where shall we place our emphasis in the holiday programs?

Plan to Loot Public Library Fails; Thief Couldn't Erase Book Stamps

The plan of a scholarly thief to loot systematically the public library of its books failed because of the inadequacy of that part of the library dealing with subtle theft. It was revealed yesterday by Milton E. Lord, director of the library.

Mr. Lord, in addressing the city council committee on appropriations, said that the purloining bibliophile had hatched the plan of becoming rich through denuding the library of its volumes, selling the books that he had thus acquired, and performing the entire feat without detection. Ever a true scholar, the ambitious thief felt that books should hold the method and the secret of the much-sought perfect crime.

A stooped, near-sighted little man from Lynn, according to Mr. Lord, the scholar gone wrong, began to read all that the library contained concerning crime, and, just for practice, he stole the books about stealing. Feeling already rich as he eyed the numberless library volumes, the near-sighted thief after some months of study hit upon a plan.

All he had to do was evolve a method of erasing without trace the library stamp—then, he felt, he could sell the books without fear and enjoy a steady income as long as there was a book left. With a pathetic faith in book learning, he turned to the chemical department for the stamp-erasing formula.

And here arrived the factor that throws all perfect crimes askew. It was not a human factor. The bibliophile had not fallen short. It was the library that had fallen short. There was nothing in the volumes of chemistry that revealed the needed formula.

So it was that the perfect plan failed and the scholarly thief told all to Mr. Lord under promise of immunity. When the library, eight months ago offered a moratorium and a clean slate to all those who would return missing books, the scholar from Lynn turned up repentant with 28 volumes on practical chemistry and 19 on crime in its various forms.

STOLE BOOKS TO LEARN TO STEAL

Hoped to Find Formula to Remove Library Mark

The strange story of how a Lynn man stole books from the Boston Public Library to learn to steal more was revealed yesterday to the City Council appropriations committee by Library Director Milton E. Lord.

The Lynn pilferer returned a large number of chemistry books during the recent moratorium on fines, and when promised immunity if he would tell why he had taken all chemistry books, the man explained that he was trying to find the prescription for some chemical which would remove the library mark stamped on the public volumes, so that he could make wholesale thefts from the libraries and go into the book business on a grand scale.

He told the library director that the chemistry books did not contain the formula he was after and for that reason he decided to give the books back.

KIRSTEIN NAMED TO RECOVERY POST

Appointed Adviser for Cotton Garment Industry

WASHINGTON, July 30.—The appointment of Louis E. Kirstein of Boston as adviser to the Recovery Administration for the cotton garment industry has been announced by E. R.

LOUIS E. KIRSTEIN

Stettinius Jr., liaison officer between the Industrial Recovery Board and the National Recovery Administration.

Louis E. Kirstein began life as an errand boy. He is now one of the leading merchants in the United States. Since 1911 he has been vice president of William Filene's Sons Company.

His philanthropic and civic work have made him known nationally. At one time he had charge of purchasing all the uniforms for the American Expeditionary Forces. But most of his philanthropic and civic activities are connected primarily with Boston.

In 1929 he paid for the construction of the first businessmen's library in Boston, the Edward Kirstein Memorial Library in City Hall av., a building named in memory of his father. He then gave it to the city. In 1925 he donated a bronze traffic tower, placed at Winter and Washington sts.

His name has been prominently connected with all charity drives in this city.

He is president of the Associated Jewish Philanthropies, trustee of the Boston Public Library, a member of the board of managers of the Children's Hospital, a director of Beth Israel Hospital, and a member of the council at large Boy Scouts of America.

It has been Mr. Kirstein's outspoken philosophy that the rich man should give the working man a greater share of profits. He has continually scored the wealthy, declaring that they have been shortsighted in not caring better for workers at a time when the capitalistic system was on trial.

Mr. Kirstein was born in Rochester, N. Y., July 9, 1867. He married the former Rose Stein of Rochester, 1891. They have three children.

MAGNIFICENT FLAG IN COPLEY SQ MADE OF THOUSANDS OF PLANTS

FLORAL PIECE BETWEEN PUBLIC LIBRARY AND TRINITY CHURCH

A representation of the American flag, designed by Richard J. Hayden, superintendent of parks in the city of Boston, has been placed in Copley square on a mound facing Trinity Church. About 19,750 plants, including 10 genera and 15 varieties, was required to complete the planting of the huge flag. The bed, 22 feet in diameter, measures 17 feet and six inches across and seven feet in depth, with a waving effect. The elevation of the bed at the back is five feet above the surface of the ground. It slopes down to nothing at the front, giving the whole the picture of a carpet.

The plants used in making the bed are the following: Echeveria Mexicana, echeveria secunda glauca and peacocks; haworthia attenuata; sedums adolphii and japonica; althernanthes vietchii, brilliantissima and aurea; suonymus japonica aurea and radicans variegata; chamaecypariss incana; pilea macrophylla; lobelia; crystal palace compacta and mesembryanthemum cordifolium.

TELLS STORIES TO 10,000 EACH WEEK

Boston's Official Story Teller From Public Library Never Interrupted; Always Holds Attention

BOSTON'S OFFICIAL STORY TELLER

BY LESTER ALLEN

"Tell us a story!"

This request is made by 10,000 in Boston every week, and Boston's official story teller always obliges with a brand new story out of his repertoire of over 1000 narratives.

Although few people know it outside of those who give their rapt attention to Boston's story teller, Boston has a story teller on the payroll of the Public Library, just as the barons of the Middle Ages had troubadours, minstrels and bards and story tellers to invent tales in prose or poetry for their entertainment.

TELLS STORIES TO 15,000 EVERY WEEK

And being Boston's official story-teller is no sinecure as John J. Cronan of 607 West Roxbury Parkway, West Roxbury, who fills the post, will testify. He has to train like an athlete for a contest to keep pace with the demand for new stories.

"I haven't any children of my own," he explained last night, "but I surmise that my wife and I tell stories to the largest family of grownups and children in the world. Every week we tell stories to 10,000 or more people."

Name Their Subjects

Last night at Charlestown branch library, opposite the Bunker Hill Monument, Boston's official story-teller gave a demonstration of how story-telling is done.

Over 100 Charlestown boys ranging in age from 8 to 12 shuffled and scuffed their way into the little lecture room at the library. Mr. Cronan and his wife were waiting for them. It was as noisy as a schoolyard at recess.

"What will we have?" Cronan inquired.

"Tell us some more about Nils," the boys demanded.

All Listen Intently

They have doubtless never heard of Selma Lagerlof, the Scandinavian authoress who wrote the story of the adventure of Nils, but they gave Cronan their solemn attention as he told them a story about Nils. There wasn't a sound in the room except Cronan's voice; boys propped their chins on their elbows and listened intently. It would be expected that the more frolicsome boys would snigger, or mull one another, or begin to talk loud, or become noisy. But it didn't happen; they just sat and listened hanging on every word.

After he had finished with Nils, Cronan told the story of David Balfour, hero of Robert Louis Stevenson's tale, "Kidnapped." The boys still remained quiet. When it was over they regained their boisterousness and went chattering out of the lecture room with a tremendous clatter.

Easier to Interest Grownups

"Do they ever get fidgety?" Mr. Cronan was asked.

"Oh, no," he said, "I know what will interest them."

"Do you ever tell stories to grownups?"

"The grown-ups are easier to tell stories to, easier to satisfy," he said. "They listen to the same stories we tell the boys and girls with much more intense interest. If you want to see an absorbed audience drop in some time at an adult story hour."

Boston's official story teller was until 1929 an accountant at the offices of Stone & Webster. For 22 years he and his wife had been carrying on the work of telling stories to people to interest them in the standard works in the Boston Public Library. When he retired he planned to take up the profession of story-telling as a vocation.

Work of Preparing

The requirements of story-telling are much more severe than would appear at first blush. He and his wife have to read a score of books every week to secure material for the stories. They devote two hours every night to a search for new material. Then there are more hours to put in compiling a tabloid version of the story and preparing the exciting parts of it as written by the author. And then Cronan has to practice speaking in dialect Scotch, or Irish or shire English, whatever the case may be that the story calls for.

The chief sources of the stories are the works of Scott, Dickens, Kipling, Stevenson, Bret Harte, Washington Irving, and others of similar reputation.

All Like Spoken Narrative

"Grownups like spoken narrative as much if not more than children," Cronan said. "They often urge me to finish a long narrative when I am limited by time to give only a portion of it, to be continued in the next class. Usually, to stimulate the reading of good books, we leave the narrative unfinished at the approach of the most exciting part. In many cases there are 75 to 100 calls for the particular book the story is taken from the day after the class."

"I suppose that the desire to hear a story told is an inheritance from our forebears way back when story-tellers went from village to village telling tales of wars and adventures, like the adventurers who returned from the Holy Land with the news of the Crusades."

Mrs. Cronan at It First

"Mrs. Cronan was doing this work before I began it. She started out in the South End branch library and has continued it up to the present. We get a lot of fun out of it, even if it doesn't pay particularly well. We have no children of our own to tell stories to, but we find a lot of pleasure in telling stories to audiences just as if they were intimate members of our own families."

"During Book Week we told stories to thousands of children every day in big school auditoriums. And all the while we have been telling stories there has never been any disturbance or interruption. People like to hear a story told—I guess that's the explanation."

Della J. Deery, with Boston Public Library 42 Years, Dead

Miss Della Jean Deery long associated with the Boston Public Library, died at the home of her sister, Mrs. Harry Burns, Gagetown, N. B., Monday. Miss Deery was a native of Amherst, N. S. After coming to Boston she engaged in work at the Boston Book Company. Later she became a member of the staff of the Boston Public Library, holding for more than forty-two years the double post of executive assistant of the library and clerk of the board of trustees. She served under six librarians. In the course of her long years of service she made a host of friends among her associates and the public with whom she came in contact.

From the Public Library comes the good word that the noted Pro-Arte Quartet of Brussels will be heard there in a concert of chamber music on Sunday evening, Nov. 5. Only once before has it played in Boston, then as now by the good will and the open purse of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge. A classic quartet, a modern quartet, and a quartet from an American composer will probably fill the program.

MISS DELLA JEAN DEERY

Miss Della Jean Deery, for 42 years connected with the Boston Public Library, died yesterday at the home of her sister, Mrs. Harry Burns at Gagetown, N. B.

She was a native of Amherst, N. S. When she first came to Boston she was employed by the Boston Book Company. Later she went to the Boston Public Library, holding many positions of trust there in her 42 years of service. She was executive assistant of the library and clerk of the board of trustees.

During her long employment she served under six librarians. She also made a host of friends among her colleagues and the public.

About a year ago her health began to fail and she was given a leave of absence from which she failed to return.

MISS FANNY GOLDSTEIN

Declares Hitler Seeks To Plunge World in War

Fanny Goldstein, West End Librarian, Says German Leader Uses Persecution of Jews as Blind to Cover
His Ambitious Aims

By LOIS BAYLISS
As head of Boston's centre for Jewish culture, the West End branch of the Boston Public Library, where many young Jews have absorbed a strong background for illustrious careers, Miss Fanny Goldstein, librarian, feels very strongly at mention of the name of Hitler.

"PERPETRATING A WAR"
Softly, in words exquisitely enunciated in mellifluous cadence, she tells Boston what she makes of the Nazi situation as it effects not only her own people, but the world.

"Hitler is perpetrating a war... a war," she says, "not a revolution. He is using the persecution of Jews, and the loud pedalled Anti-Semitic propaganda only as a blind to cover his ultimate purpose."

"Hitler is no newcomer to the ranks of the oppressor: for 10 years he has been working in the mobilization of his so-called storm troops. For 10 years he has been building up the foundations of what he hopes will be his dynasty. In the old tie-up between Austria-Hungary and Germany there was empire. To regain such empire, of vastly greater proportions, vastly stronger resources, Hitler is trying to lead Germany back to the days of Barbarism. That means war."

"There is no blood-shed. And real red blood as in the Czarist regime: suppressions of long years have thinned the blood of the Jews in Germany to rapid pink lemonade."

"Fear has done this. Do you think we have been hearing the real truth about Germany from the German Jewish refugees here in the United States? If they told what they knew of real, existent conditions, they would pay in sorrow: those whom they left behind—friends, relatives, and the frightened: the people of the man who told would be made an example of for all Germany to see."

"Am I talking propaganda? Well, if I am, I am not ashamed of it! The difference between Anti-Nazi propaganda and Nazi propaganda, is that the Anti-Nazi makes clean, readable, intelligent statements; while his oppressors employ the most devious devices for spreading their messages of cloaked greed and evil."

"Don't think that the Jew is to be the only sufferer! He is only the first example—chosen first, because he conveniently represents a race accustomed to pogroms and exile. But the Jew is being made an example of, just as a forerunner to show people what will happen to any man who dares to indulge in independent thought, free political expression, or religious individuality."

"The Nazis will stamp out the long-boasted German 'Kultur'... and so ruthlessly that it will take one hundred years to rebuild even the semblance of culture."

"HITLER A NEWCOMER"

"The German Jew is a thousand years old. To him, Hitler is a newcomer, a greedy and obvious power-seeker, a force of destructive hate-breeding oppression. The Jew is too keen in mind, too appreciative of the true motives of the Nazis, too able in industrial finance to suit the dictator, Hitler, operating on the theory that 'the masses are dumb,' wishes to exclude the Jew from his masses: the Jew knows too much to fit into the category in which Hitler wishes to place his masses. He is not dumb."

"Do you think all Jews are being driven from Germany?... Some stand too high; some are too powerful. It is said that a certain very wealthy Jewish banker was given orders to leave Germany. The banker replied: 'Next week my bank will be closed, and I and my capital will have left Germany forever.' Perhaps the order was remanded, for the bank still operates; the banker is still in business."

"Hitler cannot afford to lose capital! He is scaring poor men who are in a position to be timid; others are safe. As I foresee it, the Jew is only the first. Next, who knows?—it may be the humble among the Roman Catholics, who are driven from the country in Hitler's program to retain in Germany only those whose blood and money will endure in a survival of the fittest...."

By the time he can... if he does... accomplish his eugenic purposes, the German woman will be reduced to her mediaeval status as a purely reproductive animal; a bearer of men to be used for cannon fodder when one greedy nation covets the possessions of another."

"Barbarism! Is it for this that science, art and civilization have refined themselves to their present levels?..."

Embarrassed at her own quiet but fiery eloquence, the competent lady (who says she's "over thirty and under seventy," and who has built her substantial place in the world of books by diligent application to the job) drew a volume from her shelves and recommended: "But if you don't believe me, read this book by Edgar Ansel Mowrer called 'Germany Sets the Clock Back!'"

"Many a brilliant lad who has gone into medicine, law or other profession, and is now a full-fledged authority on the subject, recalls with sheepish pride that in his youth he was 'kicked out' of the West End Library for noisiness. 'But not with my foot,' Miss Goldstein says succinctly. 'No lady does that. I am a product, after all, of Boston conservatism.'"

Court Asked to Interpret Benton Will Library Gift

A petition for instructions filed by the surviving trustees under the will of Josiah H. Benton will be heard in Suffolk probate court. The will was executed on Nov. 15, 1916, and there are three separate gifts in the will to the trustees of the Boston Public Library.

The third, which is the subject of the petition, was a gift to the library; trustees of the residue of the testator's property, to take effect at the death of the testator's widow.

One part of the will stated how the income was to be used and stipulated that it should be used for the purchase of books and other material only in years when the city appropriates for the maintenance of the library at least 3 per cent. of the amount available for department expenses from taxes and income of the city. The question at issue now is the meaning of this 3 per cent. condition. The will stated that in any year the city failed to make the appropriation the income should be turned over to the rector of Trinity Church, to be used for helping the needy. The petitioner, Arthur F. Clarke, who seeks instructions, is represented by Bentley W. Warren; the trustees of the Public Library by John L. Hall and Maxwell E. Foster; the rector of Trinity Church by Andrew Marshall.

LESSON I

What is Rheumatic Fever?

It is an infection, that is, a disease due to a germ, but what particular germ is not yet known. It is commonest in children between the ages of 5 and 15. The germ probably gets into the body by the nose and throat. The disease may affect different parts of the body at different times or at the same time.

It may cause colds, tonsillitis, "growing pains," swollen or painful joints, nosebleeds, pain in the stomach, St. Vitus' Dance (chorea), or inflammation of the heart.

When the germ is causing trouble we say "the infection is active," and it may cause trouble for weeks or months or off and on for years. The disease often comes back for a time until the child grows up and every time it comes back it may hurt the heart. That is why the doctor must see your child regularly and especially if anything seems wrong, to see if there is trouble in the heart or not. If there is, the child must be in bed at rest so that the danger of inflammation of the heart may be prevented if possible.

Rest is the great treatment for this disease. There is no medicine that will cure it, but there are some which help.

Rheumatic fever cures itself in most cases if the child can be kept at rest in bed, but it usually leaves a scar somewhere in the heart.

LESSON 2

What is Rheumatic Heart Disease?

The heart has a delicate lining like the lining of the mouth, and that is the part which is usually hurt by the germ. It swells up and as it gets better it becomes wrinkled and hard, like a scar. When this scar is on the heart valves it may keep them from closing properly and may cause a "leaky valve."

The heart muscle may also become inflamed and weak and sometimes the thin covering sac around the heart may be hurt. The heart usually gets bigger when it is injured, but frequently that is Nature's way of helping it to work harder.

These different injuries cause what is called "rheumatic heart disease." Many children have this kind of heart trouble. However, they often become healthy and able to work if they are very careful to rest when the doctor advises it.

When they grow up they should not be made to do heavy labor, but should work more with their brains than with their backs. The heart valves of these children do not heal perfectly and the heart muscle does not become as good as new, but usually the heart can do its job even if it is not quite as strong as it was before.

LESSON 3

St. Vitus' Dance (Chorea)

The rheumatic germ sometimes causes nervous twitching and jerking of the arms and legs in children, which is called "chorea," or St. Vitus' Dance.

St. Vitus' Dance may be so severe that the child moves constantly, spills his food, or has trouble talking. It may be so slight that he must be watched very closely for a long time before even a doctor can tell if this particular kind of nervousness is present. If this is the only sign of rheumatism it may not affect the heart, but when present it is a sign that the germ is doing some harm.

Parents should watch for nervous twitching of the hands and feet in children, especially if there is rheumatism in the family or if the child has heart trouble. It may mean St. Vitus' Dance, but they should let the doctor decide. Remember, most nervous, restless children do not have St. Vitus' Dance.

Colds and Rheumatism

Rheumatic fever is somehow related to colds, tonsillitis, bronchitis, and the "flu." We are not sure just how it is connected with these sicknesses. We do know that children who have infections of their breathing organs like these are apt to have rheumatic fever during or just after the cold or sore throat. This is especially true if the child already has rheumatic heart trouble or has had rheumatism before.

You must, therefore, be very careful to put the child to bed if he has any kind of a cold or any fever. You must always keep the child away from people with colds. Colds, sore throats, and the "flu" run in families.

Keep your children away from any one in the family who gets sick. If your child has heart trouble tell his school teacher so that she can help to protect him from colds.

LESSON 5

Danger Signals

When a child has once had rheumatism he is apt to have trouble again off and on for years with symptoms which mean that the disease has come back in a mild form.

If we pay attention to these signals and put the child to bed we may prevent serious heart trouble from appearing. Because some of these signals may not be recognized by the parents, it is wise to have the child examined by the doctor two or three times a year even if he seems to be well. The most important signs are these:

- Colds and sore throats
- Pains in the joints
- Nervous twitching of arms or legs
- Fever
- Nosebleeds without any reason
- Skin rashes
- Loss of weight

Report to the doctor if your child has any of these troubles.

Court Asked to Interpret Benton Will Library Gift

A petition for instructions filed by the surviving trustees under the will of Josiah H. Benton will be heard in Suffolk probate court. The will was executed on Nov. 15, 1916, and there are three separate gifts in the will to the trustees of the Boston Public Library.

The third, which is the subject of the petition, was a gift to the library trustees of the residue of the testator's property, to take effect at the death of the testator's widow.

One part of the will stated how the income was to be used and stipulated that it should be used for the purchase of books and other material only in years when the city appropriates for the maintenance of the library at least 3 per cent. of the amount available for department expenses from taxes and income of the city. The question at issue now is the meaning of this 3 per cent. condition. The will stated that in any year the city failed to make the

The petitioner, Arthur F. Clarke, who seeks instructions, is represented by Bentley W. Warren, the trustees of the Public Library by John L. Hall and Maxwell E. Foster; the rector of Trinity Church by Andrew Marshall.

As head of Boston's centre for Jewish culture, the West End branch of the Boston Public Library, where many young Jews have absorbed a strong background for illustrious careers, Miss Fanny Goldstein, librarian, feels very strongly at mention of the name of Hitler.

"PERPETRATING A WAR"
Softly, in words exquisitely enunciated in mellifluous cadence, she tells Boston what she makes of the Nazi situation as it effects not only her own people, but the world.

"Hitler is perpetrating a war... a war," she says, "not a revolution. He is using the persecution of Jews, and the loud pedaled Anti-Semitic propaganda only as a blind to cover his ultimate purpose."

"He is instigating the war by bloodless methods. His hands must be technically innocent of bloodshed; but by the insidious channels through which he disseminates his propaganda, nations will rise against each other, grasping for power."

Four signed confessions from girls working on CWA projects in the Boston Public Library are in the possession of Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts CWA. The confessions implicate a prominent Boston politician who is said to have forged the name of E. L. Hanna, manager of the federal re-employment office. Forty-six girls "improperly certified" will be suspended today.

This arrangement enables them to get a higher wage than available under the edict of Walter V. McCarthy that clerical and professional help should be reduced to 24 hours per week under the Federal order, along with unskilled labor.

ALLEGED CWA FRAUD IS PROBED

Federal Agents Here; Matters Exaggerated Says Bartlett

Brought here by rumblings of serious scandals in the CWA administration in New England, Louis R. Glavis, head of the department of investigation of the Public Works Administration, and former Teapot Dome sleuth, with a trained force of investigators, has been working here so quietly for the past three days that local federal authorities and CWA heads were unaware of what was happening.

SITUATION CALLED SERIOUS

David J. Barry of Providence, New England administrator in charge of investigation for the PWA, explained the presence of his chief in this territory last night with the statement that Washington regarded the present situation as serious. Typical of the Roosevelt regime from the first, at the first sign of serious irregularities skilled investigators come quietly in and prepare their reports without consulting local officials first. "Local officials can handle routine matters themselves," he said, "but when something serious happens, we go to work."

Glavis is head of the department which handles both the CWA and PWA investigation under Secretary of the Interior Harold I. Ickes.

Barry refused to divulge whether Glavis would take any active part in the present Boston situation other than to file a report, but intimated that this would depend on the ability of local authorities to clean house themselves.

Nothing Very Serious Found

Local federal officials who are at present conducting their own investigation into alleged insurance and distribution of a large number of forged work cards said yesterday that nothing of a very serious nature had been uncovered thus far despite the charges said to involve a number of politicians. Postal inspectors are already pushing a probe in an effort to determine who forged the cards. A number of the inspectors who are skilled handwriting experts are pushing this phase of the work. Penalties for illegally using the

MORE THAN 2300 OUT IN TWO CITIES

More than 2300 CWA workers in Brockton and Medford are jobless, at least temporarily, because of mix-ups in the administration of the projects.

In Brockton investigators for the government called a halt temporarily to all CWA work, throwing 1400 men and women out of work for the time being.

In Medford, 900 or more workers lost their jobs after Mrs. Theresa A. St. Denis resigned her position as CWA director in that city.

government frank on envelopes containing the cards will be a fine of $20 each. If the offender who forged the work cards and sent them out in franked envelopes is punished in this manner his fine will be $1000. The maximum penalty for using the mails to defraud in the event that this charge is pushed is 10 years in a federal prison. From the amount of evidence at present on hand, federal inspectors said that they did not think that the cases would be turned over to the federal grand jury when it is called next week. The forged cards bore the name of Everett L. Hanna, director of the State CWA Employment Bureau at 100 Nashua street.

"Exaggerated," Says Bartlett

Joseph W. Bartlett, State civil works chairman, in a statement last night voiced his confidence in the 355 CWA administrators in this State and said that he believes that the charges of wrong doing have been greatly exaggerated.

"We are of the opinion," he said, "that the instances of wrongdoing are few. Most administrators have attended to every detail 100 per cent."

"As for the situation that provoked the investigation regarding illegal work slips now being handled by federal authorities here in Boston, the matter is not in the hands of the CWA Board or its officers."

"Labor for the CWA projects is provided by the federal re-employment service. The Civil Works Board approves the projects, and the officials of the 355 communities of the State are charged with obeying the rules and regulations of the CWA."

"The board is quite confident that very few CWA administrators have fallen down on their jobs."

The statement is also signed by State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley and William B. Coy, the other two members of the board. Widespread irregularities in the handling of local projects will be taken up in order by Chairman Bartlett beginning on Monday. The first hearing of that nature scheduled to come up is with William M. Drummey, superintendent of school construction; Walter V. McCarthy, city welfare director; and M. J. McCarthy, director of the federal re-employment bureau.

Drummey put a four instead of a five day week in operation last week, because he told CWA officials that the money for the work was running out. He reported to Chairman Bartlett that he had increased his force of men from 400, as called for, to 1000 men. On Monday CWA officials will seek to determine by whose authority the additional men were put to work.

Revelations by labor leaders that a large percentage of unskilled laborers are holding down skilled jobs and are receiving $1.50 an hour for their services will also be investigated.

In Brockton an immediate reclassification of all CWA rolls will be made because of false claims as to qualifications. While this is being done 100 workers will be thrown out of work temporarily.

More Forged Slips

More forged work slips resulted in protest from Theodore Munney, comptroller of the Public Library, where 600 girls have been reclassifying books under a CWA project yesterday. A check at the Nashua street employment office revealed a discrepancy of three names in cases where people received their work cards from outside sources.

Representatives of the Building Trades Council will take up violations in connection with CWA projects with Mayor Mansfield this week. Some of these involve school work. Discrimination on wages and in the employment of union labor is charged.

It was also said that E. A. Johnson, secretary of the council, is preparing a set of rules governing standardization, classification, and qualifications required for skilled labor on building construction which will be turned over to Chairman Bartlett.

Library Men Paid

Forty-six men who marched in a body from their CWA project at the Boston Public Library to demand their overdue pay from the financial department in the old Young's Hotel building were soothed at once when soon after their arrival they were paid.

In his statement about authorization of more CWA projects, Executive Director Winter said: "Additional and supplementary projects may be approved by the CWA board to insure keeping all now employed gainfully occupied until Feb. 15. At the present time many such supplementary projects are on file at headquarters. These will be approved in keeping with the 24-hour limitation as established by Washington last week."

"All new projects to be submitted must be sent to CWA headquarters, 40 Federal street, by mail," he said. "Communities will be notified immediately the supplementary project is approved."

About 300 typists engaged on the Public Library project will see their pay reduced from $15 a week to $13.86, it was announced yesterday, as the result of the enforced revision of working hours per week.

Books That Go to Sea

Now is the time to remember a need keenly felt by men who follow the sea. Sailors require good books to read, whether the crew voyages to far lands in a merchant ship, or lives on a lightship anchored forever to a monotonous reef. From the beginning of marine history this need has existed, but people on shore forgot all about it until the World War. Then the work was begun which later became the American Merchant Marine Library Association, a service to provide well-chosen circulating libraries for seamen. Year after year this excellent effort has continued, and its value and usefulness have come to be recognized the world round.

During the present week in Boston books are being collected once more for the A. M. M. L. A. Any public library, or branch, will receive books given for this purpose, and forward them to the association's dispatch stations. A great quantity of evidence is at hand to show why such gifts are worth making by all ashore who can make them, but the best proof lies in characteristic letters received from the seamen themselves. For example, this word comes from a ship of the Coast Guard: "I often wonder if those responsible for this wonderful movement really realize the benefits the boys receive from it. To some it means an education, to others it means relaxation, and to the rest it means a genuine pleasure. I have been reading your books since 1922 and the technical books you loaned me have enabled me to become a ship's officer. . . . We all look forward eagerly to the exchange of your books and I am joined by my shipmates both past and present in sending you and your associates these thanks." If there be good books to spare, cast them upon the waters.

Group Protests to Mansfield at City Hall—Conference Planned

Forty-six CWA workers at the Boston public library, upon failing to receive their pay yesterday, marched to City Hall and then to Young's Hotel, where they were paid. It was explained that they were among the original workers assigned to the job early last month. During a recent check it was discovered that the assignment slips had not been properly made out. A delay in correcting the errors held up their pay.

TAKEN BY CITY

About 300 Boston typists engaged on a Boston public library project and originally paid $15, were assigned, beginning today, to work a 30-hour week at a weekly wage of $13.86. This arrangement enables them to get a higher rate of pay than was possible under the edict of McCarthy, the Boston CWA administrator, who originally ruled that clerical and professional help should be reduced to 24 hours a week, along with skilled and unskilled labor.

BOXERS TO BE PUT ON CWA JOBS

Hire Wrestlers, Too, as Instructors in Athletics

With laborers and white collar workers being taken care of on Boston CWA projects, plans were under way last night to put boxers and wrestlers to work on a public recreation project. A plan is being drawn up by the central city-wide emergency committee to provide employment for 247 men and women in the municipal gymnasiums, libraries and other public buildings to conduct recreational and health programmes.

SEEK JOBS FOR 92

Such programmes have been found necessary, Mayor Mansfield explained last night, because of the shorter working week with its shorter working hours since the adoption of the National Recovery Act. Mayor Mansfield is honorary chairman of the central committee of which Park Commissioner William P. Long is active chairman.

City and State CWA officials were trying to find some way last night to put back to work some, if not all, of the 92 men fired from their City Hall jobs Tuesday night.

Mayor Names Committee

The public recreation project, financed through the CWA, will begin functioning at once, according to Mayor Mansfield. He announced the appointment late yesterday afternoon of a central city-wide emergency committee on health and recreation to organize and direct the work. He will confer with neighborhood leaders tonight, at a dinner at Hotel Westminster, regarding the best ways to make the programme helpful in various sections of the city.

The personnel of the central committee follows: Park Commissioner William P. Long, chairman; Eliot Wadsworth, vice-chairman; William Phillips, under Secretary of State at Washington; Louis Kirslein, Cardinal O'Connell; the Rev. Thomas E. Reynolds of the Catholic Charitable Bureau; Joseph Lee, School Superintendent Patrick Campbell; George P. Hamlin, Jr., Mrs. Eva Whiting White, president of Federation Settlements; Milton E. Lord, director of Boston Public Library; School Committeeman Maurice Tobin, Public Buildings Commissioner Roswell G. Hall, and W. Duncan Russell of Community Service of Boston, Inc., secretary.

The purpose of this project is to provide the public with more adequate facilities for recreation, education and employment. There has been a steadily increasing demand for these facilities, according to Mayor Mansfield, ever since the National Recovery Act, by reducing weekly hours of employment, gave people more spare time.

Athletic Sports Included

Athletic sports, entertainments, orchestral and choral groups, dramatic productions and arts and crafts work are some of the activities scheduled for this year as for last. Reading and game rooms, supplied with magazines and newspapers, checker sets, playing cards, etc., will be maintained at strategic points throughout the city.

The 24 persons to be employed on the project include, among others, stadium directors, music directors, swimming directors, directors of arts and crafts, boxers and wrestlers, drama directors, supervisors of reading and game rooms, and directors of women's activities.

Claim Someone Blundered

City officials will confer tonight with State CWA officials in hopes of finding a payroll somewhere in Boston in which the names of 92 CWA white collar workers can be added. These are the men, some of them young men, married and with babies, others middle aged men, married with children, who support, who although trained as bookkeepers, auditors and accountants, were fired Tuesday night from their 12-week CWA jobs in City Hall. Whether City Tax Collector William H. McMorrow or his project supervisor, Daniel A. Nory, is to blame, CWA officials at State headquarters would not say last night as they took on their shoulders the task of finding jobs lost to them because "somebody had blundered."

48 HOLD FORGED CARDS AT LIBRARY

Forged CWA work cards cropped up at the Boston Public Library project yesterday, and as a result 48 persons, mostly women, will be discharged today when this report is verified, according to Administrator Walter V. McCarthy.

Assistant Librarian Theodore D. Money and State investigators found the cards and sent a message to Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett, who relayed the cases to McCarthy. The signature forged was that of Everett L. Hanna, Boston federal re-employment service manager.

May Give Jobs Back to 44

indications were last night that the 44 men originally hired the first of December to do book work in the tax collector's office, despite vague charges that additional men had to be hired because the first 44 were "incompetent," will be restored to their jobs in City Hall before the end of the week.

CWA PROJECTS TO BE IDENTIFIED BY SIGNS

The public will have no trouble in identifying CWA projects in a few days. Joseph W. Bartlett, administrator, has issued an order to raise a sign four by six feet near each job, stating whether it is "Local Project," "State Project" or "Federal Project." This is designed to show the public what the various projects are.

48 FORGED C. W. A. CARDS IN LIBRARY

Many Women to Lose Jobs Upon Verification of Report

Forty-eight persons, mostly women, reported yesterday afternoon to be working on the Boston Public Library C. W. A. project under forged work assignment slips, will be summarily discharged following verification of the report in his office, Walter V. McCarthy, Boston welfare head and C. W. A. administrator, said last night.

This statement was made following a message sent to McCarthy by Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State Civil Works Board, informing him that Theodore V. Money, comptroller of the library, and State board investigators had discovered that this number of improperly certified persons were at work on the project.

"Please take such action as you think necessary under the circumstances," wrote Chairman Bartlett. "I will ask Money to give me all the information he has available, and if it is correct, as I have no doubt it is, I will order dismissal of all the persons working under false credentials," said McCarthy on receipt of the letter. Everett L. Hanna, Boston Federal Reemployment Service manager, declared that his signature on the 48 cards assigning girls to work on the library project was a forgery.

stantiated he did not know when the next payments would be made.

16,000 on Payroll

The charges were made by a committee of three men: William Roughsedge, of Dorchester, formerly employed as an assistant superintendent of the Postal Telegraph Company; James McLaughlin of Charlestown, and James Connolly of South Boston. These are the same men to whom Mayor Mansfield gave $45 last week. These men declare that Henry Cheatham, one of the supervisors on their project, is a C. at a salary of $45 per week, is a Canadian. The election department has no man named Cheatham now on the Boston voting list. They also declare that another supervisor also receives a pension from the city and that the general morale is at a low ebb because of the delayed payrolls.

Gates explained that he is trying to work out a system of staggering the payrolls so that payments will be met on four days of the week, thus relieving the entire city load falling due on the same day. There are nearly 16,000 workers, he pointed out, and it is physically impossible to pay them all off on the same day.

Cook Named Director

John P. Cook, 136 Robbins road, Arlington, was yesterday appointed director of labor adjustments under the C. W. A. by Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State Board. Cook, who has been prominent in labor circles for many years and is vice president of the Boston Building Trades Council, was nominated by James T. Moriarty, Robert Watt, E. A. Johnson and James P. Meehan yesterday morning.

Mayor Frederick W. Mansfield declared last night that payment of C. W. A. employees in the park and other city departments will be held up 36 hours because certain forms prescribed by Washington authorities to be used in meeting wage payments have been used up, and more must be dispatched from Washington.

A new branch of C. W. A. is ready to start functioning and will provide work for 247 persons, according to an announcement made yesterday by Mayor Mansfield. The project is to provide the public with more adequate free facilities for recreation, education and enjoyment. There has been a steadily growing demand for the facilities ever since the N. R. A., which reduced weekly hours of employment and gave people more spare time.

Mayor Mansfield announced the appointment late yesterday afternoon of a central city-wide emergency committee on health and recreation to organize and direct the work. He will confer with neighborhood leaders tonight at a dinner at Hotel Westminster regarding the best ways to make the program helpful to various sections of the city.

Claim Supervisor Alien

It was also learned yesterday that charges of mismanagement alleged to have caused hardships to 97 C. W. A. workers employed in the Statistics Department of the City of Boston are under investigation of both the Federal and State Governments.

Men at work on this project charge that their paydays have been delayed, that one of the supervisors, receiving $45 per week, is an alien, and that they, as clerks, are receiving only $13 per week while the N. R. A. code requires a minimum of $18 for clerks.

Theodore Gates, in charge of Boston C. W. A. payrolls, declared that these men caused more trouble than any other group and they were the best educated of all the workers. He admitted there might have been delays in getting out payrolls and in-

CWA PAY

The protest from the CWA employees at the Boston Public Library over the cut in wages for the lowest paid workers, who received $15 for a 30-hour week, reveals a curious situation.

There are around 500 women who were receiving $15 a week and now get $13.86. Even at this rate, which is admittedly low, there are employees of the library working full time who get less.

There are many more highly paid CWA workers. It was reported recently that some of them received $45 a week. This has been denied, but it is true that about 1 1/2 per cent of the force did receive $36 a week, and many others are paid above the minimum.

The permanent employees of the library, who work full time, are not paid very highly. Few of them, and these with responsible positions, get as much as $36 a week.

This matter of many relatively highly paid CWA jobs in contrast to the wage paid the rank and file seems subject to valid criticism. The census project, to start this week, employing a large number of women, contains an exceptionally large number of jobs which pay far beyond the minimum wage.

It is claimed that the recipients of the really good pay are mostly young people. On all these CWA projects the older persons, men and women with dependents or families, rarely seem to land in the jobs which pay more than the minimum.

In many cases, like that of the Public Library, it is the higher pay which runs up the costs and compels the reductions in wages for the rank and file. These CWA projects are intended to take care of as many persons who are on the welfare lists as possible. But there is a suspicion that a person on the welfare list who is given a CWA job has little or no chance to get more than the minimum.

Those who get the highest pay are persons who, in many cases, are far removed from the welfare list.

It may seem a bit unfair to indulge in any criticism of the hard working men in charge of the CWA programme. They have plenty of trouble. They are working under great difficulties. Speed in getting projects under way is essential. It is doubtful if any serious allegations of grafting locally can be sustained.

But the public is beginning to question some of the CWA policies.

HOUSE MEMBER CHARGED WITH CWA FORGERY

Federal Grand Jury to Get Evidence Tomorrow—Sensation Promised

CHARLESTOWN MEN PROFIT BY FRAUD

A Boston member of the House of Representatives forged CWA assignment work cards and sent them through the mails in government franked envelopes, according to evidence obtained yesterday by investigators which will be presented to a federal grand jury tomorrow.

This became known as investigators continued their efforts to learn the names of other politicians suspected of stealing the cards and forging the name of Everett L. Hanna, federal re-employment office manager. Boston politics will have a sensation when full details become known; the federal men asserted.

FAVORS CHARLESTOWN

The representative, who holds an important position with a large salary, took more than 60 cards and distributed them so that Charlestown men would be certain of CWA jobs. He assumed that even after discovery the men would be retained. It was learned that in some cases the cards were mailed, but in many instances the cards were thrust under doors.

After a day of jockeying with Boston officials, all of whom disclaimed responsibility for hiring men in excess of civil works project requirements, Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts civil works administration, issued his most far-reaching order.

Bartlett ordered that Horatio W. Nelson, assistant to the Boston CWA administrator, and Robert W. Swartwout, certifying officer for the CWA in Boston, make a complete check of the financial condition of CWA projects in Boston to ascertain how many workers have been employed in excess of project requirements, and how much of the allotted money for the projects remains. All men in excess of project needs will be discharged.

With payrolls checked with project requirements it is hoped that the excess will be discovered and the information brought to Chairman Bartlett, who has been told by Boston officials that Boston is actually 1200 under the job allotment given the city at the start of the civil works program. There are 17,000 persons working in Boston on projects financed mostly by the federal government.

STAGE PROTEST

Four-score CWA workers who had been suspended from a project in the tax collector's office thronged CWA headquarters on the 10th floor of 49 Federal street. They had visited the Boston CWA administrator, Walter V. McCarthy, and protested against loss of employment and McCarthy told them that they would be assigned to work on another project without loss of pay.

Nelson and Swartwout were brought on the carpet before Bartlett to explain. They said that Daniel Nory, foreman of the project, had accepted 44 men requisitioned from the welfare department, found the men incompetent for the work and asked for others.

Cook is a skilled journeyman wood, wire and metal lath worker and has held all offices in local 72. He has had charge of many large jobs and is vice-president of the Boston building trades council and former member of the executive board of the Massachusetts Labor Union. He was urged by James T. Moriarty, president, and Robert J. Watt, secretary-treasurer of the Massachusetts State Federation of Labor, Ernest A. Johnson, secretary-treasurer of the building trades council, and Representative James P. Mehan.

Mansfield Announces CWA Recreation Project

An emergency committee on health and recreation to supervise a public recreation project financed under the CWA and intended to provide employment for 247 persons was announced by Mayor Mansfield yesterday.

The purpose is to make available more adequate free facilities for recreation, education and enjoyment, such as indoor athletic sports, entertainments, orchestral and choral groups, dramatic productions and arts and crafts work.

Employment will be given gymnasium directors, swimming instructors, boxers and wrestlers, supervisors of reading and game rooms and directors of music, arts and crafts, drama and women's activities.

The mayor will meet tonight at a dinner at the Hotel Westminster with neighborhood leaders with whom he will discuss the methods of making the proposed program popular in various sections of the city. The central committee consists of the following:

Under the direction of Mrs. Henry Howard of Newport, national president of the association, these drives have been going on all over the country since 1921. From the day when she was asked if she would take the job, and on accepting, was presented with 250,000 books, scattered all over the world, she has done a tremendous job.

John P. Cook of 136 Robbins road, Arlington, was suggested by union representatives to be the labor adjustment officer of the CWA in this state and the appointment was approved by Chairman Bartlett yesterday.

TO CONTACT LABOR

Cook will contact organized labor and receive complaints, which he will transmit to CWA officials for investigation and confirmation. Information obtained will be given to Bartlett for a decision. No action was taken by Bartlett on the suggestion of the union leaders that CWA skilled workers be re-classified and where found to be

Book Drive

Stacked up in the basement of the Public Library is one of the most motley assortments of books ever collected. It represents three days of collecting by the Junior League for the American Mercantile Marine Libraries, and totals more books than were collected in two months of the drive last year.

Every sort of book is to be found there, for people evidently have varying ideas of what seamen like to read. Among the books which could be seen at a casual glance in the basement today were "The Bishop's Jaegers," and "The Mind and Words of Jesus," "All Passion Spent" shouldered "Miss Petticoats." Then there was "Dr. Smith's Classical Mythology."

Two volumes dealing thoroughly with the Baconian theory of Shakespeare (George Frisbie, please notice) are offered. Charles Francis Adams' address over the radio, which opened the drive, brought out, among other contributions, from an ironical friend, "Sixty Years Since," by Charles Francis Adams—alas for friendship, a presentation copy. There was considerable discarding in George Eliot and A. S. M. Hutchinson, while someone sent in "Games and Parties for Children." Probably the most remarkable gathering was someone's old checkbook—which incidentally, made very gay reading, for it recorded such items as Party for Miss C—$24.60 and For Rent of Blank Ballroom, $60.

After the drive is over, an official of the association will come on from New York and look the books over. He will decide what books are worth keeping and what should be junked. Then lots are made up for the various ships. If the seamen have made no special requests, the ship is allotted a neat green wooden chest of books, sixty per cent fiction and forty per cent non-fiction. Special requests, however, can very often be filled. One sailor wrote in to ask for what amounted to a five-foot shelf—and got the order filled. Another, perhaps one who had been long in Mohammedan countries, requested the Koran, and no doubt is now a True Believer in consequence.

These chests of books have "traveled all over the world. Such a chest went with Admiral Byrd to Little America, on the last trip he made there. When he returned without the books, he wrote an apology to the association, declaring that they only escaped with their lives, and, therefore, were not able to bring the books along. But perhaps he has found them again on this trip. Curiously enough, one book did return from Little America, all unknown to the admiral. It was found several months later on the New York. The cook had discovered a passion for whaling.

When the seamen on any ship have finished reading their library, they may exchange it for another at any of the association's despatch offices, which are at Baltimore, Boston, New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, Providence, San Francisco, Sault Ste. Marie and Seattle.

The Librarian

LOVERS of scholarship and beautiful prose—as that includes all library workers, 22 course—welcome the continuation of the articles on fifteenth century books in the Boston Public Library, which Dr. Zoltan Haraszty began in the November, 1929, issue of More Books, the library bulletin. The present issue and the preceding one devote generous space to the Spanish Incunabula, which is perhaps the rarest of all, in fortunate possession of the library.

In America, particularly, Dr. Haraszty points out, Spanish Incunabula are scarce and once he recalls with pride, the four thousand volumes of the Ticknor Library, which includes all the Spanish Incunabula in the Boston Public Library, constituted one of the three richest collections of early Spanish books outside Spain. The Ticknor Library, with the additions acquired through the income of the Ticknor Fund, numbers over seven thousand volumes today. It is still one of the most valuable collections of early Spanish books to be found anywhere.

The number of Incunabula, admits the editor of More Books, is small even in the Ticknor Library. In all, the group consists of twelve volumes, besides two items which bear fifteenth-century dates, but which were undoubtedly produced later. Seven cities are represented in it, and all twelve books were issued by different printers.

As an example of Dr. Haraszty's magnificent use of English, which is to him an acquired language, the Librarian offers the following paragraph, particularly the final sentence.

"The majority of the early printers of Spain—according to Hoeber, about two-thirds—were Germans; but once in Spain, these foreign craftsmen adapted their style to the spirit of their new country. Thus the Spanish Incunabula possess distinctive national characteristics which one cannot fail to recognize even at first sight.

The frequent use of the woodcut on the liturgical, mainly showing a coat-of-arms, is one of the peculiarities of fifteenth-century Spanish books; the other produced by Lambert Palmart in 1474 at Valencia were printed with Roman type, during the next thirty years, however, hardly a single volume was printed in Spain with that type. Only Gothic characters were used, composed of heavy strokes and impressed upon the paper with an abundance of ink. But the heaviness of the page is usually relieved by the generous spacing of the letters—separating, so to speak, the black and white areas of the page. The result is a certain gravity and splendor, a quality which one is accustomed to associate with the spirit of Spain."

The Boston Public Library was the first institution in the country, according to More Books, to make out a payroll for works done under the CWS and C.W.A. In all, over 700 persons have found employment at the library on the projects which have been put into execution under the Civil Works Service and Civil Works Administration—nearly as many people as are regularly employed in the library system.

The most important work started under the auspices of the CWS is the complete overhauling of the library's card catalogue. Since 1899 the catalogue cards of the library have been printed in uniform size with those of the Library of Congress, but before that date they were made on a wider measure. The need for replacing these old cards with new ones of the size of the cards of the Library of Congress has been felt for a long time. For once this change is effected, the Boston Public Library will be able to order catalogue cards, at least for a large number of its new books, from the Library of Congress—a practice which is followed by most libraries of the country. It has been estimated that the number of old cards thus to be replaced is about 650,000. Considering, however, that besides the public card catalogue in Bates Hall the library has also an official card catalogue, and further that additional sets of cards have to be made for the catalogues in the Fine Arts, Music and Rare Books Departments, the number of cards which actually have to be made over is about 1,450,000.

As is well known, all the CWS and C.W.A. projects must be completed before Feb. 15; that is, in about ten weeks. To finish the huge task in this short time, the Library authorities have employed no less than 450 typists, all women, who are working in two shifts, for five hours each day in a six-day week. In addition, eight linotype operators and pressmen have been engaged to work in two shifts—besides the regular staff—in the library's printing department at the same time eight photographers are working on such jobs as can best be done by photographic process. Together with group supervisors and proofreaders, 611 persons have been employed on the recataloguing. The total cost—including the time of members of the regular library staff who are working with the group—is estimated at a little over $125,000.

A second project which is being put into effect under the CWS is the cataloguing of the picture and architectural collections, mainly in the fine arts department. Ten persons, trained in these special fields, are doing this work. The expense involved is $3000.

Under the auspices of the Civil Works Administration forty-five men have been employed to clean the books and thirty-seven painters to do all kinds of painting jobs in both the central library and the branches. Over $24,000 will be expended on these labors.

The library of Mrs. Henry D. Hughes of Philadelphia, to be sold by her order at the American Art Association and Anderson Galleries, New York, the evening of Jan. 25 and the afternoon and evening of Jan. 26, following its exhibition commencing Jan. 20, comprises fine bindings, including superb signed examples by T. J. Cobden-Sanderson; books illustrated by Cruikshank, Rowlandson, Alken and other prominent English illustrators; literature relating to the fine arts; French illustrated books, and first editions of other important books. There is also an extremely interesting group of autograph material and some fine bronzes of Lincoln and Napoleon.

The four splendid signed bindings by Cobden-Sanderson include William Morris's "Love is Enough," first edition, London, 1873, magnificently bound by Cobden-Sanderson for F. S. Ellis. It is signed and dated "1887." Laid in is Cobden-Sanderson's autograph bill for the binding, amounting to twenty guineas. A very fine copy of Coleridge's "Sibylline Leaves," first edition, London, 1817, is another of this group and it is dated "1838." James Russell Lowell's "A Year's Life," first edition, Boston, 1841, signed and with the date, "1892," has the Cobden-Sanderson's autograph bill for the binding, amounting to twenty guineas. Tennyson's "Poems by Two Brothers," London, 1827, is another of this group of superb signed Cobden-Sanderson bindings.

Writings of Walt Whitman include the first edition of his "Leaves of Grass," Brooklyn, 1855; an autograph presentation copy of "Specimen Days & Collect," one of a few copies issued for presentation purposes only; and the autograph manuscript, written on the thirteen pages of the "Song of the Universal," considered one of Whitman's finest poems. There is also a collection of first editions, autograph letters and autograph manuscripts by Oscar Wilde. The autograph manuscript of his "Phrases and Philosophies for the Use of the Young" is written on eight pages and signed. The complete autograph manuscript of Lafcadio Hearn's "The Story of Ito Noritaka," occupies forty-seven numbered pages, the last of which is inscribed in the lower margin "Lafcadio Hearn, Tokyo, Japan, July 9th, 1904."

A most remarkable and desirable item is a collection of autographs by Napoleon and members of his family, which includes letters and documents, signed by Napoleon, autograph letters by his mother, Letizia Bonaparte, by the Empresses Josephine and Marie Louise, and one by Napoleon's son, the King of Rome. Another fine group comprises autograph letters, documents, etc. of statesmen, generals, orators, authors, lawyers, financiers and others who played a prominent part in the French Revolution; 24 pieces in all, including a document signed by Louis XVI and a fine autograph letter signed by Lafayette.

A well-rounded and interesting program has been arranged for the mid-winter meeting of the Massachusetts Library Club, to be held Friday and Saturday, Jan. 26 and 27. The first day's meeting will be held at the Boston Public Library, with the following list of speakers:

10:00—Welcome. Milton E. Lord, director, Boston Public Library.

CWA GRAFTERS BARRED FOREVER FROM PAYROLLS

60 MEN DUPED BY CRUDE PLOT IN CHARLESTOWN

Discharged After Presenting Forged Work Slips—Politician Blamed

PROBE OPENS TODAY ON LIBRARY PROJECT

Workers at Nashua Street Employment Offices Deny Collusion

Duped by a scheme "so crude and stupid it couldn't possibly work," 60 Charlestown residents, discharged from the civil works administration for presenting forged assignment slips, yesterday were barred from future employment by the CWA.

Never at any time was there the remotest chance that they would get on the regular CWA payroll because of the fact that they had only one slip, whereas four copies were needed for the payroll, audit and files, Everett L. Hanna, superintendent of the state CWA employment office at 100 Nashua street, said yesterday.

POLITICIAN BLAMED
A Charlestown politician, who either "couldn't say no" or wanted to "seem a good fellow," was accused of four-fifths when he pretended he had a "peer" by mailing out the forged slips, it was learned.

In order to have the scheme work, he would have had to make out the slips in quadruplicate, and somehow sneak them into the various files. Instead, he or his supporters merely mailed out the original forged slip to the job applicant and trusted to luck that he might blunder on to the payroll somehow.

Theodore Munney, comptroller of the Boston Public Library, and Hanna will have a conference at 10 A. M. today on a report that some of the work slips on the public library projects bore no assignment number. This may require a check of 600 persons on library jobs, many of whom were supplied by the public welfare department.

Meanwhile, employees of the state CWA employment office at 100 Nashua street felt that undue reflection had been cast on their office.

"Why, those work slips could have easily been obtained without collusion from anyone in this office," officials said. "Samples of them were free as air at the recent meeting of Massachusetts mayors at the Gardner auditorium at the State House when CWA projects were discussed."

Hanna said that seven, and sometimes eight, of his subordinates were authorized to use his signature in signing work slips, but that there was no possibility the slips might have been obtained during confusion attending the rush of work in the early days of the CWA. In fact, those making out

Exposes Fraud

the slips were in a private room, protected from the importunities of job seekers or politicians.

ALL SLIPS FORGED
The forged signature of Hanna on all slips was apparently in the same handwriting, and belonged to a person too intoxicated or illiterate to see there wasn't the remotest possibility his scheme would work.

None of the victims questioned yesterday would admit he knew the identity of the Charlestown politician suspected. Several admitted they supposed they had obtained their jobs by "influence," but said they thought that was the usual thing, as all government jobs were awarded that way.

Several said they had asked so many persons to help them that they hadn't any idea which of the group was responsible for the appearance of the forged work slips in their mail-boxes. Some of the slips had been dropped into mail boxes by secret messenger and never went through the mails.

Asked whether any of the discharged men would be reemployed to work Hanna said, "I don't think so." There were about 55,000 legitimate applicants for the 15,000 jobs in Boston.

FRAUD ELSEWHERE
Although officials said they did not think any more were to be fired for presenting the crudely-forged slips, reports were current that the fraud had been practised elsewhere than in Charlestown, and that politicians had solicited a $5 weekly cut from would-be job candidates. It was said that a Dorchester legislator had been handing out slips.

These reports were branded "politics" by CWA officials, who denied knowledge of guards being placed at the doors of the offices of suspected politicians in Boston street office buildings.

They said that in some instances men had been sent to places where there apparently were jobs corresponding to their project assignments, but that in other cases they arrived to find there were no jobs.

Atty. Gen. Warner, Gen. Daniel Needham, commissioner of public safety, postal inspectors, state CWA investigators, United States Atty. Francis J. W. Ford, and Ford's assistants held long conferences yesterday before federal investigators left for 100 Nashua street to obtain samples of clerks' handwriting and question witnesses.

OBLIGED TO SWEAR
It was said that in applying for all jobs under federal control applicants were obliged to swear they had not paid for influence, nor obtained any, and that it might be found this law was violated.

Participating at a 90-minute conference were Ford, Asst. U. S. Atty. John T. Canavan, who has charge of NRA and CWA violations; Asst. U. S. Atty. William T. McCarthy, in charge of using the mails in a scheme to defraud; John J. Breslin, chief of the New England postal district; Postal Inspector Thomas J. Guiney; John H. Morris, counsel for the Massachusetts CWA; and John J. Power, head of the investigating branch of the CWA.

Investigators stated that they will take the fingerprints of employees who have handled the assignment cards for the CWA projects. It was proposed to obtain the fingerprints yesterday, but the plan was sidetracked. Officials said last night they did not want to subject any official or employee to embarrassment until they have obtained sufficient evidence to bring about one or more arrests.

BARTLETT ASKS ALIBIS OF 3 ON CWA MIXUP

Finds 1050 Hired for
450 Authorized

Joseph W. Bartlett, generalissimo of all CWA activities in Massachusetts, today summoned three of the men who are directing much of the work in Boston to his office to demand explanations why 1050 men were hired for school house projects, when only 450 had been authorized, and why the work week was cut from five to four days.

Those who retired behind closed doors to do the explaining are William W. Drumney, Boston superintendent of school house inspection; Walter V. McCarthy, director of the municipal welfare department; and Mr. J. McCarthy, head of the local federal re-employment agency.

It was understood in well-informed circles that Drumney would point out he was forced to order his foremen to put workers on a four-day week in order to make available funds last until Feb. 16, as required.

McCarthy and McCarthy, who supply the workers for all CWA jobs, however, gave no indication of their defense for allotting an extra 600 men to the schoolhouse projects.

PROBERS ASSIGNED
Meanwhile, Louis Glavis, chief investigator for the Department of the Interior, was busy assigning his men to various phases of the probe into alleged CWA irregularities in this part of the state.

Of prime interest to the Teapot Dome oil lease exposé were the forged work cards found in the possession of CWA workers in the Boston public library, at City Hospital, on municipal public works department jobs and other projects in and near Boston.

Everett L. Hanna, superintendent of the CWA employment agency at 100 Nashua st., whose name was forged to the cards, said today that while the cards obviously were genuine federal forms, they had not been taken from his office.

THEFT SUSPECTED

They must have been stolen from the printer or from the office of Mr. Bartlett, he said, because all cards are put through a serial numbering machine as soon as they are received in the Nashua st. office. The forged cards were numbered with a rubber stamp, he said.

While he was disclaiming any knowledge of reports that the forged cards had been distributed by political office holders, 75 men, who had just been discharged from CWA jobs at City Hospital, entered to protest their summary dismissal.

Investigation quickly revealed they had described themselves as skilled workers, but had been unable to make good that claim, according to those in charge. They were told that, under the circumstances, nothing could be done for them.

Junior League Gathering Books for Sea Library

Seamen Find Good Book Is Friend and Teacher During Hours When Not on Duty—Ask for Your Old Book

By TIM KEANE

"I sometimes wonder if the people ashore realize how much the men who go down to the sea in ships appreciate good reading matter. When 'eight bells' go, and the watch changes, the watch below finds itself with a few hours of leisure. It is then that a good book is a friend indeed."

LET LEAGUE DECIDE
This is quoted from an interesting letter written by a sailor aboard one of the ships in our merchant marine. It was written to the American Merchant Marine Library Association—the organization that is making a drive this week, from Monday to Saturday, inclusive, for books and magazines for these seamen not in the navy.

In Boston this "Book Week" is being conducted by a committee of the Junior League, headed by Mrs. U. Haskell Crocker. The others on the committee are Mrs. Ralph Williams, Jr., book collector; Miss Louise Batchelder, postmistress; Mrs. Lincoln Pierce, women's clubs; Mrs. Alexander Ladd, cards of solicitation; Miss Marion Williams, public libraries; and Mrs. Morgan Harris, public library.

It is up to us all to look through our bookcases, attics and cellars, and gather together whatever books and magazines we may have read, put away and forgotten. Now is the time to put this reading matter to a good use—to give it to these seamen; not to leave it about to be thrown away later, perhaps, without accomplishing a good purpose.

Contrary to the belief of many not associated with this work, the seaman is a serious person. Forty per cent. of the books that they ask for are non-fiction, on technical, biographical, historical and other like subjects. Even women's magazines are appreciated. After the seamen have read the fiction in them they are passed on to their wives, or find their way to other ships; German, British and even Mexican. Their wives and other women who can not afford to buy fashion magazines, often use the dress patterns displayed, and thereby keep up to date.

These books and magazines may be sent to the Maritime Library Association's dispatch office in the basement of the Boston Public Library at Copley square, or to the Junior League at Zero Marlboro street, at Arlington street. The committee will be glad to call for books that donors may be unable to bring or send. The league's telephone is: KENmore 9640.

One point that should be stressed is: send everything and anything that isn't juvenile. Some people might think, "That isn't any good. They wouldn't want this, it's all mixed up." Leave it to the league to decide!

land library in the world that caters exclusively to the reading wants of the many men in our coast guard, light-houses, lightships, and on freighters and steamships; all those seamen not connected with and enjoying the benefits of the navy. With dispatch officers in the eight most important ports in the country, it is known to seamen the world over.

These books are sent out in "libraries," or sea-going chests of about 75 books each, prepared for each ship from a list of requested books wired in before the ship arrives in port, or submitted in port if there is time enough for its compilation before departing. The books are then exchanged for others when the ship docks again, probably months later.

Forged CWA Cards Found at Library

of 610 Given Special Work

Ten Fraudulent Cards Disclosed

Identity of Suspected Forger Still Unrevealed by Postal Men

Extension of the CWA forgery scandal into the ranks of 610 workers given special employment at the Boston Public Library was revealed today, when an investigation revealed that ten persons had been working on Civil Works Administration cards which proved to be fraudulent. A federal inquiry was immediately opened in an attempt to trace those responsible for the forged and stolen work cards, seventy of which have been revealed within three days.

The situation at the library was revealed when officials, their suspicions aroused when news of the forgeries became public on Thursday, began an inquiry into the work cards of the 610 persons, assigned to re-typing catalogs compiled prior to 1899.

A number of suspect cards were found, and a check-up was begun with E. L. Hanna, manager of the Federal re-employment service in Massachusetts. It was found that Hanna's signature had been forged to the cards, ten forgeries being disclosed among the forty suspected cards. A full check will be made on all the cards presented at the library, it was announced, and it was hoped that enough evidence may be turned up to build a definite case against the Boston politician who is believed to have caused the slips to be given out for political purposes of his own. Like the previous forgeries, the work cards are said to have been stolen.

CWA officials were investigating, also, complaints that incompetent persons had been sent to the library to work and that certain CWA workers had been discharged to make way for friends of a library official.

Since the case was turned over to postal inspectors Thursday, no word has been forthcoming as to progress in the hunt for the suspected politician. Charges of misuse of the mails and larceny of Government property are to be made against persons responsible.

WILL FIRE CWA LIBRARY GROUP

Probable Action Follows
Check of Assignment
Cards for Jobs

Several CWA workers at the Boston Public Library will probably be discharged or suspended as a result of a check of assignment cards for work, which failed to reveal necessary duplicate cards at the state CWA office at 100 Nashua street.

Theodore Munney, comptroller of the library, following an investigation directed by himself for the past several days, went to the office of Everett L. Hanna, superintendent of the state CWA employment office today to confer with Hanna for the purpose of making a check-up to determine whether workers were being properly assigned to the library project.

Hanna placed the cards at his disposal and with an assistant, Munney began a search to determine whether duplicates of the assignment cards he had received were on file at the employment office. In several instances no duplicate cards could be found.

Munney then called upon John J. Powers, chief investigator of the CWA in this state, to assist him in the investigation.

ACTION FORCED
Though other developments may arise to disprove the theory, it appears from the failure to find duplicate cards, that the workers were improperly assigned to the jobs at the library. If such is the case there seems to be no alternative but to discharge or suspend them. In the mean time, the investigation into the issuing of forged work slips continued as inspectors endeavored to verify or discredit reports that city councilmen and state representatives and senators were in possession of blocks of certificates.

Some 60 Charlestown residents, who were suspended for presenting forged assignment slips, have been barred from future employment by the CWA, it was reported today.

The attempt to secure work for men through the forged slips was characterized as "so crude and stupid that it could not possibly work." CWA officials explained that the slips are made out in quadruplicate and that in addition to the slip given to the worker, three others would have to be placed in files, which was highly impracticable.

CLERKS INDIGNANT

Meanwhile workers at the state CWA employment office at 100 Nashua street resented the implication that they had the exclusive opportunity of securing the work slips. "Samples of them were as free as the air at the recent meeting of mayors at the Gardner auditorium," it was said.

CWA officials are inclined to believe that the issuing of the forged work slips is not nearly so widespread as had been reported. Rumors that some politicians had solicited a $5 weekly cut from potential workers were discounted and branded as "politics" by the officials.

Reports were also current that some of those on the pay-rolls on City Hospital jobs report only on pay day. Meantime CWA officials are considering changing the form or appearance of work slips, using specially printed paper which would be difficult to duplicate.

As the investigation around men workers continued, prospects of jobs for 2730 women were bright today. The assignments will be given out probably within the next few days as a result of authorization from Washington, which received all legal difficulties for beginning the state census of unemployed.

Mrs. Anna Page, director of the state unemployed census, had been unable to begin hiring women, because of two legal barriers. There were the ordering of census blanks from a local printer, rather than from the government printing office, and the question of using the franking privilege in the mails. Both these matters have now been adjusted satisfactorily.

ANY BOOKS TO SPARE?

Library For Every Ship the Aim of This Week's Drive Junior League Girls Are Making

BOOKS AND MAGAZINES MEAN A LOT TO THE MAN AT SEA

William McFee once remarked that it ought to be as unusual for a ship to sail without a library as for a town on shore to live without one.

Today, thanks to the American Merchant Marine Library Association, no ship flying the Stars and Stripes need sail from any of the principal ports on the Atlantic, Pacific and Gulf Coasts or on the Great Lakes without having on board one of the seagoing "libraries" of the AMMLA.

Well over a quarter-million books are now put in circulation annually, not only for the benefit of seamen in the American merchant marine but also for the men on comparatively lonely duty at light-houses, Coast Guard stations and on Coast Guard ships.

It all began back in the final years of the World War, when the sudden need for an American merchant marine was calling many of the youth of the land to sea. A social service bureau was organized to operate in conjunction with the United States Shipping Board Recruiting Service.

Began During the War

Mrs. Henry Howard became the chief of the Social Service Bureau. It soon became very apparent to her that the thousands of inexperienced young men pouring into the merchant marine needed vitally some form of intelligent recreation when they were off duty.

For the duration of the war the American Library Association cooperated to the extent of providing a free library service for merchant seamen in the important ports of the country. The great value of the work was amply demonstrated many times over, but the association did not feel it could continue the service after the war.

Mrs. Howard was then requested to organize a nonsectarian association to carry on the service. After many difficulties were overcome the American Merchant Marine Library Association was finally organized, in March, 1921.

Junior League in Charge

There was a good deal of pioneering to be done. Many ship owners were skeptical of the value of a library service for their employees. They did not believe that the seamen would read the books if they had them. The general public, counted on to supply the books, was unacquainted with the idea of such a service and for the most part did not realize the need of books for the men that go down to the sea in ships.

The first offices of the association were opened in Boston and New York. Year by year other offices were opened. Book drives were carried on all over the country to provide the 70-volume libraries that are sent on ocean "cruises."

One of these annual book drives is opening in Boston this week. Junior League girls are conducting the drive here in Boston.

They are appealing to any one having extra books of any nature at home to bring them during this week to the Boston Public Library. If you cannot bring the books to the Public Library yourself, you can telephone the book week committee at the Junior League headquarters and someone will call at your home and get the books.

Read Until It Disappears

Suppose, for instance, that you look over your books and discover that you have a mystery novel you are through with and no longer want. If that book is turned over to the AMMLA dispatch agent who happens in this city to be Paul F. Folsom of the Boston Public Library, he is likely to include it in one of the next "dispatch libraries" he sends out.

That means that your mystery story will be packed in a green box along with about 69 other books, fiction and nonfiction, and placed on a vessel. It may be a tramp steamer, headed down the coast. It may be a steamer bound for a warmer climate. It might even be one of the few remaining sailing vessels still in commission.

At any rate, your book and its mates will be an abundant source of pleasure and recreation to the members of the crew on whose boat it happens to land. When the vessel next comes to Boston, the green box will be exchanged for another box that looks just like it. The contents, however, will be different. Your book will then go out on another cruise, and another, and another, until it finally falls to pieces.

Of course, the AMMLA needs money on which to operate, as well as books to work with, but the main thing is the books, and they can be easily procured if the general public will only stop to consider for a minute the useful career that a book now neglected at home might have if sent to sea.

Issues a Book of its Own

The AMMLA not only distributes the books you give them, but it also has a book of its own which is enjoying a steadily wider circulation. It is the "Seamen's Handbook for Shore Leave," pocket-size edition which packs a million facts about nearly 400 principal ports of the world.

It tells the seamen about American Consulates, amusements, dental and medical clinics, inexpensive hotels, legal aid, laundries, libraries, seamen's homes, banks, and unions, points of interest, and other bits of information, condensed and readily accessible.

There are notes of warning, like the one appended to the information about the little port of Amapaia, Honduras, which adds succinctly "a poor place to get stranded." It is sensible and honest, as far as one can judge, and done from a practical point of view. The "dope" on Shanghai, for example, includes the valuable information that there is "bad liquor in the Hongneki district."

Another side of the AMMLA is the effort it makes to include at least a smattering of educational books in its dispatch libraries. Its efforts along this line have been recognized by the Carnegie Corporation, which saw fit a year or so ago to grant a small endowment to the association for educational purposes.

The subjects covered include astronomy, engineering, navigation, ocean commerce, refrigeration, seamanship, ship construction, and then a group of generally cultural subjects.

A Letter of Thanks

The association finds plenty of appreciation for its efforts among the seamen, the lighthouse tenders and the members of the Coast Guard force.

Here, for example, is a letter from the keeper of Minot's Light Station, off Scituate:

"I thank you very much for the books you sent to my station and we like them very much. When we have read them I will send them back and perhaps you can send some more. We like such books as mysteries, exploration, detective stories and history. Also if you have any book on Egyptology. There are some books on the station that we can send to your library if you would like to have them. At present the weather is too bad to take but necessities to the tower, but as soon as the conditions are better I will return the books."

In the face of many similar proofs of the gratification with which its work is received, the "public library of the high seas" naturally feels that its work is important and valuable, and undeniably worth continuing.

CHILDREN MAKE USE OF BOOKS

Movies Cause Them to Read More—Mystery Tales Popular

"Motion pictures, instead of being a distraction from reading, actually cause children to read more," Miss Alice M. Jordan, supervisor in charge of the children's room of the Boston Public Library, declared yesterday. "It has been noticed," she says, "that movies increase the child's interest in fast-moving tales of crime and its detection."

PREFER MYSTERIES

"In the last year or two," according to Miss Jordan, "children have shown a very distinct tendency toward a preference for mystery and more of the comparatively dark tales of crime. It is the type which, in the adult department, is called 'escape literature.'"

"Taking them as separate classes," she has found that, for the most part, girls choose stories concerning the home or about other girls. But boys like tales of adventure or stories about men of action who accomplish great things. In this respect, books about Theodore Roosevelt, Daniel Boone, and Richard E. Byrd, are frequently sought by the juvenile readers."

Begin to Use Library

In spite of the fast-moving stream of characters and scenes from foreign lands which attracts many older readers, children of the whole have been found to like stories with a setting in this country best.

"The particular age at which children begin to use the Public Library cannot be determined accurately," it was stated, "since this is a matter which differs with the individual. While the mental development of the child is an important factor, even more important is the appreciation of literature and education in general on the part of parents and guardians. Many mothers and fathers bring their youngsters to the library the first time and see to it that they learn how to make use of the opportunities there. Most children are introduced by older brothers and sisters or by older playmates."

Animal Stories and Fairy Tales

The only requirement necessary for a small child to get a library card is that he or she be at least in the third grade of school. Usually picture books and easy school readers initiate him into the world of book-knowledge. Many youngsters will take a book and merely study the words as they finger each line. Then come the animal stories, folktales, and fairy tales.

For the most part children come in to the library looking for picture books or a particular type of book. They are books which they have seen somewhere, heard about from their parents or which have been recommended to their school teachers.

The latest available figures showing juvenile circulation at the Boston Public Library indicate a growth of 31 per cent in the last five years. The corresponding period a decade ago, the latest figures are 214,392. Those for a decade ago are 138,000.

BIG CWA CLEANUP ASSURED

Workers in Medford and Brockton to Return Today

Thousands of men posing as skilled laborers who have obtained their jobs through political pull may be ousted this week as CWA officials prepared for the most drastic housecleaning in the brief history of the State Civil Works Board.

OFFICIALS MUST APPEAR

The 1400 people in Brockton on CWA projects, who were told that they would be laid off pending reclassification and investigation, will go back to work, as usual, this morning. Chairman Bartlett announced last night, and all officials connected with the Brockton situation must appear for a hearing at CWA headquarters, 41 Federal street, this afternoon at 3 o'clock.

It was declared that the CWA investigators who declared that work on the projects would be held up while the probe was in progress had no authority to do so.

900 in Medford to Return

The 900 employed on projects in Medford will also be returned to their jobs this morning, and CWA officials said last night that Mrs. Theresa A. St. Denis, who resigned as CWA administrator, will remain on the job until her resignation is accepted and her successor is appointed.

At the request of Chairman Bartlett, a committee of labor leaders, appointed for that purpose, will today present to him a number of concrete suggestions to guide him in his work of weeding out the unskilled workmen who are receiving the pay of skilled.

Will Act on Watt's Claims

Robert J. Watt, secretary-treasurer of the State Federation of Labor, and a member of the special committee named to draw up these recommendations, said last night that 10,000 skilled workmen in the building trades alone were idle in Greater Boston, while their places have been filled for the most part by unskilled men, who have taken advantage of a "drag" with a politician.

As soon as the recommendations have been studied, Chairman Bartlett said that he would push the work of reclassification with a corps of inspectors and investigators, who would act on the recommendations submitted by the labor committee.

Must Prove Selves Skilled

If these are adopted, it is believed that the skilled workman will have to furnish tangible proof that he is what he claims. In addition to a certificate, it is said that, in some cases, he will be forced to give a practical demonstration of what he can do after this.

Other charges now being investigated in various projects are that several workers were holding down two jobs at the same time and at different grades of pay, that cheap politicians and "sidewalk employment bureaus," and that scores of others were pushing their henchmen into the higher paying grades of jobs despite their lack of qualifications.

No Wrong Done Intentionally

Chairman Bartlett in commenting on some of the difficult problems that have followed in the wake of the rush to put idle men to work in this State, said that in one case an accountant had been put to work as a ditch digger. "Later on when a job was open for an accountant he was not able to apply because he was classed as employed. 'I have made thousands of mistakes myself in my drive to get men to work,' Chairman Bartlett summed it up, 'but not once have I intentionally done anything to harm anyone.'"

U. S. Officials Pushing Probe

While the State civil works officials moved to clean house, federal officials were pushing a probe to get at the bottom of a number of fraudulently issued work cards from the State CWA employment office at 100 Nassau street. Under the direction of the head of the investigation department of the Public Works Administration, Louis R. Glavis, a separate probe was being conducted in the manner in which both the PWA and the CWA are being conducted in New England.

Theodore D. Money, comptroller of the Boston Public Library, said last night that his own investigator is cooperating with federal investigators in tracing down doubtful work cards presented by some of the girls on the CWA project.

About 20 Cards Doubtful

Out of a force of 567 girls at present engaged in retying catalogue cards, Money said, he had discharged only three or four for incompetence. At the present time he said that about 20 cards, all bearing the signature of E. L. Hanna, State CWA employment director, were of doubtful authenticity. A. P. Skelley, chief investigator for the CWA, in a statement given to the press, last night, absolved Boston Public Library officials from all blame in the situation.

It was intimated, however, that Comptroller Money has not the power to discharge girls under the CWA regulations for incompetence and this angle will be taken up at a hearing at headquarters tonight.

The Sad State of Our Public Libraries

OUR STARVING LIBRARIES. Studies in Ten American Communities During the Depression Years. By R. L. Duffus. 148 pp. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.25.

WHAT has the depression done to our public libraries? The question is one of most serious importance, since they represent a capital investment of vast proportions, but still more because the service they render is of inestimable value. Mr. Duffus throws enough light on the question by this account of his first-hand investigation of the matter to make possible a definite answer at least for those within the circle of his observations. But since the ten cities whose libraries he visited are typical communities, the conditions he found and describes undoubtedly will hold equally true for cities all over the country.

In these ten libraries the essential facts were practically the same everywhere, although there was considerable variation in details and also in important considerations outside of the basic facts. The ten institutions which he studied were located in these cities: Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis, Louisville, Knoxville, Richmond, Baltimore, Brooklyn, New York and Springfield, Mass. They were, therefore, well representative of the Eastern Seaboard, both north and south, and of the mid-West region and in both the largest and the smaller cities. One missing name suggests thoughts with which libraries have much to do—Boston. A generation ago Boston would have appeared on any list, would still have led most lists of institutions or matters on the Eastern Seaboard concerned with things of the intellect. If now she has dropped to an unimportant place, it is her own fault. And she has become a solemn warning to all communities that if they neglect the things of the mind and the spirit there is an appalling penalty they will have to pay. Every one of the ten communities whose libraries Mr. Duffus has studied should read his book, remember Boston and begin to "feed up" their intellectual institutions, even if the depression has not yet finally cleared out, lest they, too, presently find themselves going the way Boston has gone.

In every city that he visited Mr. Duffus found the public library seriously handicapped by curtailment of its income, but called upon, nevertheless, to give increased and more crucially important service because of the dire need of its patrons for the help they hoped to find in it. He tells a splendid story of how, in every city, librarians and their staffs rose to the emergency and with sacrifice, resourcefulness and ingenuity did their best to meet the increasing needs. In Springfield the author found the best and most interesting situation, for that little city has taken better care of its library than has any other of the group of which he writes. Not until last year were the city appropriations for its maintenance cut, and then only slightly. So far as its readers were concerned, he says, "its problems were universal problems," and then he adds that "it differs from most other American cities, large and small, in that it has taken the obligation to guard its citizens against intellectual starvation almost as seriously as the obligation to guard them against physical starvation."

1400 KEPT IDLE IN BROCKTON DUE TO CWA FRAUDS

Project Suspended Until Star U. S. Investigators Fully Recheck Workers

SIGNATURES FORGED ON SLIPS THERE

Boston Library Official Quizzes 50 Women as To Their Cards

Continuing disclosures of irregularities in the CWA administration yesterday caused the suspension of work on which 1400 persons were employed in Brockton, until a complete recheck can be made of every worker. At the same time it became known that important inquiries into the irregularities were under way by star investigators sent from Washington.

ton will be out of jobs could not be estimated last night by Walter F. Hall, CWA manager, who said, however, that he would speed up reclassification as much as possible.

"There are many needy persons on CWA projects and I am anxious that they return to work as soon as possible," he said.

False statements in applications, forgery, political influence in obtaining jobs, and the disappearance of assignment blank or work slips from Hall's office were factors responsible for the order of federal investigators that all work cease until rechecks could be made.

FOLLOWS CONFERENCE. The questioning last night of women at work typing new index cards at the library, followed a conference earlier in the day between Hanna and Munney, at which comparison of records of the CWA office and of the library's employment lists disclosed several discrepancies. Several women admitted, it was reported, obtaining their slips through a state senator, whose name was supplied both to Hanna and Munney.

Reports reached newspapers that the women had been locked in a room during the questioning, but this was denied by Munney, who said the women had come home voluntarily. He declined to make any statement as to the extent of the frauds, or make public any of his findings.

The suspension of CWA work in Medford had no connection with the resignation of Mrs. St. Denis, who merely pleaded overwork, and inability to fill both the job of CWA administrator and chairman of the welfare board. Suspension was due to the fact that a month ago the number of employees on all projects was doubled. As a result, the available work was exhausted ahead of time, and no acceptable projects were ready and approved.

Boston's Cultural Heritage Finds Its Plumage Disturbed

Omission of Mention of Public Library in Survey of Libraries of 10 Representative Cities Causes Rumblings in Intellectual Circles

Omission of Boston from a recent survey of the libraries of 10 representative cities of the Middle West and the Eastern States has caused rumblings in library and cultural circles here.

Not many years ago Boston would have appeared at the head of any list concerning cultural matters. "Is this omission a blot on the escutcheon heretofore held so high above all comment or is it a warning that a city cannot rest upon its laurels of past glory?" is the question being asked.

In his book "Our Starving Libraries," Mr. Robert L. Duffus, New York Journalist, has surveyed the library situation during the depression in what he considers 10 representative cities of this section of the country. A chapter is devoted to each of the following cities: Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis, Louisville, Knoxville, Richmond, Baltimore, Brooklyn, New York, and Springfield, Mass. Mr. Duffus neglected to mention Boston.

Urged to "Feed Up"
A reviewer in the book review supplement of the New York Times points out that the omission of Boston in the survey intimates that Boston has fallen from its high pedestal. He recommends that other cities "remember Boston and begin to 'feed up' their intellectual institutions. . . lest they, too, presently find themselves going the way Boston has gone."

Mr. Milton Edward Lord, director of the Boston Public Library, when questioned as to what he considered was the status of the Boston Public Library compared with the other libraries of the country said, "From 1854, when the library was first opened, until the turn of the century Boston's Public Library was first among the great public libraries in the country."

"During the last quarter of the nineteenth century a great interest grew in the library field and such groups as the American Library Association were formed to further the advancement of American literature. Libraries began springing up throughout the nation and it is not surprising that the last 25 years of the rest of the country has caught up with, and in some instances passed, 'the literary capital' of America. That is progress. By that I do not mean that Boston has not continued to progress, but to point out that Boston's great lead has been cut down. It is only natural in a nation where cultural aspiration is so high that each city should make an attempt to reach and surpass the heights attained by other cities."

Demand as Great
He pointed out that the increase in demand for library facilities has been just as great, if not greater here, than in any other city in the country. It must also be noted, he said, that Mr. Duffus took only extreme cases both good and bad in his survey.

That Boston has not lost its reputation as a literary or cultural center was pointed out by Mr. Lord when he named three of the nation's finest libraries, two of them in the first ten, the Harvard Library, the Boston Athenaeum, and the Boston Public Library, as being in Boston. In these libraries are to be found many special exhibits unequalled in any other part of the United States. "There is a great appreciation for the Boston libraries throughout the country," Mr. Lord asserted.

As to pay cuts and dismissals of employees in the Boston Public Library, there have been graduated cuts in wages from 5 to 15 per cent in proportion to salaries. There have been few dismissals due to lack of appropriation. Mr. Lord said. While the circulation has increased to almost 65 per cent of what it was in 1929, in some instances doubling the work of employees, it has meant increased efficiency for the Boston libraries.

Decrease in Funds

"With the increase in circulation there has been a decrease, as elsewhere in the country, in the amount of money available for the purchase of new books," Mr. Lord said. "Wear and tear necessitating replacement eats up almost half of the book budget. Until 1931 there was an increase in the percentage of books purchased each year based on 1929 as the boom year. In 1932, however, the increase was only 14 per cent, a drop of 22 per cent under the previous year. And the all-time low was reached in 1933 with $75,000 the amount available for the purchase of new books, being 46 per cent less than in 1929. This year the trustees have asked the city for $150,000, or an increase of 7 per cent over the 1929 base."

"A library must keep abreast of the times and to keep up a large circulation we must purchase books not only of quality, of educational type, but also books for the fiction in Republican ranks over the announcement that Mrs. Elizabeth Taylor, said Mr. Lord. "It is evident that if circulation is built up it will mean an increase in personnel, which in turn will place a hand on the purse strings of the city."

"Boston has not fallen below standard," concluded Mr. Lord. "It has not, on the other hand, advanced as rapidly as other communities who felt a greater need to build up their social and cultural standards. Boston has sent many well qualified librarians out into other parts of the country which fact, in itself, proves the high standards of Boston's intellectuality have not been lowered."

Lowell Courier-Citizen TUESDAY, JANUARY 30, 1934.

A Book on "Our Starving Libraries" by R. L. Duffus, disclosing conditions at ten leading public libraries, includes no notice of the Boston Public Library. A New York Times reviewer concludes that Boston is off the library map. That is good Gothamite journalism, from the viewpoint of the parochial Manhattanite. B. P. L., at the same time, is still, in respect of the size and importance of its collections, one of the world's foremost libraries, and its various services, even in this depressed time, are remarkably well maintained. The monthly publication "More Books," admirably edited, is in evidence of the continual growth of this pioneer free public library. Its appropriations and investments are doubtless not what the trustees wish they were, but no habitual user of the library facilities at Copley Square can be otherwise than indignant over the Times's suggestion that library managements in other cities "remember Boston and begin to 'feed' up their intellectual institutions lest they too presently find themselves going the way Boston has gone." Rot!

STORY TIME FOR ADULTS AT LIBRARY

Novel Experiment in Entertainment for Tomorrow

Men and women in all walks of life will turn back the pages to the days of their childhood tomorrow night. They'll become boys and girls again for an hour as they listen to stories told by Boston's official story-teller.

AUDIENCE UNUSUAL

The unusual and variegated Sunday night audience, ranging from the Back Bay intelligentsia to the boys from the Boston Common, will get their first taste of story telling since they were young.

The average man or woman never loses his childhood love for a story. And many of the same tales that held their rapt attention years ago still can make them forget their worries and cares. At least, that's the belief of the authorities at the Boston Public Library, and they'll give their theory a laboratory experiment at 8 o'clock tomorrow night.

A Sunday night programme is held each week in the Lecture Hall of the Public Library. Usually it attracts a gathering of from 500 to 700 persons. There's no admission charge, and the audience hails from such extremes as the benches of the Common and the finest mansions of the Back Bay.

A musical concert has been scheduled for tomorrow evening. But last-minute changes forced its cancellation and left those in charge with a problem as to entertainment. The Library officials seized the opportunity to offer a programme of story-telling for the grown men and women who gather on Sunday nights.

John J. Cronan of West Roxbury, Boston's official story-teller, attached to the Library staff, who entertains some 10,000 children weekly, will relate his tales for the edification of the grown-ups. While he has not yet definitely planned his programme, it was indicated last night that he will tell the adults virtually the same stories he unfolds to junior high school and high school boys and girls.

Knows 1000 Stories

Story-telling is something entirely new for the Library's Sunday night entertainment. There have been readings before. But Mr. Cronan gets up before his audience and tells them the stories just as many of his audience may have answered the plea "Tell me a story!" The difference is that Mr. Cronan is a professional story-teller. It's his life-work.

It is expected that Mr. Cronan will tell some tales of the sea—perhaps of adventures in the days of the clipper ships and the gold rush era. He also may include a tale or two of Dickens.

The story-teller himself explained last night that he employs an audience psychology in selecting his tales, deciding upon some of them as he goes along, observing closely the reactions of his listeners and the manner in which the different types of stories hold their interest.

Mr. Cronan, incidentally, has a repertoire of more than 1000 different narratives. And while this will be his first attempt at providing the library entertainment for adults, he is famous among the school children of Boston.

The boys and girls, ranging in age from the little ones in the primary grades to those preparing for college, have heard his stories and clamored for more. Visitors have marveled at the rapt attention of the usually fidgety youngsters during his story-telling hours. They sit, absorbed in the unfolding narrative, seemingly hardly daring to breathe.

It will be just the same with the men and women tomorrow night, the library attendants believe. They're sure to get a tremendous kick out of it. They'll become boys and girls again, and love it," one library official declared last night.

Tomorrow night and some 500 widely different men and women should test their ideas.

CWA Workers at Library Unearth $20,000 in Rare Volumes

By John Bright

The Boston Public Library finds itself $20,000 richer than it was a few weeks ago, and strangely enough, it owes this accession of wealth to the discoveries of nine hitherto unemployed cataloguers who were glad to get a few weeks' work under CWA.

These expert bibliophiles, familiar with 14 different languages came upon many rare volumes in surveying the material at the library. Among them a Portuguese tract of the 17th century dealing with early America and several valuable finds of local interest including Moody's "Souldery Spiritualized," published in Cambridge in 1647; Thatcher's "The Saints Victory and Triumph," published in Boston in 1696; and an 1850 edition of James Russell Lowell's "A Fable for Critics." All of these were withdrawn from the files and placed in the rare books room with a number of other valuable volumes, including De Bry's "Collectionum Navigationum," the value of which is estimated at about $1500.

The library also took advantage of the special knowledge of one of its cataloguers to have the Mathew Brady collection of war pictures completely rearranged. More than 1000 original photographs, many of them taken by Brady during the civil war, are included in this collection which is now considered the best of its kind in the country.

Although highly interesting in themselves these two projects are merely part of the larger job of bringing the card catalogue system of the Boston Public Library up-to-date, a task which is giving employment to 613 recently idle persons.

Typists to the number of 480, together with 40 proof readers, 63 supervisors, and an extra force of printers, typesetters, and photographers have been added to the library's regular crew.

When they finish the job nearly a million and a half cards, representing all the cataloguing that had been done at the Boston Public Library since its founding in 1852 to the year 1899 will be replaced and recopied to conform to modern ideas.

Since 1900 the cards in the library catalogues have been printed uniform in size with those of the Library of Congress, but before that year they were made on a measure half an inch longer. The need of replacing these old cards with new ones conforming to those in the Library of Congress has been apparent for a long time but money to accomplish this work never happened to be forthcoming until CWA funds became available. These funds were pooled with money coming from the civil works service, which is part of the federal emergency relief administration, yielding a total sum of $107,000 which will be spent on the undertaking.

To understand the need of the change taking place we will have to go back to the year 1899 when Herbert Putnam, distinguished librarian of the Boston Public Library went to Washington to assume similar duties with the Library of Congress. Mr. Putnam had found his ingenious ideas impossible to put into effect in Boston because of the system currently established in the old library. At that time the notion prevailed that the process of cataloguing a book was a personal matter depending largely on the genius of the cataloguer. No system was followed. Many of the cards were hand written, and annotations were geared to the intelligence of the person who did the work.

When Mr. Putnam went to Washington he adopted as standard, a card five inches long and three inches wide.

Since it is necessary for every author to file with the Library of Congress two copies of his work which comes under the eye of professional cataloguers, Mr. Putnam conceived the idea that it would save the library thousands of dollars yearly if he had extra copies of the Library of Congress cards printed and offered them for sale. In this way the library could save the cost of cataloguing each new book as it was published since this work would have to be done at the Library of Congress anyway.

Mr. Francis Watts Lee, who for 40 years has had charge of printing at the Boston Public Library, foresaw the day when all cards would be of uniform size and in anticipation of that even he began printing, in 1900, all Boston library cards with half an inch of margin on the right side of the card so that if they had to be made to conform to the standard size all that would be required would be to shave off that extra half inch of white paper he had left as a margin.

His foresight in this respect is destined to save the city many thousands of dollars.

Imagine the problem confronting Mr. Theodore D. Money, comptroller of the library, when the 480 typists and other CWA workers descended upon him to bring the antiquated cards printed before 1900 up to date. Since cataloguing had been a matter of personal skill in the early days of the library more than a dozen different systems appeared on the old cards. These had to be copied to conform to a standard system. To accomplish this each typist had to be schooled in her duties and her efforts had to be directed by supervisors who also had to study the system before they could apply it.

The object of providing the greatest possible amount of work for the largest possible number of people also had to be considered. Thus, an arrangement was made whereby all the cards written or printed in English was reserved for the typist. But when cards were found containing annotations in a foreign language they were photographed by what is known as the Dextigraph process and reduced to the proper size.

Working two shifts a day 28,000 cards were copied, proofread and filed. Only the finest linen paper was used, which cost about $5500 to complete the new catalogue.

As a practical venture the work is expected to pay for itself within about five years. It already costs the library $55,000 a year to catalogue its new books and printing services add $20,000 more to this amount. After the new system is completed it will be possible to purchase cards for all new publications from the Library of Congress effecting a saving which together with a saving in the library's printing expenses will, it is estimated, amount to about $20,000 a year.

Science of Gardening Depicted in Old Books

Rare Volumes on Subject, Showing Gardens of the Pharaohs Down to Present Time Part of Collection at Public Library

Within a few weeks your thoughts will turn from the frozen water pipes to that barren area between the garage and the clothesline.

BOOKS ON GARDENS

In preparation for the metamorphosis, the lore of gardeners to Egyptian Pharaohs, the sinister Medici and English country gentlemen is being marshalled for your use in the rare book rooms of the Boston Public Library, where is housed one of the most charming collections available to the public of Greater Boston.

Centuries of garden experiences are accumulated in the 1200 volumes of the Codman collection, to be consulted regularly by students, connoisseurs, owners of broad estates along our own salty North Shore, and John Suburbanite worried about the cabbages.

Brittle brown pages with dusty smells are warning that it's brocoli planting time right now, and that the joys are itching beneath their crust of gray ice.

Sleek white pages are bright with colorful rock garden, rural English garden, and formal lawns which are brightening the gloom in a glowing renaissance of gardening.

Diagrammed for the more ambitious are the majestic gardens in which Pharaohs reclined, luxuriant estates of feudal princes, Persian gardens reproduced on tapestries, Japanese gardens nurtured by artists who sought to fill the soul as well as the eye with delight, cozy "ladies' flower" gardens, rural, railroad, English, ancient Chinese, Spanish, Italian gardens, Elizabethan herb gardens and plans for beautifying New York and Boston.

Several volumes of extreme rarity are newly purchased for the collection as well as a set of 300 airplane views of famous estates in this country and abroad.

The newest acquisition is also the oldest book in the collection. It is an exposition of patterns for German and French gardens, supplemented by suggested designs. The title is "Le Jardin de l'Univers" in 1829. Four hundred engravings reveal characteristic German gardens as severely geometrical and the French as more elaborate with typical interlacing of garden paths in the form of lovers' knots.

Several have pavilions and kiosks in the centre of the pattern resembling the beautiful Rose windows of French cathedrals.

Another new and rare tome advises the reader that "Skill and Pains, bring Fruitful gains." The advice was proffered back in 1683 when the volume was printed for Hannah Sawbridge at the Sign of the Bible on Ludgate-Hill, London.

The expert warns that "Whosoever desireth and endeavoureth to have a pleasant and profitable orchard must if he be able provide himself of a Fruiterer. Religious, Honest, Skillful, in that Faculty, and therewith Painful. Such a gardener, he promises, will make the Clouds drop fatness upon your trees."

In addition to practice of religion, honesty and skill, it might also help a nearby treatise called "The Return of the Gardener" adds if the gardener refresh his seeds with "rainwater, prefer'd in clsters, in that falling from on high the air and of the fire which gives us life and consequently cannot but render gardens extremely fertile."

These old volumes are frequently introduced by an engraved frontispiece depicting statuesque classical ladies in the business of emptying classical urns over the root of a sapling.

Innumerable stories attached to flowers, fruit and vegetables are recounted in such books as "The Gardener's Companion. Directing the Culture of the Kitchen-Garden, Melonry and Early Cucumbers, &c. in an Alphabetical and Chronological Manner." Published in Dublin, or in a pretentious modern folio listing plants for sunny and shady rock gardens. If the visitor is curious to see the first facsimile of the Vienna state library's manuscript of "Discoedies, written in the Levant 500 A. D."

The Codman landscape architecture collection was established by a gift of 651 volumes presented by Mr. and Mrs. James W. Codman of Brookline in Philip Codman landscape architects. Purchase annually of several rarities and new works too expensive to be acquired from the regular library funds was made possible by an additional gift of $2854.41 by some of Henry Sargent Codman's friends several years later. The result is notable as a minor collection. Guardians of the books are Miss Harriet Swift and Dr. Zoltan Haraszti.

EMBARRASSING MOMENT FOR BOY PRINCE HERE

Library Elevator Balked and Operator Asked
"Young Fellow" (Next King) to Step Out

By FRANK P. SIBLEY

Crown Prince Leopold, who will become King of the Belgians Friday, spent a day in Boston with his father and mother, in 1919.

It was a Sunday, and the royal family's day began by attending mass in the Cathedral of the Holy Cross. The writer of this story was one of the reporters who followed them all that day.

With a police escort the royal party swept across town to Copley sq., after the services at the Cathedral, to inspect the Public Library and a collection of Belgian war posters, on exhibition on the third floor. The King had been told of them, and the Queen knew of the Chavannes and the Abbey paintings, and wanted to see them. So the visit was made, though it was not on the original program.

It was so entirely impromptu that William Kenney, the chairman of the library trustees, got word only at the last minute that the Belgian royal family was coming, and arrived at the library in a frock coat and a broad tape to his eyeglasses, but without a shave.

The then Mayor Andrew J. Peters also had been notified, and was on the steps with Mr. Kenney to greet the royal party.

Prince, 16, in Uniform

Only four came in, with reporters trailing. They were—the King and Queen—a beautiful couple, with the slender beauty of the Queen showing clear against the statuesque dignity of His Majesty, who was fully 6 feet 4 inches tall, the Crown Prince, a boy of about 16 in the uniform of a private soldier in the Army, a little gilt tassels from the peak of his cap, and "Bill" Service man escorting

They climbed the grand staircase. Then the King lingered to look at the Chavannes murals, and the Queen went in to see the Abbey pictures of the Adventure of the Holy Grail. Neither said very much, though they looked keenly at the paintings. The boy stood respectfully beside his father, and said not a word. And Bill Nye had no eyes for pictures, but glanced rapidly at every possible door or nook from which danger to his charges might possibly come.

The posters were on the next floor and the party assembled to go up in the slow, weak, creaky elevator of the Public Library. The King and Queen, the Crown Prince, Bill Nye, Mayor Peters and William Kenney all crowded into the little car.

An Embarrassing Moment

Little Schramm, the elevator operator, was somewhat rattled by the importance of the party—and possibly more by what he knew of his elevator. Anyway, it happened. Mr. Kenney closed the door. Schramm threw the lever—and the elevator didn't budge.

Schramm looked timidly around. Then he said "I'm afraid some of us will have to get off, Mr. Kenney." "Of course," said Mr. Kenney, and reopened the door. He got out; Mayor Peters got out; Bill Nye got out; Schramm closed the door, and tried again. But the great weight had evidently jammed the clutches in the guides; the car wouldn't start.

Again Schramm looked about, helplessly. He couldn't ask the King or the Queen to get out. So he said to the Crown Prince, "I guess you'd better get out."

It was sent was a school nor it Schramm

BULKY NOV IN BIG DEM

Library Gives "Adverse" Clean

The bulky novel, "Anthon," which was called "obscene" by Monsignor Michael J. La of St. Patrick's Cathedral, is being freely circulated by Public Library and its branches. Neither library officials nor members of the Watch and Warding committee, who had been carefully examining the book, had found anything objectionable therein, though there of "an extraordinary reader."

The Rev. Charles S. Bodary of the Watch and Warding committee dismissed the book as "a little one or two places, but not to do anything about."

C. W. A. workers employed on the Boston Public Library project will present a frolic and dance at Repertory Theatre and Repertory Hall, Huntington av., Thursday, to aid the Emergency Campaign of 1934.

The 550 girls and 85 men employed on the project thought up the idea, according to Theodore V. Money, controller of the library, to show their appreciation of the opportunity offered them during the past few months to earn a living.

Twenty vaudeville acts and a dance are scheduled for the show. The executive committee in charge of the affair is Thomas A. McGovern, chairman; Bert Patrick, Wilbur Moore and Frank Mathews.

Tickets will be sold by all the workers employed on the library project and the management of the Repertory Theatre and Repertory Hall cooperated in placing the buildings at the disposal of the workers.

From Chairman Farley of the Emergency Campaign came this letter yesterday:

"To the Editor of the Boston Globe:
The spirit in which all the many men and women who went out yesterday to solicit contributions to the campaign was so fine, and their good nature and cheerfulness in undertaking their work so marked, that it should be particularly mentioned.

"I wish it were possible to thank each of them individually on behalf of the entire community for which they were really working.

"As I fear, it is not, may I take advantage of your columns to give to them all such thanks, not only for what they did, but, even more perhaps, for the way they did it. Gifts listed yesterday follow:

THE GIRL THAT PUT THE LAUGH ON BOSTON

(Bostonian Society)

On a November Sunday morning in 1896, Back Bay churchgoers heard a rumor that something had been put over on them. And as soon as the morning services were over, they flocked in a great crowd to their new Public Library building in Copley Square.

The tip had been to get up into the balconies that looked over the central court. The good Bostonians did just that—and there she was!

A bronze lady, with the spray of the fountain making her clear brown body gleam, stood poised in arrested motion on a pedestal. On one arm she carried a merry baby; high in her other hand she held a bunch of grapes. And she wore not so much as a modern girl's brassiere and scanties.

Well, they all went horrorizing home, and sat down to write scalding letters to the trustees of the library, threatening to cut off support; to the city officials; to the newspapers, and to their folks out West.

The trustees listened, and ordered the naked woman out of the precincts of culture. So Mr. McKim, the architect of the library, the man who had presented MacMonnies' statue for its courtyard, took her away, and put her into the Metropolitan Art Museum, where she stood in the entrance hall for years without attracting the least unfavorable comment.

In the meantime, the whole country was roaring with laughter at the prudery of Boston. Years later, Boston came to with a spasm of shame, and humbly asked for a replica of the statue.

How the Bacchante was installed is less well known than this story. Mr. McKim had announced his intention of sending her to Boston, and everybody, reporters included, was watching for her.

She was sent over in charge of William Mitchell Kendall, an architect in the office of McKim, Mead and White, and a young man in that office, named Hill. Their job was to get the statue set up without any publicity.

They enlisted the help of policemen, who brought their old-fashioned "dark lanterns" and very late on a cold November Saturday night, with the policemen helping, they got the lady into the courtyard. She was in position by 2 a.m.

Sunday morning, when Prof. Charles Eliot Norton saw her, he said not a word to Mr. Kendall. He merely pointed in silence to the statue, and then to the grave and ethereal Chavannes murals in the great stairway and upper hall of the library.

But last-minute changes forced its cancellation and left those in charge with a problem as to entertainment. The library officials seized the opportunity to offer a programme of story-telling for the grown men and women who gather on Sunday nights.

John J. Cronan of West Roxbury, Boston's official story-teller, attached to the library staff, who entertains some 10,000 children weekly, will relate his tales for the edification of the grown-ups. While he has not yet definitely planned his programme, it was indicated last night that he will tell the adults virtually the same stories he unfolds to junior high school and high school boys and girls.

Knows 1000 Stories

Story-telling is something entirely new for the library's Sunday night entertainment. There have been readings before. But Mr. Cronan gets up before his audience and tells them the stories just as many of his audience may have answered the plea "Tell me a story!" The difference is that Mr. Cronan is a professional story-teller. It's his life-work.

It is expected that Mr. Cronan will tell some tales of the sea—perhaps of adventures in the days of the clipper ships and the gold rush era. He also may include a tale or two of Dickens.

The story-teller himself explained last night that he employs an audience psychology in selecting his tales, deciding upon some of them as he goes along, observing closely the reactions of his listeners and the manner in which the different types of stories hold their interest.

Mr. Cronan, incidentally, has a repertoire of more than 1000 different narratives. And while this will be his first attempt at providing the library entertainment for adults, he is famous among the school children of Boston.

The boys and girls, ranging in age from the little ones in the primary grades to those preparing for college, have heard his stories and clamored for more. Visitors have marveled at the rapt attention of the usually fidgety youngsters during his story-telling hours. They sit, absorbed in the unfolding narrative, seemingly hardly daring to breathe.

It will be just the same with the men and women tomorrow night, the library attendants believe. They are sure to get a tremendous

EMBARRASSING MOMENT FOR BOY PRINCE HERE

Library Elevator Balked and Operator Asked
"Young Fellow" (Next King) to Step Out.

By FRANK P. SIBLEY

Crown Prince Leopold, who will become King of the Belgians Friday, spent a day in Boston with his father and mother, in 1919.

It was a Sunday, and the royal family's day began by attending mass in the Cathedral of the Holy Cross. The writer of this story was one of the reporters who followed them all that day.

With a police escort the royal party swept across town to Copley sq. after the services at the Cathedral, to inspect the Public Library and a collection of Belgian war posters, on exhibition on the third floor. The King had been told of them, and the Queen knew of the Chavannes and the Abbey paintings, and wanted to see them. So the visit was made, though it was not on the original program.

It was so entirely impromptu that William Kenney, the chairman of the library trustees, got word only at the last minute that the Belgian royal family was coming, and arrived at the library in a frock coat and a broad tape to his eyeglasses, but without a shave.

The then Mayor Andrew J. Peters also had been notified, and was on the steps with Mr. Kenney to greet the royal party.

Prince, 16, in Uniform

Only four came in, with reporters trailing. They were—the King and Queen—a beautiful couple, with the slender beauty of the Queen showing clear against the statuesque dignity of His Majesty, who was fully 6 feet 4 inches tall; the Crown Prince, a boy of about 16 in the uniform of a private soldier in the Belgian Army, a little gilt tassel swinging from the peak of his cap, or "over-seas cap," and "Bill" Nye, Secret Service man escorting the party.

They climbed the grand staircase. Then the King lingered to look at the Chavannes murals, and the Queen went in to see the Abbey pictures of the Adventure of the Holy Grail.

Neither said very much, though they looked keenly at the paintings. The boy stood respectfully beside his father, and said not a word. And Bill Nye had no eyes for pictures, but glanced rapidly at every possible door or nook from which danger to his charges might possibly come.

The posters were on the next floor and the party assembled to go up in the slow, weak, creaky elevator of the Public Library. The King and Queen, the Crown Prince, Bill Nye, Mayor Peters and William Kenney all crowded into the little car.

An Embarrassing Moment

Little Schramm, the elevator operator, was somewhat rattled by the importance of the party—and possibly more by what he knew of his elevator. Anyway, it happened. Mr. Kenney closed the door; Schramm threw the lever—and the elevator didn't budge.

Schramm looked timidly around. Then he said "I'm afraid some of us will have to get off, Mr. Kenney."

"Of course," said Mr. Kenney, and reopened the door. He got out; Mayor Peters got out; Bill Nye got out; Schramm closed the door, and tried again. But the great weight had evidently jammed the clutches in the guides; the car wouldn't start.

Again Schramm looked about, helplessly. He couldn't ask the King or the Queen to get out. So he said to the Crown Prince, "I guess you'd better get out."

It was a school nor a Schramm's turn.

It was a sensible, embarrassed reporter.

THE GIRL THAT PUT THE LAUGH ON BOSTON

(Bostonian Society)

On a November Sunday morning in 1896, Back Bay churchgoers heard a rumor that something had been put over on them.
And as soon as the morning services were over, they flocked in a great crowd to their new Public Library building in Copley Square.

The tip had been to get up into the balconies that looked over the central court. The good Bostonians did just that—and there she was!

A bronze lady, with the spray of the fountain making her clear brown body gleam, stood poised in arrested motion on a pedestal.
On one arm she carried a merry baby; high in her other hand she held a bunch of grapes. And she wore not so much as a modern girl's brassiere and scanties.
Horror!

Well, they all went horrorizing home, and set down to write scalding letters to the trustees of the library, threatening to cut off support; to the city officials; to the newspapers, and to their folks out West.

The trustees listened, and ordered the naked woman out of the precincts of culture. So Mr.
McKim, the architect of the library, the man who had presented MacMonnies' statue for its courtyard, took her away, and put her into the Metropolitan Art Museum, where she stood in the entrance hall for years without attracting the least unfavorable comment.

In the meantime, the whole country was roaring with laughter at the prudery of Boston. Years later, Boston came to with a spasm of shame, and humbly asked for a replica of the statue.

How the Bacchante was installed is less well known than this story. Mr. McKim had announced his intention of sending her to Boston, and everybody, reporters included, was watching for her.

She was sent over in charge of William Mitchell Kendall, an architect in the offices of McKim, Mead and White, and a young man in that office, named Hill.
Their job was to get the statue set up without any publicity.

They enlisted the help of policemen, who brought their old-fashioned "dark lanterns," and very late on a cold November
Saturday night, with the policemen helping, they got the lady into the courtyard. She was in position by 2 a m.

Sunday morning, when Prof.
Charles Eliot Norton saw her, he said not a word to Mr. Kendall.
He merely pointed in silence to the statue, and then to the grave and ethereal Chavannes murals in the great stairway and upper hall of the library.

STAMP EXHIBIT AT PUBLIC LIBRARY

Stamps with a menagerie of animals and birds, series showing the history of medical science, romance from the far corners of the earth, in colorful stamps from Liberia, the Solomon Islands, Tibet, Egypt, China, from the 400 stamp-issuing countries, in fact—the largest yet, and third annual exhibition of postage stamps, put on in the Boston Public Library, Copley square. It is running until March 4, under the auspices of the Suburban Stamp and Curio Club of Boston.

Plans and methods for showing the amateur how to collect, arrange and mount his stamps are set forth in more than 60 exhibits. The expert may enjoy himself by looking at the errors, old stampless covers, rare United States, stampless covers, a collection of Great Britain complete, a collection of Finland worth around $15.00, early U. S. stamps and U. S. Revenues and Commemoratives, air-mail and Zepplin, first day and cachet covers. A treat for philatelists and those who are just interested in stamps.

The Sunday Post CWA HEAD SEEN

Often post-prandial orators erroneously quote a line—usually ascribed to Shakespeare—"Music hath charms to soothe the savage beast." The expression has become very common. It is heard at the banquet board, from the platforms and from the pulpits. Few of the deliverers quote it correctly. Few know its origin.

The correct version is:
"Music hath charms to soothe the savage beast,
To soften rocks, or bend a knotted oak."

Another expression, which is likewise the handy instrument of the orator, is "Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned." Shakespeare, too, is incorrectly given credit for it. It, too, re-echoes from high places. The correct version of this is:

"Heaven has no rage like love to hatred Turned,
Nor hell a fury like a woman scorned."

This week in the Treasure Room of the Boston Public Library, there is a collection of valuable books on display. Among them are the plays of William Congreve. He is the author of both these expressions. They are contained in a long forgotten play—"The Mourning Bride." For those who love literature, the library offers a paradise second to none in this country. For those who in youth were not offered the opportunity to enjoy a cultural education, the Treasure Room opens pleasant and worthwhile hours.

DRIVE TO OUST M'CARTHY AS CWA HEAD SEEN

724 Library Workers Wire
Hopkins Protesting Slash
In Their Wages

WELFARE BOARD TO BE REORGANIZED

$10,000 Appropriated by Emergency Finance Board
For Purpose

Protests by 724 workers in the Boston Public Library against the arbitrary pay cuts ordered by Walter V. McCarthy, CWA administrator for Boston, were sent to Washington last night after the state emergency finance board had appropriated $10,000 to begin the re-organization of the Boston welfare department, of which McCarthy is the executive director.

Organized by a group headed by Merle Colby, employed as a trained cataloguer at the library, the CWA workers held meetings and elected representatives to a council, at which a telegram was drafted and sent to Col. Harry L. Hopkins, federal CWA administrator, demanding an investigation of McCarthy's administration of the civil works program in Boston.

DRIVE TO OUST SEEN

A drive to oust McCarthy as CWA administrator and as executive director of the welfare department was seen in the suddenness of the organized protest and the vote of the emergency finance board to begin the reorganization of the welfare department. McCarthy has delayed the reorganization for many weeks by claiming that his CWA duties were so burdensome that he could not devote time to selecting the trained social workers who will delve into his department.

Miss Katherine Hardwick, head of the social service school of Simmons College, will direct the reorganization of the social service phase of the welfare department.

McCarthy and Miss Hardwick conferred yesterday at the State House with Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the CWA and the finance boards; William B. Coy, Boston banker, who is a member of both boards, and Theodore M. Waddell, director of the state division of accounts and member of the finance board. Miss Hardwick outlined the manner in which she will have the social workers investigate specific cases in average sections to get a cross-section of the city's welfare recipients.

Miss Hardwick has made a preliminary inquiry and, from data obtained, told Bartlett that larger quarters were needed for the welfare department personnel. She explained the tremendous amount of work that was being done by welfare employees, who are handicapped by lack of proper facilities. The main objective is to obtain first-hand information from recipients of aid. Individual cases will be combined into a main report, which will contain recommendations for submission to the Bartlett board.

The $10,000 appropriated is part of the $50,000 allocated by the board to effect a complete reorganization of the department, which spent at the rate of $1,000,000 a month during 1933. The alarming increase in welfare expenditures—subject of several investigations—caused Mayor Mansfield to forecast a thorough reorganization in his inaugural address.

Theodore D. Money, comptroller of the library, declared last night:
As I understand it, the library workers protested against a cut in wages without a reduction in working hours.

Recently McCarthy ordered that all CWA and CWS workers in Boston have their work week cut to 24 hours, and pay cuts in proportion effected. This produced a storm of protests, which when brought to Chairman Bartlett's attention caused him to countermand McCarthy's order. Bartlett received permission from Washington to raise the wages and hours of clerical supervisory and professional workers on paper, and then slash both hours and wages according to orders contained in a telegram received a week ago from Col. Hopkins. This was necessary because none of the workers labored 39 hours weekly, as in other states.

As this worked out, clerical workers in the library receiving $15 a week and working 30 hours were raised to $18 and 39 hours, and the cut resulted in $13.86 for a 30-hour week. Thus, while working the same number of hours, the CWS clerical workers lost $1.14 weekly instead of $3 originally ordered.

NOT GIVEN BENEFIT

But supervisory and professional workers, who received $24 and up to $45 a week, respectively, were not given the benefit of the "raise and cut," although Bartlett ordered McCarthy to protect these groups. Many of the supervisory and professional workers thus worked 30 hours a week and were cut more than 20 per cent.

Also, 42 girls employed on library projects were discharged when it was found that their slips had been obtained irregularly. Rumors that the girls had helped to expose "CWS graft" caused the library workers to demand reinstatement of the girls, which is impossible under the present regulations. Four of these girls signed confessions exposing the politician who gave them forged assignment slips. These confessions have been sent to McCarthy, who has kept them in his possession although Asst. U. S. Atty. John A. Canavan needs them for presentation to a federal grand jury investigating CWA frauds.

Protest meetings were held by 724 CWS employees on Boston Public Library projects to protest against unwarranted discharge of 42 employees who exposed CWS graft and political collusion: to protest against local administrator who by his violation of instructions from Washington arbitrarily cut wages and hours of work; and to protest against apparent collusion between local administration and local politicians. We protest against cut in wages of lower brackets of wage earners to swell salaries of politically appointed officials. We demand abolition of retroactive pay cuts. We demand rates of pay equivalent to outside workers. We demand immediate investigation of the local administration. "Employees of Boston Public Library CWS projects. Yesterday, while investigation into various devices used by persons to obtain CWA jobs without authorization continued, about 100 men working on

GYPS IN BOSTON

To the Editor of the Post:
Sir—What a big laugh we New Yorkers get out of the city of Boston. Once a year I spend my vacation there, and it is a by-word when I go home, my friends will say, "Well, what is the new gyp in Boston?" Read in the paper this morning about the Governor and the Mayor going on the air about the compulsory insurance. Save your breath Mr. Governor and Mayor, for the compulsory insurance has gone up and they know they are going to stay up, and you and your people know that anything that increases in Boston will stay that way because your people are not fighters, just talkers. Boston was always noted for being gypsy.

Read about discharging aliens at City Hospital. Why start there? Why not go to the Boston Public Library, where there are aliens holding the best positions, who refuse to become citizens and also aliens who took out first papers so they could hold their positions?

Now the Mayor's chauffeur has been suspended for a few days and doesn't even lose his job. How he must laugh. Another chauffeur would have been suspended forever. What a break!

Saw a picture of the Mayor giving the fliers huge bouquets. What did they care about them. Why didn't he give the money he paid for them to some poor family?

Wake up you people of Boston! Don't be saps all your lives! Act and don't talk so much! Boston is what you make it. Wonder what the next gyp will be? A FREQUENT VISITOR.

Artist Sargent Had Poor Opinion of His Own Mural of Prophets in Boston Public Library

Wrote Admirer They Were Least Satisfactory of His Decorations

By AGNES CARR
The late John Singer Sargent, an artist to whom all the world brought laurels, and who was termed the dominant figure in the art world of Europe and America for many years, did not think very highly of his own highly-praised mural of the prophets which is a Boston Public Library treasure.

NATURAL MODESTY PERHAPS
Or perhaps it was the natural modesty of the really great painter which impelled him to say that the mural of the prophets was "the least satisfactory of my Boston Public Library decorations."

This reference was made by Sargent in a letter to Mrs. William Franklin Hughes, wife of Dr. Hughes, the head of the ophthalmology department of the Indiana State University medical school. Mrs. Hughes is in Boston attending a convention with her husband.

KEEPS LETTER FRAMED
She keeps the letter framed on the

"Insult to their religion." Sargent never tried to explain his idea in the painting, but critics declared it to be a great bit of symbolism, with the central motif the loss of temporal power by Israel which is regained through the Synagogue. There was never any reflection on any race contained in Sargent's paintings.

The mural of the prophets received from many critics the highest praise possible. The work was said to have "beauty, depth and penetration" and it was generally believed that the amazing quality of the murals brought the artist much of the fame he enjoyed in after years. There were one or two criticisms which no one took seriously. A western minister compared the prophets as conceived by Sargent to "a row of howling dervishes, pale and lifeless. They were heroic, virile men, and not such an anemic lot as Sargent has pictured them."

ADMIRER BY ART LOVERS

But art lovers continued to come from all over the country to admire and exclaim over the murals. And today they are considered undisputedly art in its highest form.

The subject of the group of murals has been described as the history of the religions of the world and again as the development of religion. They consist of a series of painted-synonymous scenes.

The protest from the CWA employees at the Boston Public Library over the cut in wages for the lowest paid workers, who received $15 for a 30-hour week, reveals a curious situation.

There are around 500 women who were receiving $15 a week and now get $13.86. Even at this rate, which is admittedly low, there are employees of the library working full time who get less.

There are many more highly paid CWA workers. It was reported recently that some of them received $45 a week. This has been denied, but it is true that about 1 1/4 per cent of the force did receive $26 a week, and many others are paid above the minimum.

The permanent employees of the library, who work full time, are not paid very highly. Few of them, and these with responsible positions, get as much as $36 a week.

This matter of many relatively highly paid CWA jobs in contrast to the wage paid the rank and file seems subject to valid criticism. The census project, to start this week, employing a large number of women, contains an exceptionally large number of jobs which pay far beyond the minimum wage.

It is claimed that the recipients of the really good pay are mostly young people. On all these CWA projects the older persons, men and women with dependents or families, rarely seem to land in the jobs which pay more than the minimum.

In many cases, like that of the Public Library, it is the higher pay which runs up the costs and compels the reductions in wages for the rank and file. These CWA projects are intended to take care of as many persons who are on the welfare lists as possible. But there is a suspicion that a person on the welfare list who is given a CWA job has little or no chance to get more than the minimum.

Those who get the highest pay are persons who, in many cases, are far removed from the welfare list.

It may seem a bit unfair to indulge in any criticism of the hard working men in charge of the CWA programme. They have plenty of trouble. They are working under great difficulties. Speed in getting projects under way is essential. It is doubtful if any serious allegations of grafting locally can be sustained.

But the public is beginning to question some of the CWA policies.

MCCARTHY TO PUT CASE TO HOPKINS

CWA Administrator to Meet Complaints of Autocracy

DENIES ORDER TO RAISE PAY ON PAPER

Walter V. McCarthy, CWA administrator for Boston and executive director of the Boston welfare department, who has been charged with "autocratic administration" of the CWA program in Boston, will take up the matter personally with Col. Harry L. Hopkins, federal CWA administrator, to whom a protest against him was sent by 724 workers in the Boston Public Library.

Denying that he had arbitrarily cut wages of CWA workers, as alleged by the library CWA employees, McCarthy made known his intention of communicating directly with Col. Hopkins.

He denied that he had been ordered by Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts civil works administration, to raise on paper the wages of supervisory and professional workers, and then reduce them in accordance with a telegraphic order received from Col. Hopkins.

Bartlett corroborated McCarthy. He declared that Washington CWA officials had permitted him to raise only clerical workers, who had been receiving $15 weekly for a 30-hour week, to $18 weekly for a 30-hour week. Supervisory and professional workers were refused the benefits of the idea, Bartlett explained.

Bartlett said that the supervisory and professional workers had different wage scales for different projects, the sum computed on a fair wage basis for the work done. On the other hand, the clerical workers had a definite base rate of $15 a week, and it was felt that to reduce them to $12 weekly would work hardship on many.

The federal emergency relief administration at Washington announced last night that 9000 single persons without families were receiving aid in Boston. The one-person families, as they are known on welfare records, comprise 10 per cent of the Boston total, according to Corrington Gill, director of research and statistics for the FEERA, who added that a preliminary survey showed that 35 per cent of the 95,366 persons receiving aid were under 16 years of age.

Regarding the proposed check of assignment slips and slips presented by workers as identification before receiving pay checks, McCarthy said that such a check is being made now. So far 350 persons have lost their CWA jobs because of irregularities, and it has been estimated that 1000 more are working without authorization.

The four signed confessions of library project workers, containing the name of the politician who gave the four girls their assignment slips, will be sent to M. Joseph McCarthy, federal re-employment service head. McCarthy has said he will send the confessions to David J. Barry, New England investigator for the CWA and PWA, who plans to send the confessions to Washington. Meanwhile, Asst. U. S. Atty. John A. Canava, in charge of CWA fraud investigations for the department of justice, wants the confessions for presentation to a federal grand jury. McCarthy refused to tell the name of the politician.

Persons who have not obtained CWA jobs thus far will have no chance to do so unless the program is expanded, in the opinion of Bartlett. That money will be available after Feb. 15 was seen in the President's request for $950,000,000 to continue relief agencies until a later date.

PARSONS RESIGNS JOB AS LIBRARIAN

Over 50 Years Globe Man at Newburyport

NEWBURYPORT, March 23.—John D. Parsons, for more than 50 years correspondent from this city for the Boston Globe, has resigned as librarian of the Newburyport Public Library. His successor is Frank Jones of the administrative department of the Boston Public Library, who will assume his duties April 1.

Mr. Parsons for more than 45 years was librarian here. He was forced by poor health to resign. The directors will retain him in an advisory capacity.

His successor was recommended for the position by the Division of Libraries of the State Department of Education. He is 28 years of age, a graduate of Harvard College, and was employed in the Queensboro branch of the New York Library and in a Bar Association library in New York.

Mr. Parsons took charge of the library Jan. 28, 1889, succeeding the late Hiram A. Tenney, who had been librarian since the library was established in 1855, with the exception of one year, when Horace N. Jackman was elected. Thus in more than 70 years there have been but three librarians and two of them covered a span of 69 years. Mr. Jones will be the fourth librarian.

Mr. Parsons is a former newspaper reporter and city editor. He entered the employ of the old Newburyport Herald in the former capacity and became editor. He held the latter position when made librarian. He retired as Globe correspondent a few years ago.

PARSONS RESIGNS AS LIBRARIAN; FRANK JONES IS APPOINTED

Former Served for More Than 45 Years —Boston Man Will Assume Duties Here April 1

Having accepted with regret the resignation of John D. Parsons, for more than 45 years the efficient head of the Newburyport public library, the board of directors has unanimously selected Frank Jones of the administrative department of the Boston public library to be librarian here.

Mr. Jones had been recommended

JOHN D. PARSONS
Who Served as Librarian For 45 Years

for the Newburyport position by the division of libraries in the state department of education and after meeting Mr. Jones, the directors made their choice. He asked for a few days to consider the matter and has now accepted.

The directors have voted to retain

Mr. Parsons in an advisory capacity. His resignation was tendered because of ill health.

Mr. Jones is 28 years old, a graduate of Harvard and he has had a varied experience in several libraries. He has worked in the Queensboro Branch of the New York public library and in a Bar association library in New York. He is now employed in the administrative department of the Boston public library. Previously he had worked in many departments of that library to gain experience and training. The directors had from the first made up their minds to employ a trained man in this important position. His affability, poise and tact made a fine impression upon them and the approval of the state library department clinched the decision. Mr. Jones' duties at the Boston Public Library will prevent his coming to Newburyport till the first of April.

Mr. Parsons took charge of the library Jan. 28, 1889, succeeding the late Hiram A. Tenney, who had been librarian from the beginning of the library in 1855, with the exception of one year, 1862, when Horace N. Jackman was elected. Thus during the 70 years of its history, the library has had but three librarians and two of them cover a span of 69 years. Mr. Jones will be the fourth librarian.

Under the direction of Mr. Parsons the library materially increased in size and usefulness, thousands of volumes were added and the service to the public improved in many ways.

Mr. Parsons entered the employ of the old Newburyport Herald and for years worked as reporter and city editor on that paper. He held the latter position when made librarian. Mr. Parsons was early made local representative of the Boston Globe and for over 50 years he was its correspondent.

Mr. Parsons always had a distinctly literary taste and his constant delving into literature gave him a knowledge of books and authors possessed by few.

DAVIS TO FILL LIBRARY POST

Dartmouth Man Appointed Head of Circulation Division

In order that the increased demand (41 per cent.) on its circulation department since 1929 may be handled in the most expeditious manner, the trustees of the Boston public library have established the position of chief librarian of the circulation division, to be filled by Orlando C. Davis, who recently resigned as librarian of the Bridgeport, Ct., public library.

Davis will take over his new duties beginning June 1 at a salary of $5030. Following his graduation in 1907, Davis was head cataloguer, and then reference librarian at Dartmouth College. Leaving there in 1910 he successively became librarian at the Waltham public library, East Chicago, Hammond, Ind., and Bridgeport, Ct. He was born in Lowell.

His work at the Boston public library will consist of the co-ordination of the activities of the 33 branch libraries, the work with children, the schools, and extension work.

Bridgeport Expert Comes to Library

Having been appointed circulation librarian of the Boston Public Library, Orlando Chester Davis, librarian of the Bridgeport Public Library since 1924 and librarian of the Waltham Public Library from 1910 to 1922, will assume his new duties June 1.

Mr. Davis, born in Lowell May 23, 1884, was graduated from Dartmouth in 1907. From 1907 until 1910 he was head cataloguer at Dartmouth. From Dartmouth he went to Waltham; from 1923 until 1924 he was librarian at East Chicago, Ind. The next year he was librarian at Hammond, Ind., and went to Bridgeport in 1926.

During the year he served the American Library Association in Southern Canada and in France. He is a member of the board of directors of the Bridgeport Boys' Club, ex-president of the Import Library Association and a member of the Connecticut Library Association, of which he was president in 1927 and 1928.

Eight years old and in the third grade, with a library card of her own, Miss Beatrice M. Flanagan has not served 27 years in the Boston libraries without learning that a little girl whose mother permits her to cross the cat tracks alone and who chooses her own books from the shelves is sufficiently important to be admitted without question to the executive office.

As the rumbling of several hundred young people's walking over the floors, and sliding chairs from under tables tells the librarian as accurately as her clock what post-school hour the afternoon has reached, Miss Flanagan lifts her head from the chart of duties before her to accept the generous gift so mysteriously hidden in a brown paper bag.

A Gift of Apples

A few apples! From a grateful mother in an underprivileged district, a mother with no learning which she herself can impart, with no books to offer her children and no money with which to buy any; whose little daughter, because of the library, is advancing rapidly in school and being guided happily from one interesting book to another.

There is also an apple for the children's librarian, Miss Veronica C. Moran, who is busy at a low table marked, "For Those Using Ink" (a table specially finished so that the telltale blots will wipe off), where the flaxen heads of the youthful Anglo-Saxon or Celt, the wavy, dark tresses of the Italian or Jewish child, and the crisp mops and horizontal braids of tiny Negro students, bent over papers and books, signify rapid attention and unflagging industry.

Stamp Collectors' Club

Not all of the small visitors are seeking stories of Robin Hood, the knights of King Arthur, Lindbergh, or Daniel Boone. Sometimes it is: "My Mother's washing the floor, and I've got to stay here till she's through. She says so"; sometimes: "Miss, it's so cold at home. We haven't got no coal." The occasion is an opportunity to acquaint a child with that vast treasure house of stories which is his heritage.

The writer of a thesis on the life of King Albert of Belgium was a topic which exceeded all others in recent demands for data on the part of school children.

The average daily number of visitors to the library during the winter months is 1350, about 52 per cent adult and 48 per cent juvenile. About 96,000 books of fiction and 41,000 of nonfiction circulated last year among the adult readers; while the juvenile circulation was about 77,000 fiction and 33,000 nonfiction.

From the largest of the Boston branches it is interesting to jump to the smallest—the Phillips Brooks Memorial, in the little town of Readville, on the edge of the Blue Hills. With a total collection of fewer than 5000 books, this enterprising little branch had an adult circulation last year of about 22,800 fiction and 4900 nonfiction; and a juvenile circulation of 15,000 fiction and 9000 nonfiction, a considerable increase over the circulation of its first year, 1931.

"Pick Out Books for Me"

This is a decidedly homelike little library where people call each other by name and exchange all manner of confidences concerning chicken coops and quilts; babies and washing machines; town politics and fudge. Miss Edna G. Peck, the librarian, and her two assistants—one permanent and one temporary—serve this little American community of 2000 individuals so cheerfully and efficiently that many of the townspeople say, "Oh, please pick out some books for me. I get much better ones than when I pick them out myself."

Romantic as the library which Mark Antony sent to Cleopatra, to replace the 700,000 rolls of papyrus Caesar had destroyed, the Fellowes Athenæum, now a branch of the Boston Public Library, was founded as a gift to Roxbury by the adventurous Caleb Fellowes, born in Gloucester in 1771.

The youthful Caleb, whose mother was Sarah Williams of Roxbury before her marriage, ran away to sea. For 25 years his family, who heard nothing of his whereabouts, mourned him as lost. Having escaped from the China-bound vessel, however, and become employed at some port in the Indian Ocean as pilot along the coast of Hindustan, he began to accumulate a fortune in trade in Calcutta.

Changed His Will

He returned to the United States, where he married and spent the rest of his life with the exception of a second visit which he made to India.

His proposal was approved. Books were transferred from Copley Square, and Dr. Putnam and Mr. Edward Everett Hale, also an Athenæum member, purchased additional volumes from the Fellowes fund. Today the library houses a collection of some 41,000 books, of which 26,000 are held by the Athenæum, and 14,000 by the City of Boston.

Sixty years later the old agreement between the first trustees and the city still holds good, the Athenæum paying for the upkeep of the building and for a certain number of new books, the city contributing an appropriation also for books. The arrangement is terminated at the request of either party, at any time, at six months' notice.

While the old American families of Mayflower pedigree have to a large extent moved away from the district, and the homes of such former residents as Hale and Santayana become filled with tenants of Latin or Lithuanian extraction, the Athenæum has expanded its activities accordingly.

Small, Efficient Staff

"This is Bill's lady. Please get her a job," reads a penciled note to the librarian, Miss Mary E. Ames, a gentlewoman with a delicious sense of humor, who for more than 18 years, 10 in her present position and eight at the small, Fellowes Athenæum branch at the neighboring Norfolk House Center, has served the community in innumerable ways. She is known in every home in the surrounding district.

With only five additional full-time workers, it takes a deal of planning to get through all the charging and discharging of books; cataloguing, indexing, filing; renewing cards and tracing lost ones; reviewing books and ordering new ones; accessioning and condemning; arranging exhibits and looking up references for students. Nevertheless, there is always a word of welcome, an eager response to the visitor's inquiry. The down-and-out who comes to the librarian's office, soliciting donations, is never abruptly turned away without hope or encouragement.

women of the neighborhood, and has grown to appreciate the service of the Public Library.

It is an uphill task supplying the regenerating, educational and cultural material and influence, which the library workers have of late come to regard as an essential part of their activity, in a community which has undergone the changes of this locale.

The workers do not say so, but they do announce that conditions are by no means so good as they were during the prohibition period. There are more saloons than ever now, and the poorer families of Roxbury are quick to show the difference. There is much less money for food. Clothes are more ragged. Fewer young people are able to go to college.

Valuable Aid to Schools

The Athenæum is an invaluable help to the students in the local schools. Teachers often take their classes to the building for lectures on books and art, and at the invitation of the library send the children's work, designs and handiwork, to be exhibited. The motion pictures, Miss Ames finds, do not make the valuable contribution they should. "We have all we can do," she comments, "to counteract the influence of the Mae West and Ann Vickers type of film."

Because of its association with early American families, the library receives many inquiries, from as far as the Pacific Coast, regarding ancestors. Its shelves contain many books now out of print. When Miss Ames came to the Fellowes branch she discovered a first edition of "Panshawe," which Hawthorne published anonymously, at his own expense. It fetched $3000 at the Anderson Galleries when it was put on sale, and would have been worth $5000 if it had not been already sprinkled with library stamps.

Public Library Folks Spring Formal Dance

The Boston Public Library Employees' Benefit Association will hold its annual spring formal dance at Longwood Towers, Wednesday evening, May 2.

The committee has planned many novel features and will present a surprise entertainment which will include prominent radio stars. Among the invited guests are Mayor Frederick W. Mansfield, the trustees of the library, and the director, Mr. Milton E. Lord.

Those assisting the chairman, Miss Elizabeth B. Boutreau, are: William Clegg, Gertrude Connell, John J. Connelly, J. Joseph Dunbar, Francis Fisher, Beatrice Flanagan, Charles Gills, Francis J. Hanigan, James Kelley, Louise Leno, Catherine Longman, Joseph A. Lynch, Mary McIndoe, J. Phillip Moore, Francis P. O'Hara, and Bertha Schultz.

Mayor Slashes High Salaries and Cuts His Own to $12,750

Department Heads, Drawing as High as $9000 Will Be Reduced to $4250,
Starting on May 1

By Forrest P. Hall

Mayor Mansfield dropped a high explosive bomb at the feet of the high-salaried city officials today when he announced his further step in municipal economy, the establishment of $4250 as the maximum salary, minus the 15 per cent reduction which has been in effect for more than a year. He set what might be called an imposing example by cutting his own $20,000 pay to $12,750, less the 15 per cent reduction, which would net him $10,762.50 a year.

Many of the city's high salaries are established by law and to override the statutes the mayor would be obliged to receive the consent of the officials involved. He sees no difficulty on that score, inasmuch as the penalty for refusal to cooperate might be removal from office.

"I have not worked this plan out in detail," the mayor told the press, "but I am contemplating asking the heads of departments and members of boards and commissions and deputies and subordinates whose salaries are greater than $5000 per year to accept a reduction to $5000 from which there shall be taken the 15 per cent cut, making the salaries of such heads of departments and subordinates not $4250.

There are scores of high-salaried officials whose salaries have increased from time to time in the last twenty years. Topping the list are the salaries of Superintendent of Schools Patrick T. Campbell at $12,000 and the six assistant superintendents at $7500; also Business Manager Alexander Sullivan at $7500, all of which are under exclusive control of the school committee.

Public Works Commissioner Christopher J. Carven and Transit Chairman Thomas F. Sullivan receive a salary of $9000 a year, while Corporation Counsel Henry G. Foley receives $10,000. There are two associate transit commissioners at $7500 each, also Traffic Commissioner Hickey, Chairman Peter F. Tague of the election department, Chairman Owen E. Gallagher of the street commission, City Collector John J. Doherty, Health Commissioner Francis X. Mahoney, Building Commissioner Edward G. Roemer and Superintendent of Public Buildings Roswell G. Hall, who also receive $7500.

Also on the list of high salaries are Penal Institutions Commissioner William G. O'Hare and Institutions Commissioner Frederic A. Washburn at $7500 each, Park Commissioner William B. Long at $7000, Director Milton E. Lord of the Library Department at $6000, City Treasurer Dorsey at $5000 and the office of auditor at $4000; Chairman David E. Shaw of the election department at $5000 and Superintendent of Supplies Louis at $5000; Police Commissioner Eugene C. Hallman at $5000.

That the high officials have been excepting something of the kind is no secret. Many have felt that the mayor was only waiting to lower the fate of his erger bill at the Legislature before making the announcement that the department heads would have to suffer as well as all others in the plan of reducing the payroll by more than $1,000,000.

So far as known there will be no further suspensions. The mayor stated today that what remains to be done may best be worked out by the payless furlough system. A definite statement would be forthcoming before the end of the week. The total saving which he hopes to effect will be $1,500,000.

TO ASK HIGH SALARIED EMPLOYEES TO TAKE CUT

Mayor Mansfield Requests 10 Percent Contribution From Those Receiving More Than $4250

Mayor Mansfield today announced his plan for seeking contributions from city employees under his control receiving more than $4250 a year. For the past year they have been cut 15 percent and the Mayor today said he would ask them to contribute an additional 10 percent of their basic pay, making a saving of 25 percent.

It is intended as a voluntary contribution and in the opinion of Mayor Mansfield will effect a saving of $37,000 from about 50 employees.

Heading the list of employees under the Mayor is Corporation Counsel Henry E. Foley with a basic salary of $10,000; present salary with 15 percent cut, $8500; contribution, $1000. The Mayor's intention is that the contribution start on May 1.

A conference will be held in the office of Mayor Mansfield with officials of the School Department and from this the reduction of 15 percent required by the statute is to be made leaving my net salary $12,750. City employees expected to contribute:

The Mayor in a statement issued today said:

"In view of the necessity to reduce municipal expenses and the contributions that are being made to this end by the small-salaried employees, I am asking department heads, members of boards and commissions, chiefs of divisions, deputies, and other city officials and employees whose present compensation by reason of the reduction required by law is in excess of $4250 a year, voluntarily to contribute during the remainder of 1934 an amount equal to 10 percent of their basic compensation. This contribution of 10 percent plus the 15 percent reduction required by the 1933 statute make a 25 percent reduction from the basic salary in each case.

"I need not say that I am very sure that I shall receive full cooperation from all persons effected.

"My own contribution stands as I originally stated, namely, a reduction from $20,000 to $12,750 or 25 percent and from this the reduction of 15 percent required by the statute is to be made leaving my net salary $12,750.

City employees expected to contribute:

He returned to the United States, where he married and spent the rest of his life with the exception of a second visit which he made to India.

In 1834, when a sudden typhoon sweeping down upon the ship, he took the helm, commanded the Lascar crew and dodging the Western Reef brought the vessel safely into harbor.

It was his good friend, Mr. Supply Clapp Thwing who, upon learning that Mr. Fellowes intended to leave him a considerable bequesting the money instead to found an Athenæum, Mr. Fellowes altered his will, leaving the bulk of his estate for the establishment of a free library, and his widow later added the sum of $33,000.

Delayed by the Civil War, the huge red brick building was not erected until 1873, when it commenced its work with about 5000 books. The president, Dr. George Putnam, who was minister of the little church in the square and whose grandson is today on the board of trustees, hearing that the Boston Public Library was contemplating a Roxbury branch, suggested to the city fathers a union of the two institutions.

His proposal was approved. Books were transferred from Copley Square, and Dr. Putnam and Mr. Edward Everett Hale, also an Athenæum member, purchased additional volumes from the Fellowes fund. ### Small, Efficient Staff

"This is Bill's lady. Please get her a job," reads a penciled note to the librarian, Miss Mary E. Ames, a gentlewoman with a delicious sense of humor, who for more than 18 years, 10 in her present position and eight at the small, Fellowes Athenæum branch at the neighboring Norfolk House Center, has served the community in innumerable ways. She is known in every home in the surrounding district.

With only five additional full-time workers, it takes a deal of planning to get through all the charging and discharging of books; cataloguing, indexing, filing; renewing cards and tracing lost ones; re-binding books and ordering new ones; constructing charts and maps; accessioning and commingling; arranging exhibits and looking up references for students. Nevertheless, there is always a word of welcome, an eager response to the visitor's inquiry. The down-and-out who comes to the librarian's office, soliciting donations, is never abruptly turned away without hope or encouragement.

women of the neighborhood, and has been to appreciate the service of the Public Library.

It is an uphill task supplying the regenerating, educational and cultural material and influence, which the library workers have of late come to regard as an essential part of their activity, in a community which has undergone the changes A.

In this locale, the workers do not say so, but they do announce that conditions are by no means so good as they were during the prohibition period. There are more saloons than ever now, and the poorer families of Roxbury are quick to show the difference. There is much less money for food. Clothes are more ragged. Few young people are able to go to college.

Valuable Aid to Schools

The Athenæum is an invaluable help to the students in the local schools. Teachers often take their classes to the building for lectures on books and art, and at the invitation of the library send the children's work, designs and handiwork, to be exhibited. The motion pictures, Miss Ames finds, do not make the valuable contribution they should. "We have all we can do," she comments, "to counteract the influence of the 'talkies' and the 'Amn' Vickers type of film."

Because of its association with early American families, the library receives many inquiries, from as far as the Pacific Coast, regarding ancestors. Its shelves contain many books now out of print. When Miss Ames came to the Fellowes branch she discovered a first edition of "Fanshawe," which Hawthorne published anonymously, at his own expense. It fetched $3000 at the Anderson Galleries, where she had it put on sale, and was sold for $2000. It was sprinkled with library stamps.

Public Library Folks Spring Formal Dance

The Boston Public Library Association will hold its annual spring formal dance at Longwood Towers, Wednesday evening, May 2.

The committee has planned many novel features and will present a surprise entertainment which will include prominent radio stars.

Among the invited guests are Mayor Frederick W. Mansfield, the trustees of the library, and the director, Mr. Milton E. Lord.

Those assisting the chairman, Miss Elizabeth B. Bourneau, are: William Clegg, Gertrude Connell, Joan J. Connolly, J. Joseph Banker, Francis Fisher, Beatrice Flanagan, Charles Gillis, Francis J. Hamilton, James Kelley, Louise Lenz, Catherine Louche, Joseph A. Litch, Mary McGrath, J. Phillip Moore, Francis M. O'Hara, and Bertha Schultz.

Eight years old and in the third grade, with a library card of her own! Even the librarian is impressed. Miss Beatrice M. A Gift of Apples
A few apples! From a grateful mother in an underprivileged district, a mother with no learning, which she herself can impart, with no books to offer her children and no money with which to buy any; whose little daughter, because of the library, is being guided happily school and an interesting book to another.

Promotes Better Homes
Miss Flanagan and her staff of ten other permanent employees and two or three temporary workers bring the parents of the community together in groups for the monthly "Better Homes" program. They visit the children's progress meetings where the children's progress is discussed. They explain the local schools, where they explain and instruct them in the use of reference works and catalogues. They guide Italian children in selecting reading for their parents, many of whom do not themselves visit the library. They provide these immigrant adults with easy English in literature which will help them in their efforts to assimilate the culture of the New World. They practically educate many of the young people who leave high school with no idea what to do next in acquiring knowledge along academic lines. They do a tremendous amount of reference work, for the modern methods of education require children to develop, to an amazing degree, the ability to find their own way to the books.

Stamp Collectors' Club
Not all of the small visitors are seeking stories of Robin Hood, the knights of King Arthur, Lindbergh, or Daniel Boone. Sometimes it is "My Mother's washing the floor, and I've got to stay here till she's through. She says so," sometimes, "Miss, it's so cold at home. We haven't got no coal." The occasion is an opportunity to acquaint a child with that vast treasure house of stories which is his heritage.

Many Telephone Calls
"What's on the radio on Saturday afternoon?" someone inquires brightly, over the telephone. "Please send my children home," requests, "Minnie's 10, and Roger's 13."

"Is there a girl in the library with a red hat and black coat?" inquires a young man's voice. "She's my girl. Would you mind telling her I can't make it?"

Two members of a family have had an argument about the pronunciation of a word and call on the library staff to settle the dispute.

Public Meetings Arranged
Dr. Alvarez is convinced that the woman's party is needed and that only through such campaigning can women obtain and retain their rights. Part of its work is holding public meetings, and its office on the square is open every day.

There are other women in Uruguay who do not want the vote. They like the "old standards" and think "the new freedom is dangerous." They lay it to the influence of German and English immigrants that the old restrictions against women in public have been removed and say there was something good in the former social customs for "protecting" women from contact with the outside world.

Countless Ways of Service
It is interesting to follow Miss Alvarez through the large entrance of the library, where she is met by a woman who is always ready to help her in any way possible.

MAYOR WINS OVER COUNCIL

Pay Cut Conciliation
Gains Him Support

Mayor Mansfield's conciliatory gesture in asking 50 department heads to voluntarily take a 10 per cent cut in salaries, rather than to impose a more severe slash, won him support for his economy program for the first time in the city council yesterday.

Not only did the council confirm a list of 112 city constables, nominated by the mayor, but Councilman Morris Goldman of Dorchester, chairman of the committee on constables, defended him against charges that the nominations were due to political expediency.

An unexpected victory was won by the mayor in another quarter when it was indicated that 69 high salaried employees of the school department were prepared to make a further voluntary contribution of 10 per cent in salaries over $4000.

The council battle which he won with five votes to spare, in a body that has been hostile to him from the start, came after the mayor had sent a request to the various department heads to cooperate with him in order to make a saving of $37,000 a year.

Included in the list of those asked to make a voluntary reduction of 10 per cent in their salaries are Police Commissioner Hultman, Fire Commissioner Edward F. McLaughlin, Health Commissioner Francis X. Mahoney, Corporation Counsel Henry E. Foley, Public Works Commissioner Christopher J. Carver, City Treasurer John H. Dorsey and Street Commissioner Thomas Fitzgerald.

In each of these positions the basic salary is $7500 or more. City Councillor Robert G. Wilson, Jr., made two efforts in the council to upset the mayor's constable list. In one of these he was blocked from laying the list on the table when the vote was tied and President John H. Dowd cast the deciding vote.

When the next motion was offered to send the list to executive committee the vote was 12 to 9 against, showing a weakening opposition. Confirmation then was carried 13 to 7.

George Brackman, brother of Councillor Brackman, was one of those on the constable list. James V. Hatrey was another. It has been charged that Hatrey also has a secretarial position with Congressman John McCormack, and that he held his job when constables with longer service were dropped.

All but four of the 42 employees in the wire division of the fire department refused to submit to a payless furlough of 14 weeks. They were notified they would be indefinitely suspended tomorrow unless they did. Such suspension would cripple the electric wiring inspection service of the department, officials stated.

URGE 700 TO CHANGE FILING AT LIBRARY

F. R. A. Expenditure Would Exceed $182,000

The first important new project planned for the F. R. A. program for employment of more than 700 men and a total expenditure of $182,000 in completely modernizing the index and filing system at the Boston Public Library.

The project was submitted by Theodore V. Money, controller of the library, and was under consideration of F. R. A. officials yesterday. It is expected that final approval will be stamped on the project tomorrow morning.

This project would replace the C. W. A. project which brought the cataloging system of the library up to date and would mean that the library would be one of the most efficient and modern in the country.

The cost of Boston has offered to pay $100,000 for the cost of materials and carrying out the work. The Federal Government will pay the balance, estimated at $82,000, for 700 men to be employed for two years.

It was a project which officials of the project had been working on for some time. It will mean a great deal to the library, and it will mean a great deal to the city.

The new system will make it possible to find desired books with a minimum of information as every book will be indexed and cross-indexed. The depressed times they have been able to obtain sufficient appropriations heretofore to keep the library system in a part with the modern.

They passed that appropriation of $100,000 plus the work already accomplished under the C. W. A. and a total expenditure of $182,000.

Others include Traffic Commissioner William P. Hickey, basic pay, $7500; Wilfred H. Doyle, city clerk, basic pay $7500, and Milton F. Lord, director of library, basic pay $8500.

Meanwhile Mayor Mansfield is continuing his program of reducing expenses by compulsory furloughs and suspensions. It was learned that 38 members of the Fire Division of the Fire Department must either request a 14-week furlough or face indefinite suspension. It is understood that thus far they have declined to request the furlough. Definite action is expected unless the men comply by tomorrow.

MAYOR ASKS CUT IN HIGH SALARIES

Proposes That 50 Give 10 Percent to City

New Plan Much Less Severe Than Mansfield's First

High-salaried city employees, including for the most part department heads and board members, who receive in excess of $4250 annually from the city of Boston will be asked to donate 10 percent of their basic pay in addition to the 15 percent taken from them during the past year, Mayor Mansfield said yesterday.

The new plan is less severe than the original suggestion made by the Mayor to reduce all employees receiving more than $5000 down to that figure. It will effect a saving of $37,000 among about 50 employees. The cut will be of a voluntary nature but Mayor Mansfield said he is "very sure that I shall receive full cooperation from all persons affected."

The Mayor will reduce his own pay by the amount originally suggested, $20,000 to $15,000—25 percent—and from this the reduction of 15 percent required by the statute, leaving a net salary of $12,750.

A conference will be held in the office of Mayor Mansfield with officials of the School Department and later with county officials in an effort to have the plan extended to their similarly paid employees who draw their salaries from the city treasury.

In his statement explaining the salary reduction plan, Mayor Mansfield said, "In view of the necessity to reduce municipal expenses and the contributions that are being made to this end by the small-salaried employees," he desired those receiving more than $4250 to make an additional 10 percent voluntarily.

Heading the list of employees other than the Mayor is Corporation Counsel Henry E. Foley, with a basic salary of $10,000. Under the present 15 percent reduction he receives $8500, and a 10 percent cut on his basic pay will reduce him to $7500.

Others include Traffic Commissioner William P. Hickey, basic pay, $7500; Wilfred H. Doyle, city clerk, basic pay $7500, and Milton F. Lord, director of library, basic pay $8500.

Project

POLICY CONDEMNED
BY LIBRARY OFFICIAL

Boston Administrator Admits Probe Is Under Way

Complaints, some said to be of a personal nature, have been made ERA officials, it was learned thoritatively last night, by girls and young women formerly employed on the Boston Public Library project.
Because of the number and nature of the complaints, it was stated by Major Roswell G. Hall, Boston ERA administrator, he started a thorough investigation of conditions alleged to have existed on the library project which was started by the CWA and

Considered as of startling nature was the charge that one worker on the library project was a "psychopathic case who should have been in a hospital" and that despite alleged "outbreaks" which threw other girls within reaching into semi-hysterics, this person was raised to a responsible position and put in charge of other workers.
If they complained about this person's treatment of them, the girls' charges were, it was said, "scared against them soon afterward on the blacklist chart" and as soon as the case appeared high enough they were fired.

Reported Too Much

One attractive girl of good family, who had held a responsible position on the library project, charged last night that when the reported alleged irregularities, and considered it her duty to keep on reporting them, her score on the chart mounted so rapidly that she was one of the first to reach the top and be discharged.

This girl's case, which is purported to be known to an ERA official, fully filled her to retain her ERA employment, it was asserted. She was the only employed member of a large family, and she revealed last night that so desperate is her situation now that sometimes she cannot even obtain carriages to come in to appeal for a review of her case by ERA officials.

Worker With Servants

Favoritism enabled one woman to keep her ERA job, it was asserted, even after she was repeatedly referred to her money and her "two servants."
Needless girls at the time were being discharged, it was charged, while "mistakes, and worse, were being covered up for favorites who were kept on."

Administrator Hall said last night that he is not prepared yet to say what action will be taken, pending conclusion of his investigation and his study of the report.

When attempts were made last night to reach Mr. Money for a statement on the conditions which ERA workers in the library project said were involved, it was reported that he is "down south" on vacation.

LIBRARY

Nearly 600 ERA Girls
Ask to Be Returned to Work

Charging that they are being subjected to undue hardships and that some of them are literally hungry because of the slowness with which they are being returned to work, representatives of nearly 600 typists employed on the Boston Public Library project yesterday protested to
ERA officials.

GIRLS COMPLAIN OF DELAYS

They said that yesterday marked the end of their second payless week, and that at the rate they are being returned to their jobs, some of them will be compelled to loaf seven weeks.

Many of these girls said that they have no regular homes and are dependent on a weekly wage to exist. Although the new project for which funds are available, calls for the employment of 600 girls, only 50 have been certified by ERA officials, it was said.

Milton F. Lord, director of the Boston Public Library, said that most of these girls were carefully trained by the institution in the first project under the CWA last winter, and that the library is ready to place them at work as soon as they are certified.

He said that under the new regulations, however, the reclassification process is a slow one since all of the girls must show that they are actually in need. Those with dependents are given first choice.

The girls in their protest said yesterday that the process was so slow that many of them will be hard up before it is finished.

What Girls Suggest

The following list of suggestions was drawn up and submitted to the ERA officials by the girls:

"Boston Public Library Project 100-5 (transferring of shift-list to typed cards) has been approved by the local ERA administration and passed by the State authorities to become immediately operative and to employ 600 persons.

"In the first week (week of May 1) only 50 persons have received slips and reported to work. At this rate it will require approximately seven weeks before the full force is at work.

"The project is of vital importance and if put into immediate operation will be of considerable value to the library. The city of Boston has set aside a large sum of money for materials and operating expenses. In the Park square building a large office covering half the third floor has been rented, in which the 50 people actually at work seem lost.

"The inexcusable delay in putting the 600 to work has already worked much hardship among the needy applicants, all of whom are qualified and have received special training for the work.
Today, May 3, marks the end of the second payless week for these persons.

Ask Speeding Up of Work

"In the name, therefore, of the 600 trained persons to be employed on Boston Public Library Project 100-5,
we request:

"1-That a sufficient force of investigators be assigned to determine immediately the need of all applicants for work on Library Project 100-5.

"2-That all persons formerly employed on the library re-cataloging projects as typists, time clerks, timekeepers, proof readers, catalogers and supervisors be immediately put to work pending investigation of their need, on the basis of the applications they have filled out under penalty of perjury.

"3-That a competent person be at once appointed by the administrator with full authority to determine the need of applicants for work on Library Project 100-5 on the basis of their applications, filled out under penalty of perjury, and on file in Room 29 of the Park Building."

Administrator Joseph P. Carney, when apprised of the protest, said that everything possible was being done to speed up the work of reclassification on all projects as well as on the one on the library work.

CITY TO RELEASE PAY TOMORROW

5000 Will Get Wages Held Up by Delay on Tax
Limit Bill

Their pay held up since Monday by the delay at the State House in the passage of the Boston tax limit bill, more than 5000 city employees will receive their wages tomorrow morning, provided attaches of the auditor and city treasurer's office can complete work on the payrolls by working overtime tonight.

Following enactment in both branches of the Legislature yesterday, Gov. Ely late in the afternoon signed the bill, which limits Boston's appropriations from the tax levy for the use of maintenance of the various departments to approximately $35,500,000. The bill fixes $17 per $1000 of property valuation as the limit which can be taken for department maintenance.

While the bill was held up for several days during debate in the Senate, nearly 1500 park and library department employees were waiting for money due them Monday afternoon.

Another 2200 men and women who worked as precinct attendants in the recent balloting for the pre-primary convention were due early in the week to receive the day's pay due them.
They also waited. Several hundred employees connected with the hospital department and the Suffolk superior court were also inconvenienced.

All week there were several million dollars in the Boston city treasury, but City Treasurer John H. Dorsey was for-bidden by law to pay it out to employees of those departments which had used their appropriations up to the designated limit. Departments could not spend more than one-third of the total amount which they spent last year until after passage of the tax limit bill.

DEFENDS 460 ERA LAYOFFS

Lord Declares Girls' Jealousy Caused Complaints

Jealousy on the part of those girl workers not retained was blamed today by Milton E. Lord, superintendent of the Boston Public Library, for complaints against Theodore D. Money, assistant librarian, in his handling of CWA and ERA workers.

Lord declared that where once 500 workers were employed on the library project in the card index system, now but 40 workers, it to cut down.

With no municipal playroom or recreational center except the settlement houses, the library must of necessity form the nucleus of community activity and cultural development in this underprivileged section of Noddle Island, the territory granted Samuel Maverick, when East Boston was a summer resort in 1633. The present mixed population, of which 70 per cent is Italian, occupies ground settled originally by English, who were closely followed by Scotch, Irish, Canadian, Swedish and other peoples.

"To Love New Country"

The library assumes responsibility to a certain extent for imparting to the immigrant residents in the district some knowledge of local history and of the Government of their adopted country, for developing in them an understanding of and a love for that country, a respect for its laws. Through the children they endeavor to reach the parents, supplying them with books in simple direct language.

In a region where high school students are kept under close surveillance both in class room and in hall, one can appreciate a few of the problems in discipline which a busy library staff, hardly adequate in number for the tremendous detail entailed in handling a collection of some 22,000 books, with a total circulation of 195,000 a year, encounters in the strenuous up-

Citizen Group Charges Incompetency ---Decline in Efficiency--- Many Books Unaccounted For

Declaring that the Boston Public Library has degenerated from its one-time position of pre-eminence, until now one out of every four books in active demand by the public cannot be accounted for, a citizens' committee will call on Mayor Mansfield and the library trustees for a thorough investigation, it was learned last night.

Claim Much Disorder

Stolen books do not account for the 24 per cent, unaccounted for, but careless or inadequate records are to blame, the committee will report. It is understood. Misplacing of returned books account for much of the alleged disorder, and lack of service to the public.

The preliminary report to be submitted to the Mayor and trustees today or tomorrow, it is said, declares that the prestige and importance of the Boston Public Library have actively declined since about 1917, when Dr. Josiah H.

fortunately for the child readers, the Children's Room suspends its regular activity and devotes itself to the baby clinic, for the library is a tenant of the building which houses the district police station and the health department as well.
Occasionally the mothers of the community become a trifle confused over the respective functions of the institutions. One of them, on a rainy morning, deposited her child in the reading room, announcing that she was going downtown shopping and asking the children's librarian to take care of the infant until she returned. Upon being informed, however, that there were a few things which did not come under the classification of library duties, she decided to request the assistance of the woman next door.

Miss Kingman received her training at the library school in Brooklyn, was six years librarian in the Providence Public Library, studied at the Pratt Institute, New York, and had her first branch experience in Mattapan. She took her present position in 1926.

After the number of librarians considered it well spent, in complying with requests for addresses on Americanization and citizenship.
Miss Elizabeth M. Gordon, the children's librarian, visits the schools and explains to the children the use of the library.

Telephone requests for information contribute their bright spots and obviate any possibility of a monotonous routine. "Please tell me," says a child's voice over the wire, "the names of all the boats of the Cunard steamship line, and how they got there, and give me the passenger lists."

Another young student wants a detailed record of everything the United States Government has done for veterans of past wars.

Then of course there is the housekeeping. Miss Scoff is responsible for seeing that the windows are cleaned, plenty of coal in the cellar, furniture kept in good repair. This branch was first opened in 1870 and now occupies its third site. It has never carried greater responsibility than it has during the past three years. It has had vastly more work to do than formerly, with smaller resources at its disposal. The reading rooms have been crowded. Circulation of all classes of books has increased, the demand often exceeding the supply, and the community requires have at times been almost overwhelming. But the people receive inspiration, enlightenment and help, and, say the work the response has been "gratifying."

Finds Dorchester History

A few miles away, at the Dorchester branch, Miss Marlen C. Kingman, who has been doing library work for 20 years, is building up the same cooperation between the branch and the local schools, and contributing unstintingly her energy and time, not only to the supervision of nearly 17,000 books, but to community exercises such as the reading and games group, of which she is chairman—a group organized as part of the recreational program of the Dorchester Joint Sectional Planning Committee.

During the Tercentenary celebrations, in 1930, she served on the committee, took part in the Dorchester Day parade, and furnished biographical material for the publication, "Dorchester Old and New."

As she sits at a table in the small workroom, her only sanctum now that she has given up her office to provide a little extra space for the general library work, she glances cheerfully over a time schedule of Major Roswell G. Hall, Boston ERA administrator, he started a thorough investigation of conditions alleged to have existed on the library project which was started by the CWA and continued under the ERA.

Considered as of startling nature was the charge that one worker on the library project was a "psychopathic case" who would have been in a hospital and "was despite alleged 'out-breaks' with these other girls within hearing of semi-hysterics," this person was raised to a responsible position and put in charge of other workers. If they complained about this person's treatment of them, the girls' charges were, faults were scored against them soon afterward on the "bookish chart" and as soon as the score appeared high enough they were fired.

Reported Too Much

One attractive girl of good family, who had held a responsible position on the library project, charged that when she reported alleged irregularities, and considered it her duty to keep on reporting them, her name on the chart mounted so rapidly that she was one of the first to reach the top and be discharged.

This girl's case, which is purported to be known to an ERA official, fully entitled her to retain her ERA employment, it was asserted. She was the only employed member of a large family, and she revealed last night that so desperate is her situation now that sometimes she cannot even obtain car-fares to come in to appeal for a review of her case by ERA officials.

Worker With Servants

Favoritism enabled one woman to keep her ERA job, it was asserted, even after the woman openly referred to her money and her "two servants." Needy girls at the time were being discharged, it was charged, while "mistakes, and worse, were being covered up for favorites who were kept on."

Administration Hall said last night that he is not prepared yet to say what action will be taken, pending conclusion of his investigation and his study of the report.

When attempts were made last night to reach Mr. Money for a statement on the conditions which girl workers on the library project said were intolerable, it was reported that he is "down South" on vacation.

stitution in the first project under the CWA last winter, and that the library is ready to place them at work as soon as they are certified.

He said that under the new regulations, however, the reclassification process is a slow one since all of the girls must show that they are actually in need. Those with dependents are given first choice.

The girls in their protest said yesterday that the process was so slow that many of them will be hard up before it is finished.

What Girls Suggest

The following list of suggestions was drawn up and submitted to the ERA officials by the girls:

"Boston Public Library Project 1007-S (transferring of shelf-list to typed cards) has been approved by the local ERA administration and passed by the State authorities to become immediately operative and to employ 660 persons."

"In the first week (week of May 1) only 30 persons have received slips and reported to work. At this rate it will require approximately seven weeks before the full force is at work."

"The project is of vital importance and if put into immediate operation will be of considerable value to the library. The city of Boston has set aside a large sum of money for materials and operating expenses. In the Park square building a large office covering half the third floor has been rented, in which the 89 people actually at work seem lost."

"The inexcusable delay in putting the 660 to work has already worked much hardship among the needy applicants, all of whom are qualified and have received special training for the work. Today, May 3, marks the end of the second payless week for these persons."

5000 Will Get Wages Held Up by Delay on Tax Limit Bill

Their pay held up since Monday by the delay at the State House in the passage of the Boston tax limit bill, more than 5000 city employees will receive their wages tomorrow morning, provided attaches of the auditor and city treasurer's office can complete work on the payrolls by working overtime tonight.

Following enactment in both branches of the Legislature yesterday, Gov. Elyerie in the afternoon signed the bill, which limits Boston's appropriations from the tax levy for the use of maintenance of the various departments to approximately $35,500,000. The bill fixes $17 per $1000 of property valuation as the limit which can be taken for department maintenance.

While the bill was held up for several days during debate in the Senate, nearly 15000 paid and library department employees were waiting for money due them Monday afternoon.

Another 2200 men and women, who worked as precept attendants in the recent balloting for the pre-primary convention were due early in the week to receive the day's pay due them. They also waited. Several hundred employees connected with the hospital department and the Suffolk superior court were also inconvenienced.

All week there were several million dollars in the Boston city treasury, but City Treasurer John H. Dorsey was forbidden by law to pay it out to employees of those departments which had used their appropriations up to the designated limit. Departments could not spend more than one-third of the total amount which they spent last year until after passage of the tax limit bill.

Demerits were marked all who filed complaints. It is charged of the workers. When was filled with a number of the worker was discharged.

With the complaints, the history of a was kept on at her many were discharged had admitted to her that she possessed a balance and employed servants.

One of the first complaints investigated today is young worker from a perous family who after she had reported among her subordinate favorite of the ad. The errors committed ordinates, it is said, checked against their each report listed, a was filed against the y and she was soon discharged.

"Robinson Crusoe" and "Daniel Bona" have become very real heroes and intimate friends of the hundreds of Italian children who pour themselves in and out of the juvenile department of the East Boston branch of the Boston Public Library.

With no municipal playroom or recreational center except the settlement houses, the library must of necessity form the nucleus of community activity and cultural development in this underprivileged section of Noddle Island, the territory granted Samuel Maverick, when East Boston was a summer resort in 1633. The present mixed population, of which 70 per cent is Italian, occupies ground settled originally by English, who were closely followed by Scotch, Irish, Canadian, Swedish and other peoples.

"To Love New Country"

The library assumes responsibility to a certain extent for imparting to the immigrant residents in the district some knowledge of local history and of the Government of their adopted country, for developing in them an understanding of and a love for their country, a respect for its laws. Through the children they endeavor to reach the parents, supplying them with books in simple direct language.

In a region where high school students are kept under close surveillance both in class room and in hall, one can appreciate a few of the problems in discipline which a busy library staff, hardly adequate in number for the tremendous detail entailed in handling a collection of some 22,000 books, with a total circulation of 196,000 a year, encounters in the strenuous uphill struggle to be the moral influence, the mental stimulant, the guide, the source of culture and beauty which Miss Theodora B. Scoff, the librarian, in common with all other branch librarians in the system, believes her institution should provide.

They smile and say little, these librarians, but struggle bravely on, with small encouragement and meager compensation, but when they can say in their reports, as the East Boston branch does: "The depression of the last four years created a real opportunity in the way of adult education. . . the East Boston branch rose to the emergency and was not found wanting. Men and women struggling against uneasiness and despair have been aided to maintain their morale by being furnished with books adapted to their needs," or "The serious reader wishing to prepare for a better position has been given not only the proper book but also special attention and encouragement," they feel somewhat repaid.

concern, went to the library to borrow light novels to while away the time. He had not had the opportunity in childhood to progress beyond the sixth grade. With kindly interest the library workers led him to historical fiction, then to American history. He gravitated next to sociology, economics and government. Now his favorite pastime is reading philosophy. He has returned to his job but continues to use his library card, declaring gratefully that he is gaining through the library an education denied him in his youth.

Every afternoon and every evening the children's rooms are filled. There are few, if any, books in the neighborhood homes. The library has to supply the children with pens and ink as well as personal assistance in doing their home lessons. The library lecture hall is in frequent demand for amateur dramatic group rehearsals, meetings of local clubs, travel lectures, exhibits.

Americanization as Hobby

Miss Scoff invests her leisure, and after the manner of librarians considers it well spent, in complying with requests for addresses on Americanization and citizenship. Miss Elizabeth M. Gordon, the children's librarian, visits the schools and explains to the children the use of the library.

Telephone requests for information contribute their bright spots and obviate any possibility of a monotonous routine. "Please tell me," says a child's voice over the wire, "the names of all the boats of the Cunard steamship line, and how they got them, and give me the passenger lists."

During the Tercentenary celebrations, in 1930, she served on the committees, took part in the Dorchester Day parade, and furnished biological material for the publication, "Dorchester Old and New."

As she sits at a table in the small workroom, her only sanctum now that she has given up her office to provide a little extra space for the general library work, she glances cheerfully over a time schedule of routine jobs. These are just a few—accessioning, packing books in bundles to be sent to central, clearing mistakes on borrowers' cards, talking to mothers' groups, making circulation catalogues, preparing publicity material for local papers, arranging exhibits for "Better Homes," "Art," and "Children's Book" weeks; preparing posters, clipping newspapers, looking up references, talking to classes in schools, answering telephone calls.

Strange are the topics on which modern youth desires information. One boy wants material for a debate on "Is Fascism better than Communism?" another on the value of business letters. A little girl asks how many trees there are on Boston Common. One child starts a wide round of inter-department calls among offices of city officials by demanding to know the exact colors and lengths of flashes of the different lighthouses and beacons in the harbor.

Crocuses grow in the West End, crocuses and jonquils. Later will come lilies, lilac plumes and roses. The Jewish tailor on the corner, peering through a veil of steam, praises Abraham. The Italian fruit vender breaks into a cadenza from Verdi. The Russian cobbler sighs and murmurs happily, "I remember—"

From Cambridge Street and Temple, Staniford and Green, and all the cobbled alleys of the West End, school children gaze with an air of proud protection on the green and growing things in their garden. Of course it is their garden. Miss Goldstein told them so. The "swell ladies on the hill," as they call the Beacon Hill Garden Club, gave it to them, but their librarian, ever since she took charge of the West End branch, in 1922, had dreamed of turning the unhappy-looking ground surrounding the library into a place of flowers.

Children Guard Flowers

To set out lilac bushes, ramblers, shrubs and plants, over the long period which the work required, and suffer only one mutilation of a very minor sort, in a neighborhood where, to a considerable extent, "pinching" is a frequent mode of acquisition, is a powerful indication of the immeasurable good which Miss Fanny Goldstein and her staff are achieving.

When the garden was finished they visited all the schools in the district and said, "Every boy, every girl is a committee of one to see that no harm comes to the garden." And they did a very thorough job, even to the little boy who got excited when a stranger picked a rose for his buttonhole, and he was powerless to interfere, for, he explained, "He don't belong here. He got creases in his pants."

They all bring their troubles to Miss Goldstein—the humble immigrant grocer whose daughters have had three months of college and refuse to give him any further help in the store; the unemployed, the hungry, the young couple in love whose parents have objected to their marriage; the restaurant kitchen worker whose ignorance of the law has been exploited by an unscrupulous attorney.

As Many Duties as Books

But, you will ask, does all this come within the duties of a branch librarian? Are there not enough tasks in the routine recording and lending of books, the endless details of cataloging and filing, examining and tracing, mending, collecting, reviewing, serving the public from behind a counter, looking up references, compiling charts and statistics?

Plenty! The West End Branch has about 25,000 books in its collection. Last year it circulated 221,000 volumes, 100 per cent increase over 10 years ago. This consists of approximately 50 per cent adult material and 50 per cent juvenile. The branch is the headquarters for Jewish research in Boston. Questions from city departments, organizations, individuals, regarding change. Growing up as she did in the North End, where she received her library training, and watching the transmigration there, she is keenly sensitive to the sociological factors at work on the hill.

Changed Population

The branch had the highest circulation until about five years ago, when the City of Boston widened Cambridge Street. The canceled leases of the more prosperous Jewish shopkeepers caused them to move to such districts as Roxbury and Mattapan, taking with them a highly intelligent and intellectual class of reader, who never needed any guidance as to what books to read. The large influx of Italian and Polish families, and the springing up of many little wine shops in the streets, have contributed to the greatly increased variety of service which the library must give.

While it is true that routine is sufficiently heavy to absorb a large proportion of the workers' time, the Public Library is no longer regarded as merely a storehouse for books. It is one of the most vital, most influential agencies of modern education. As Elizabeth M. Smith points out in the February Bulletin of the American Library Association, "More families are served by the public school system. An overwhelmingly greater number of families get direct service from the library than from health, fire and police departments, indispensable as these are as preventives."

Coöperate With Schools

Much time must be devoted to co-operating with the schools, to keeping pace with the topics the children are assigned, providing them with the required information to supplement their work, supplying exhibits in the form of illustrations or books.

Then, of course, the library workers have a little leisure—which they usually spend in reviewing new books, taking cultural courses at the central library, to equip them for better work; arranging mothers' group programs or lectures for the young; tending their own plants which they lend to the library or, as in the case of West End, the garden plot.

"The branch library," says Miss Goldstein, "stands for what is best in the community. The people who live around here don't know Copley Square, with its Abbey and Sar-

Russian, to see about a picture frame she had ordered. "What lovely thing is that?" she questioned as her eye fell on an exquisite piece of carving. "Penelope Weeping," was the answer. "And that on the other side?" "The funeral procession of Agamemnon."

"You have no Madonna which I could use in my library exhibit?" "I will make you one."

"But libraries are poor. I was looking for something we might borrow."

"I will make you one without charge. Some of the loveliest moments of my life have been spent in a corner of your library, watching the people come in and marveling at the interest which your things have aroused. It would be a privilege to carve a Madonna for the library." The black-lacquered, oak panel, with gold figures of the Nativity—a carved detail from Leonardo da Vinci's "Adoration of the Magi," is one of the most prized possessions of the West End Branch.

Teaches Homemaking

One outstanding service which the branch has undertaken has been its exhibition of inexpensive but tastefully planned interiors for the two or three-room apartment. Disturbed by the growing practice of buying on the installment plan, of young people's marrying without enough furniture of their own for even one room, Miss Goldstein, who had for a long time been trying to show them that a tiny home which they had paid for was a much surer foundation for a happy married life than a collection of fine furniture at $1 a week, sought the assistance of the Chamber of Commerce and the Retail Trade Board, through which she obtained introductions to the city department stores.

Housed in Historic Church

The three-room home daintily furnished for a total expenditure of $300, which the Jordan Marsh Company set up in the library, during "Better Homes Week" won a certificate awarded by the Massachusetts State Committee on Better Homes in America.

The building in which the library is housed was formerly the Old West Church, built in 1806 on the site of the edifice of 1737. The original served as a signal station for the American and a barracks for the British forces during the Revolutionary War. During the Civil War, Negro refugees made it a hiding place. Hand ovens and mattresses which they used were discovered but a few years ago under the buttressed roof. When Mrs. Jack Gardner wished to purchase it for a colored people's cathedral, the community, which had been paying taxes 10 years for a church where services were no longer held, appealed to the city to make it a branch library. It was thus established in 1886.

Questions from city departments, organizations, schools and individuals, regarding the Jews, come flooding in here from all parts of Massachusetts and also from other states. It possesses an extensive collection of works in Yiddish and Judaica in English.

Alert as every librarian must be to the trend of current history, Miss Goldstein is now developing an Italian and a Polish section, for the community is fast undergoing a change. Growing up as she did in the North End, where she received her library training, and watching the transmigration there, she is keenly sensitive to the sociological factors at work on the hill.

When the Passover table was exhibited, with its apple and nut confection symbolizing the clay from which the children of Israel made Pharaoh's bricks; its horseradish and bitter herbs for the tears they shed, and its pages of unleavened bread, a small, old grandmother, not believing what her granddaughter had told her, came to the library to see with her own eyes the tribute to her race.

Gift for Christmas

As Christmas approached, and the young ladies of the Junior League began to decorate the library, Miss Goldstein wandered down the hill in search of something suitable as a center piece. En route she stopped at the little shop of Boris Mirski, a looking for something we might borrow."

"I will make you one without charge. Some of the loveliest moments of my life have been spent in a corner of your library, watching the people come in and marveling at the interest which your things have aroused. It would be a privilege to carve a Madonna for the library." The black-lacquered, oak panel, with gold figures of the Nativity—a carved detail from Leonardo da Vinci's "Adoration of the Magi," is one of the most prized possessions of the West End Branch.

Teaches Homemaking

One outstanding service which the branch has undertaken has been its exhibition of inexpensive but tastefully planned interiors for the two or three-room apartment. Disturbed by the growing practice of buying on the installment plan, of young people's marrying without enough furniture of their own for even one room, Miss Goldstein, who had for a long time been trying to show them that a tiny home which they had paid for was a much surer foundation for a happy married life than a collection of fine furniture at $1 a week, sought the assistance of the Chamber of Commerce and the Retail Trade Board, through which she obtained introductions to the city department stores.

The three-room home daintily furnished for a total expenditure of $300, which the Jordan Marsh Company set up in the library, during "Better Homes Week" won a certificate awarded by the Massachusetts State Committee on Better Homes in America.

The building in which the library is housed was formerly the Old West Church, built in 1806 on the site of the edifice of 1737. The original served as a signal station for the American and a barracks for the British forces during the Revolutionary War. During the Civil War, Negro refugees made it a hiding place. Hand ovens and mattresses which they used were discovered but a few years ago under the buttressed roof. When Mrs. Jack Gardner wished to purchase it for a colored people's cathedral, the community, which had been paying taxes 10 years for a church where services were no longer held, appealed to the city to make it a branch library. It was thus established in 1886.

A list of questions used recently in examining candidates for position at the Boston Public Library selected from a book of "brain teasers," published by the Lydia Pinkham Company, were yesterday made public by the citizens' investigating committee, members of which submitted copies of a highly critical report to Mayor Mansfield and the library trustees.

The examination paper prepared by the director contains questions designed to test candidates' general and special knowledge, the report says.

Some of the questions contained in the examination pamphlet culled from the book of brain teasers are: "What hasn't scratched yet?" "How much does a special delivery stamp cost?" "Of what did the third little pig build his house?" "What woman had the first that launched a thousand ships?" "What was Mary Pickford's original name?" "Where is Edam cheese made?"

The report charges that the examination questions caused some amusement among candidates and resulted in a claim by some of the men that would have an advantage because of the source of some of the questions.

The examination, which was held in February, lasted two hours and was taken by a large number of men and women. The first part of the examination was to test general knowledge and the second part to test the candidate in the elementary knowledge of foreign language.

Denies Signing Report

Henry Lewis Johnson, whose name was given as one of those who had signed the report, yesterday denied that he had anything to do with it. Merle Colby, spokesman of the committee and a former CWA worker on the cataloging project at the library, wrote a reply to a letter received from Mr. Johnson last night explaining his position in the matter, and declaring that Mr. Johnson had said that he had signed the report and had sent it to the trustees of the library.

Theodore D. Money, controller of the library and in charge during the absence of the director, Milton E. Lord, said that no signed report had been received at the library. He said that some of the criticisms contained in the report were true but that the library was at present attempting to do all in its power to correct the flaws in its old mechanism through the CWA and ERA projects now being completed.

Welcomes Criticism

It was learned that Merle Colby had been certified as a needy case under the ERA and would shortly resume his work in the Park Square building, where the library work is being done.

In an official statement last night Mr. Money said: "The trustees of the Public Library of the City of Boston welcome criticism and suggestions from any source. I am sure that the trustees will be glad to receive the report of this group of citizens. The report has not been received by the trustees and consequently it is impossible for them to comment on the specific complaints. 'Thousands of suggestions and complaints are received and acted on each year. In addition, the library has the benefit of the informed criticism of the examining committee, a body of 25 citizens who submit a report to the trustees each year after an inspection of the library system.'

Boston's Rialto hurries to its lunch. The sidewalks of State Street, Washington and Milk; of City Hall Avenue and the historic School Street whither Benjamin Franklin, John Hancock, Cotton Mather and Ralph Waldo Emerson carried their grammars and exercise books, echo to the footsteps of lawyer, banker, clerk, broker, stenographer, politician and many other workers who pour themselves out of 10- to 15-story buildings between 11 o'clock and 2.

Some two hundred of them stop when they reach the Bulfinch-style, brick building opposite the City Hall. The vast majority of them pass without even noticing the dignified three-story edifice which Messrs. Putnam and Cox designed to occupy land once owned by the husband of Anne Hutchinson, where James Wilson, Boston's town crier lived in 1795, and where but a few years ago stood Police Station No. 2.

Memorial to Father

When the Edward Kirstein Memorial Library, given to the city, to commemorate his father, by Mr. Louis E. Kirstein, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Public Library and vice-president of William Filene's Sons Company, opened its doors to the public on May 7, 1930, the policemen of the old Station No. 2 called to express their delight at the improvement in the property.

Many men and women who used to quiver their steps as they passed the dingy old walls and glance, with a shudder, into the basement where the region's "drunks" and pickpockets had been thrown for the night, now spend whatever is left to them of their noon hour, after the necessary sandwich or bowl of soup, in the restful, quiet rooms of 20 City Hall Avenue.

This branch of the Public Library of Boston, the first to receive a building as a private gift, in striking contrast to the branches in the residential districts, serves almost entirely a business and professional clientele. The first and second floors, known as the business branch, are given over to books, periodicals, and pamphlets relating to business. The third floor, known as the Kirstein branch, provides the same service as that of any other adult public library, except that it does not carry business literature.

Service is the watchword. No matter how many volumes must be recorded, or how many library cards

made out, or bindings mended, or postcards sent notifying borrowers that a copy of "Anthony Adverse" is in, or statistics compiled, or reference cards typed out, there is always a pleasant smile and a word of welcome from Miss Grace C. Brady, the librarian, and her two assistants.

They soon become sufficiently acquainted with their readers to anticipate their wants and pick out the minute they enter some recently added book which they know will be acceptable. This is a branch where the workers must keep themselves informed "up to the minute." On Monday mornings, almost before the door is unlocked, residents on "The Hill" come asking for some new publication reviewed in metropolitan newspapers the Sunday before.

Both biography and literature are very much in demand. The business man, says Miss Brady, will ask for a biography of some successful, energetic self-made man; the "Autobiography of Lincoln Steffens" is also popular with that class of borrower. Lawyers usually prefer either a new book on public affairs or something on Scotland Yard. Bankers and brokers take out books on gardening, horseback riding, golf.

They also like biography, especially that which concerns royalty and noblemen. Salesmen like "100,000 Guinea Pigs" and "Life Begins at 40." Russia was a favorite subject for a time, but since the inauguration of the New Deal the problems of the United States take precedence.

"Digging Up" References

And that is a hint only of the tremendous amount of personal interest and attention displayed by the small staff of workers at the Kirstein branch. They furnish quotations from Patrick Henry, Ellihu Root, Abraham Lincoln, Chauncey M. Depew, Shakespeare and Julius Caesar, to embroider after-dinner speeches and commencement orations.

They prepare a daily tray of good novels for the clerks and stenographers who rush in during their lunch hours and can't take time to search the shelves. They keep the chefs of the neighborhood restaurants posted on the latest cookbooks and dietetic works. They take care of a collection of over 7000 books, with an annual circulation of 57,000.

They answer, as quickly as possible, such questions as "What is the epitaph on Virgil's tomb?" They work in the library from 9 to half past five. They spend their leisure acquiring additional culture, extra training, and wider knowledge, in order to be better librarians and give even greater service.

It is interesting to travel, from the Kirstein branch, with no child reader at all, to the Mattapan Branch Library, one of the largest on the list, where the child borrower is quite a specialty. Transferring their patronage from the West End, many of the young people, who have moved, as their parents' livings have changed their nature and environments, have swelled the circulation of the more suburban branches.

Always a reading public of a more or less intellectual order, the Mattapan card holders are responsible for an adult circulation of 91,000 and a juvenile circulation of 68,000 fiction and 26,000 nonfiction, approximately, for the year.

The readers in this neighborhood are not the downtrodden and hungry, the desperately needy of the more underprivileged districts which the public libraries serve. Social contacts are comfortable; Miss Ada Aserkoff, the librarian, who has worked for the Boston Public Library system since 1916, and her efficient assistants give unstintingly of their own time to supplement the cultural and educational activities of the branch.

Quietly helpful, as they move about the lovely modern building, selecting here a volume on Renaissance painters, for a young art student; there a biography of Lincoln for a junior high school boy, they impart a homelike serenity, which is something of an achievement in view of the immense mass of detail which the daily routine involves.

The large, pleasant room for children, with its windows looking out on the tulip and iris beds which the workers have planted, often contains of an afternoon about 200 young students doing their homework—an occupation in which Miss Mildred Kimball, the Children's Librarian, is called upon to take part.

Helps With Schoolwork

She is an expert disciplinarian. For she has an understanding heart. There was an 11-year-old Billy, for instance, who could not refrain from disturbing the other children. After much patience and many attempts to stop his mischievous pranks, Miss Kimball was compelled to inform him that he would have to refrain from visiting the library until his behavior improved. He was absent for two months, at the end of which he stood, contrite, on the threshold of the room. "Please," he murmured, "I've had my punishment. I got poor things up in the library." He asked Miss Kimball to help him with his homework, and has been entirely cooperative ever since.

wives, mariners, milliners and policemen, who hold cards of membership at the central source or in one of the 33 branches of the Boston system. Why Mr. R. L. Duffus, in his book, "Our Starving Libraries," concerning the effect of the economic conditions of the last few years on public libraries, should have omitted all mention of Boston as a typical community, remains a mystery.

Book Demand Heavy

Taking exception to the New York Times review of Mr. Duffus' book, which implied that Boston had dropped "to an unimportant place" in library activity, the present director, Mr. Milton E. Lord, whose experience at the library of the University of Iowa and the Vatican Library, in Rome, should qualify him to speak, points out that the increase in demand for library facilities has been just as great here as in any other city in the country.

A visit to eight of the branches, which a Monitor correspondent has recently paid certainly reveals no sign of inaction or lack of patronage. There can be no profession where more diverse qualities are required in one individual than in the branch librarian. As tutor, mother, guide, friend and counselor, the woman who has supervision of any one of these institutions, housing collections of from 5000 to 500,000 volumes, has established beyond doubt her immeasurable value to the community she serves.

In each Boston public school the same lessons are taught in the same grade, the same textbooks used whether in Roxbury or Mattapan. This standardization cannot be applied to the public library. Not even the library workers can plan the changing demand or solve by algebra the amount of biography which will be needed at the Allston branch, or the number of books on heraldry and genealogy which the Negro population of Roxbury Crossing will require. But there must be hospitality and human sympathy. These are inviting bookshelves, the attractive exhibits, the friendly word of welcome mean more than their intricate tongues can ever express. "In public interest and support, in liberality of laws and appropriations, in magnitude of individual gifts, the modern library movement in the United States, Canada and Great Britain," says the New International Encyclopedia, "far surpasses any other professional body established beyond doubt her immeasurable value to the community she serves."

Andrew Carnegie found nothing promising higher returns for the good of humanity than the public library in those communities where it is pledged to contribute to such an institution with one-tenth the sum which he gave for the building. Modern legislation aims to make it easy to establish and difficult to abolish public libraries. "A person who enters a library," says Miss Guerrier, "should find repose; and the librarian must be a helpful and charming hostess." This creed is reflected throughout the workers' having made every effort to render the fullest possible service from the grubby little fellow needing help with his home-lessons to the scholar delving into Aramaic verbs.

Wide Scope of Duties

The close work with the public schools, the "Better Homes" activities, the education of the immigrant, the reforming of the juvenile gangster, the developing of latent talent and many other duties which fall into the category of the Boston branch librarian, demand an extremely high grade of training, a cultural background, a cooperative approach to all problems, and the public or the library personnel, an alert and intelligent mentality, and a fund of humor and common sense.

The routine duties are exacting. Accuracy is absolutely essential. There is never time during office hours to accomplish all the helpful things which a book-reading community demands. The librarians feel that community service is important. Meetings can be addressed, library grounds cultivated, lectures delivered, children's clubs organized, books reviewed, cultural courses undertaken, in their own time. They never cease planning, never let their enthusiasm flag. They contribute not only their leisure but their property as well.

Libraries have no appropriation for plants or flower seeds; and if a librarian once in a while sacrifices a emphatically demanded by the supervisor of branches, Miss Edith Guerrier, who has herself been a branch librarian, in her earlier days in the Boston system, with which she has been connected for 25 years.

Inspiration to Needy Most of the Boston branches clientele live in crowded tenements. The local library is their refuge from the cares that infest the day. The pleasant reading rooms, the inviting bookshelves, the attractive exhibits, the friendly word of welcome mean more than their inadequate tongues can ever express.

"In public interest and support, in magnitude of individual gifts, in the modern library movement in the United States, Canada and Great Britain," says the New International Encyclopedia, "far surpasses any general interest in libraries of former days or of other regions."

Andrew Carnegie found nothing promising higher returns for the good of humanity than the public library. In those communities pledged to contribute to such an institution with one-tenth the sum which he gave for the building, Modern legislation aims to make it easy to establish and difficult to abolish public libraries.

"A person who enters a library," says Miss Guerrier, "should find repose; and the librarian must be a helpful and charming hostess." This creed is reflected throughout the entire system, and no visitor is allowed to leave a branch without the workers' having made every effort to render the fullest possible service, from the grubby little fellow needing help with his home-lessons to the scholar delving into Aramaic verbs.

Wide Scope of Duties The close work with the public schools, the "Better Homes" activities, the education of the immigrant, the reforming of the juvenile gangster, the developing of latent talent, and many other duties which fall into the category of the Boston branch librarian, demand an extremely high grade of training, a thorough academic education, a cultural background, a cooperative approach to all problems, either with the public or the library personnel, an alert and intelligent mentality, and a fund of humor and common sense.

The routine duties are exacting. Accuracy is absolutely essential. There is never time during office hours to accomplish all the helpful things which a book-reading community demands. The librarians must be addressed, lectures delivered, children's clubs organized, books reviewed, cultural courses undertaken, in their own time. They never cease planning, never contribute not only their leisure but their property as well.

of some of the questions. The examination, which was held in February, lasted two hours and was taken by a large number of men and women. The first part of the examination was to test general knowledge and the second part to test the candidate in the elementary knowledge of foreign language.

Denies Signing Report

Henry Lewis Johnson, whose name was given as one of those who had signed the report, yesterday denied that he had anything to do with it. Mr. Colby, spokesman of the committee, said that the report was signed by a former CWA worker on the cataloging project at the library, who had been given a letter from Mr. Johnson last night explaining his position in the matter and declaring that Mr. Johnson had said that he had signed the report and had sent it to the trustees of the library.

Theodore D. Money, controller of the library and in charge during the absence of the director, Milton E. Lord, said that no signed report had been received at the library. He said that some of the criticisms contained in the report were true but that the library was at present attempting to do all in its power to correct the flaws in an old mechanism through the CWA and ERA projects now being completed.

Welcomes Criticism

It was learned that Merle Colby had been certified as a needy case under the ERA and would shortly resume his work in the Park Square building, where the library work is being done.

In an official statement last night Mr. Money said: "The trustees of the Public Library of the City of Boston welcome criticism and suggestions from any source. I am sure that the trustees will be glad to receive the report of this group of citizens. The report has not been received by the trustees and consequently it is impossible for them to comment on the specific complaints. Thousands of suggestions and complaints are received and acted on each year. In addition, the library has the benefit of the informed criticism of the examining committee, made up of 25 citizens each year after an inspection of the library system."

M. E. Lord Praises Pope As Librarian

The Boston Chapter of the Special Libraries Association held its regular monthly meeting at the North End Branch Library last Tuesday evening. Milton E. Lord, Director of the Boston Public Library, was the guest of the Association and spoke on the "Special Libraries in Rome." Mr. Lord spent several years in the Vatican Library, cataloging the collection there and praised the work of His Holiness, Pope Pius XIII, while Librarian of the Vatican Library.

Previous to the meeting 88 members enjoyed an Italian dinner at the Como Restaurant.

The visitors were interested in an exhibit of sculpture, the work of John DeStefano, which was loaned for the occasion. John is 19 years old, living in the North End, and is connected with the P. C. DeLuca Studios where the work shown was done. He attended the modeling class at the North Bennet Industrial School for three years and recently received a medal for his relief of President Roosevelt.

Heads Library Board

WILLIAM CARDINAL O'CONNELL

CARDINAL IS PRESIDENT OF LIBRARY TRUSTEES

Herald Editor Is Chosen Vice-President of Board

William Cardinal O'Connell was elected president of the board of trustees of the Boston public library at the annual meeting of that group at the library yesterday afternoon. Frank W. Buxton, editor of The Boston Herald, was elected vice-president of the board, the position in which the Cardinal served for the past year.

Cardinal O'Connell has served on the board for about two years, having been appointed by former Mayor Curley to succeed the late Mr. Arthur T. Connolly. In the absence of John L. Hall, retiring president, the Cardinal presided at the meeting as vice-president.

BOUQUET FOR B. P. L. SYSTEM

To the Editor of The Herald:
A short while ago your newspaper ran a story or two regarding alleged inefficiency at the Boston Public Library.

For quite a long period of time I have used the Boston library system, and might I respectfully state that I consider it well organized and well run. I know of no other city department where the employees are more courteous or better disciplined than they are in the library department. Time and again I have observed the tact and patience of employees of the library in dealing with the general public.

Politics plays no part in our library system. The governing body, the board of trustees, is made up of our most eminent citizens, and membership on this board is rightly considered one of the highest honors that the mayor of Boston can bestow upon a citizen of this city.

Of late years, during the depression, the number of people using the library system has been greatly increased, while the appropriations for books has been materially cut, hence it is impossible for one to go to the library and get all the books that he or she desires at once. I consider that I am doing well if I can get half the number of books requested, that other citizens who are as much entitled to the books as I am are perhaps using the particular book or books that I desire. I must have patience and appreciate the difficulties under which the system is operating.

As a member of our city government who has come in contact with all city departments, I consider our library department second to none in efficiency. I am quite proud of it, and I believe justifiably so.

Council Chamber of Boston, May 18.

CARDINAL NEW LIBRARY HEAD

Elected to Presidency of Board of Trustees

Cardinal O'Connell was elected president of the Public Library trustees at the annual meeting of the board which was held yesterday. He succeeds John L. Hall, a Boston lawyer, Frank W. Buxton, editor of the Boston Herald, was elected vice-president, the office formerly held by Cardinal O'Connell. The president of the board holds office for a year. All of the trustees including Louis E. Kirstein, vice-president of William Filene's Sons Company, and Ellery Sedgwick, Boston magazine editor, have served as presidents of the board in past years. In the absence of Mr. Hall, Cardinal O'Connell presided at yesterday's meeting.

THE BOSTON HERALD

PRESIDENT, B. P. L.

Cardinal O'Connell and the city are both to be congratulated on his election as president of the trustees of the Boston Public Library. He is to be warmly commended for setting an unselfish example of citizenship. He has been on the board already for two years. The duties which he has assumed now as president are more or less thankless, often exasperating and always time-consuming. He succeeds an excellent president under whom he has sat as vice-president, John L. Hall.

Boston is fortunate in that it obtains the services of one of the really cultured gentlemen of his generation, who is also a first class organizer and administrator, and the outstanding Catholic prelate of the country.

The great institution is excelled only by the Congressional, Harvard and New York libraries. It could not be under better guidance. The little distinction comes appropriately at the time when his memoirs are to appear and the community is preparing to honor him on the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination to the priesthood.

SUSPENDED FROM E. R. A. LIBRARY JOB

Police Guard Controller Money's Records

Suspension of Theodore D. Money, controller of the Boston Public Library and director of C. W. A. and E. R. A. Library projects, yesterday morning, by Milton E. Lord, director of the library, was followed last night by removal of all project records to the library, from the Park sq. Building, and the posting of a police guard over them.

Money said last night he did not know why he was suspended and that the only reason given him was: "You are suspended because the value of your services to the Boston Public Library have been impaired." Money said that Lord refused to discuss the matter with him further. It was learned that a police guard had been ordered over the records day and night.

Director Under C. W. A.

Money has been director of the filing and indexing projects at the library since the C. W. A. started functioning in November. His was the first payroll to be disbursed in Massachusetts.

Under the C. W. A. he had 615 girls working under him, but the number has been reduced to 200 under the E. R. A.

Money—

A new E. R. A. project calling for employment of more than 700 girls was scheduled to start work tomorrow. All work has been done at the Park sq. Building.

"I cannot understand how a man can be suspended in this way and no explanation given him," said Money last night. "I cannot even guess the reason."

"I have tried to do a real job for the E. R. A. and think I have. I am determined to push this to the limit and make them come out into the open and tell me what it is all about."

Will Appeal to Trustees

Money said he would appeal to the trustees of the library in an effort to find out what the true situation is and discover the charges against him, if any. Lord has been named to temporarily take over the post left vacant by the suspension of Money.

Money yesterday morning was told verbally that he was suspended. At 10 o'clock last night he received a special delivery letter which read: "I hereby give you notice of your suspension from the Library Service."

"Signed, Milton E. Lord." Lord could not be reached late last night.

Revolver Taken

Among personal belongings of Money taken from the Park-sq. Building, it was reported, was a revolver. Money, who returned two weeks ago from a company trip in the South, said he had a permit to carry the revolver and had left it in the desk at his office.

No complaint concerning the work of Money as director of the Government relief projects had ever been reported. C. W. A. and E. R. A. officials were quoted several times during the past winter as saying that Money had any fault it was that he was too conscientious and attempted to obtain too high a quality of work from the unemployed girls who had been assigned to him for the library projects.

LIBRARY OFFICER IS SUSPENDED

Lord Declares Comptroller Money Impaired Value Of Services'

POLICE ASSIGNED TO GUARD RECORDS

Theodore Davis Money, comptroller of the Boston Public Library since December, 1929, was suspended yesterday by Milton E. Lord, director, because "the had impaired the value of his services to the library."

This notice was given verbally to Mr. Lord at the office of the Boston Public Library ERA project, room 330, Park square building. Last night a special delivery letter was received by Money from Director Lord in which he was notified in writing of the suspension.

The position pays a salary of $10,000 a year. Money, at his home, 48 Cedar Lane, gave no reasons for his suspension. He has appealed to the board of trustees, which will consider the case at a future meeting.

Director Lord said last night the suspension was not due to any ERA complaints, but that it "developed from a general library point of view."

The mystery of Money's suspension became more confusing when it was learned that specially assigned policemen were on night and day duty at the offices of the library ERA project, guarding library records. Money was in charge of this project, along with his other duties.

Order from police headquarters was sent to station 16 Friday night to detail night and day men to the office over the week end. Police say library officials feared that a discharged employee might cause trouble and destroy the records.

TO BE MOVED BACK
It is understood by police that the records, which are part of the catalogue of the music collection at the library being retyped by ERA workers, will be moved back to the library tomorrow morning. The total collection of cards is about 20,000.

Money, who was appointed by the board of trustees four and a half years ago, came to the library from the General Electric Company, a Bridgeport, Ct., where he had been production manager. He is married and has a daughter, Patricia Davis, 8, is a graduate of Leland Stanford University, 1924, and Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1928.

The first he knew about his suspension, he said, was at 10 A. M. yesterday, his day off, when he walked into the library project office in the Park Square building. He declared Mr. Lord and three members of his staff and two policemen were there and that Mr. Lord informed him of the suspension.

With Director Lord in the office were Richard Hensley, in charge of the special reference department; William Kenney, head of the bindery department; and Pierce Buckley, head of the general reference department. Money said.

LIBRARY AIDE SUSPENDED IN MYSTERY ERA SHAKEUP

Money's Records and Payrolls All Removed; His Office in Copley Sq. Building Under Police Guard; Gun Included in Lot

Into the stormy history of CWA and ERA work in the Boston Public Library a new and mysterious chapter was written yesterday as Assistant Librarian Theodore D. Money, in charge of the ERA project administration, was summarily suspended and his records, documents and payrolls removed from his office under police guard.

Among the office effects so removed and guarded was a revolver, it was admitted last night.

Suspension of Money was by order of Librarian Milton E. Lord with the explanation that Money's "usefulness to the library has been impaired."

Money, himself, declared that the action against him came as a complete surprise.

"Some powerful influence is trying to get my job for a friend or ally," Money charged last night in his home, 46 Cedar Lane Way, Beacon Hill. "I have had no quarrel with Director Lord or any other library official or employee."

FEARED BREAK IN HOME

"I removed that revolver from my home to the office on advice of a police officer of Station 2, last Tuesday night, after I discovered somebody had tried to break into my house. I showed the officer my gun, which was in a desk drawer, and displayed my permit to carry it. He suggested I take it out of the house lest burglars find the weapon."

"I will retain control Monday morning and demand filing of charges and a hearing before the trustees."

"For hours I have tried to get in touch with members of the board by telephone to ask an explanation of Director's action. Two of the members are abroad and I was not able to contact the other trustees."

Lord, he said, repeated that his "usefulness had been impaired."

"Just what does that mean—what are the charges?" Money persisted.

"I refuse to answer," Lord replied, according to Money. Interviewed last night, Lord said, "It's a question of the quality of his (Money's) work and a question of his general relationship with his associates, that is to say, with his fellow workers."

Lord said he has named as temporary appointee in Money's place James W. Kenney, chief of the library binding department, a veteran of 24 years of service with the Boston public library, first under the CWA, now under the ERA, have been repeatedly under fire.

The executive office of the library ERA, originally at the Central library, was shifted to quarters in Joynton st., then shifted again to Park sq.

The records yesterday were moved back to the Central library again and special police officers of the library staff were detailed to stand guard.

LIBRARY OFFICIAL IS OUSTED

Comptroller Money Also Loses His ERA Position

Theodore D. Money, comptroller of the Boston Public Library and head of its CWA and ERA projects for the past six months was suspended from the library staff and dismissed from his ERA position by Milton E. Lord, director of the library, following a stormy session attended by policemen yesterday in the library's ERA offices in the Park Square building.

POLICE GUARD OFFICE

Yesterday morning Comptroller Money, despite it being his day off, walked into his office to find Director Lord attended by police from the Back Bay station superintending the removal of all papers and records from his office. Patrolman Harold E. Quinn who was ordered to put Comptroller Money out of the office and to keep him out, according to police, seized a loaded .38 caliber Colt automatic pistol allegedly found in Mr. Money's desk and sent it to police headquarters. Police admitted that he is licensed to possess and carry firearms.

The officer was left on guard in the office throughout the day after Director Lord had removed Mr. Money's records to the library building in Copley square, and was relieved by another patrolman last night. Police stated that at Director Lord's personal request a day and night guard had been established both in the main library building and in the ERA office in Park square, to be maintained through today and tonight, until tomorrow morning.

The suspended comptroller and former ERA official, according to orders police said they had received, was not to be allowed to enter his former office in either building. Mr. Money last night professed to be completely at a loss as to the reason for Director Lord's attempt to summarily dismiss him. He said that he reminded the director that inasmuch as he had been appointed comptroller by the board of trustees four and one-half years ago only the board could remove him.

Director Lord would not elaborate on his statement yesterday that he had suspended Comptroller Money after advising him that his "value to the library had been impaired."

His action against the comptroller, the director declared, resulted from a question of "satisfactory performance of his duties" and he asserted that the difficulty had arisen entirely within the library itself and was not a result of charges hurled at Mr. Money's administration of the library's CWA and ERA cataloging projects.

9000 E. R. A. JOBS IN HUB

150 Women Already at Work in Library

E. R. A. projects, in so far as the Boston Public Library is concerned, are going forward efficiently and with a noticeable absence of confusion and discord. While it is planned to put about 700 women and girls back at work on important tasks only about 150 started work today.

R. G. Hensley, who is in charge of the E. R. A. projects here, has been busy for several days sending out notices to those to be reemployed and all on the lists have not yet been requested to come in.

City Administrator Maj. Roswell G. Hall, superintendent of buildings, estimates that he will soon be able to put some 9000 at work in the city but this cannot be accomplished at once. Boston hopes to maintain this number at work from month to month as its quota. The important task at present is the weeding out of those found not to be supporting two or more dependents and the replacement of a number of skilled laborers with unskilled laborers as fast as the old C. W. A. projects are terminated and new E. R. A. projects of a different character are started. Notices have been and are being sent out to applicants for the new jobs and as fast as they come in they are assigned.

At Maj. Hall's office in City Hall it was reported today that a number had come in and had been assigned to jobs but the actual number could not be definitely stated.

Inspecting Government Pork

E. R. A. officials are much concerned about the distribution of Government pork which is being inspected by Board of Health officials to make certain none is unsanitary, as has been reported. The pork is wrapped and inspectors are obliged to unwrap and inspect it before permitting its distribution.

Maj. Hall is busy reclassifying all his applicants. Nevertheless his projects are being carried on at the same time. He is having his assignment slips for applicants for jobs sent out very carefully and he already has some 2000 such slips held in abeyance for fear of exceeding his $640,000 quota for May.

State Administrator Carney is setting up commissaries all over the State to take care of the pork and such articles as are donated by the Government. He also is providing for an inspection of all food products before they are distributed.

Mr. Carney is waiting to hear from Mayors of cities and chairmen of boards of Selectmen of towns on their action on his request that grievance committees be appointed to handle complaints. He is selecting members of the State grievance committee which he will announce later. This committee will be a part of the system for getting rid of chiselers and insuring the employment of needy persons.

Mayor Mansfield has been asked to name a board of five which he will do at once.

9000 E. R. A. JOBS IN HUB

150 Women Already at Work in Library

E. R. A. projects, in so far as the Boston Public Library is concerned, are going forward efficiently and with a noticeable absence of confusion and discord. While it is planned to put about 700 women and girls back at work on important tasks only about 150 started work today.

R. G. Hensley, who is in charge of the E. R. A. projects here, has been busy for several days sending out notices to those to be reemployed and all on the lists have not yet been requested to come in.

City Administrator Maj. Roswell G. Hall, superintendent of buildings, estimates that he will soon be able to put some 9000 at work in the city but this cannot be accomplished at once. Boston hopes to maintain this number at work from month to month as its quota. The important task at present is the weeding out of those found not to be supporting two or more dependents and the replacement of a number of skilled laborers with unskilled laborers as fast as the old C. W. A. projects are terminated and new E. R. A. projects of a different character are started. Notices have been and are being sent out to applicants for the new jobs and as fast as they come in they are assigned.

At Maj. Hall's office in City Hall it was reported today that a number had come in and had been assigned to jobs but the actual number could not be definitely stated.

E. R. A. officials are much concerned about the distribution of Government pork which is being inspected by Board of Health officials to make certain none is unsanitary, as has been reported. The pork is wrapped and inspectors are obliged to unwrap and inspect it before permitting its distribution.

Maj. Hall is busy reclassifying all his applicants. Nevertheless his projects are being carried on at the same time. He is having his assignment slips for applicants for jobs sent out very carefully and he already has some 2000 such slips held in abeyance for fear of exceeding his $640,000 quota for May.

State Administrator Carney is setting up commissaries all over the State to take care of the pork and such articles as are donated by the Government. He also is providing for an inspection of all food products before they are distributed.

Mr. Carney is waiting to hear from Mayors of cities and chairmen of boards of Selectmen of towns on their action on his request that grievance committees be appointed to handle complaints. ## MONEY SEEKS A REASON FOR DISCHARGE

If Librarian Milton E. Lord of the Boston Public Library, or anyone else for that matter, will only explain to Theodore D. Money, suspended comptroller, why he lost his job, Money will stand host to a chicken dinner.

"I am still in the dark as to why I was suspended last Saturday," Money declared today. "I have been in charge of the C. W. A. and E. R. A. work at the library for six months and have been perfectly friendly with Mr. Lord."

"I got the word of my suspension by word of mouth, then a written notice, and the only thing it said was my 'value to the library had been impaired.'"

"I'll give a chicken dinner to the man who tells me what it's all about."

Librarian Lord wasn't around to explain why he had let Money out. Acting Comptroller James W. Kenney, who replaced Money, said he didn't know either. ERA Director Roswell G. Hall professed ignorance.

"I'm all at sea too," Maj. Hall asserted. "I expect to receive a report from Mr. Lord today and will have a statement after a conference with him."

Money has been comptroller of the library for four years. He said he would fight his suspension to a finish. The matter is scheduled to be heard by the library trustees some day this week.

About 700 women were expected to be at work on the library ERA projects before the day was out. Probably 10,000 men and women while back on their ERA jobs this week, Maj. Hall said.

KENNEY TO SUPERVISE LIBRARY PROJECTS

Will Replace Money—709 Girls to Resume Work

Suspension of Theodore D. Money, controller of the Boston Public Library, had nothing to do with his C. W. A. or E. R. A. work, as far as can be learned. Milton E. Lord, director of the library, told Maj. Hall, Boston director of E. R. A. yesterday that Money was discharged for reasons concerned strictly with the library and its policies.

Maj. Hall agreed to appoint James W. Kenney, binder of the library, to replace Money. "Work will go on as planned," said Maj. Hall, "and the 709 girls will be at work as soon as possible."

Maj. Hall said last night he has sent out his full quota of 10,000 slips but the total number is not yet at work.

Saugus will have an administrator appointed today by Mr. Carney. "The politicians haven't been able to let the E. R. A. alone there and the town cannot seem to decide whom it will select as administrator," he said. Mr. Carney is awaiting Mayors' appointments of local appeal and grievance boards. Mayor Mansfield will appoint a board of five for Boston shortly.

Dick Shakespeare Kills Mice in Charlestown Library And Also Chases Many Out of Bunker Hill Monument

Dick Shakespeare, pet of the Charlestown branch of the Boston Public Library, whose birthday party was cancelled because he is a kind of hermit and wants all the catnip favors for himself.

By BARBARA SCHOFIELD

Because he's a kind of hermit, so far as cats are concerned, Dick Shakespeare, pet of the Charlestown branch of the Boston Public Library, will not be given a birthday party this year.

There was to have been a party. It was to have been an elaborate affair, with catnip mice for favors. Celebrated cats from all sections of Greater Boston were to have attended. But Tim Harrington, custodian of the library, finally vetoed it.

Even if the guests came in crates, like soldiers traveling in armored cars, Tim was sure that Dick would manage to get at them. Dick allows no cats or dogs either, for that matter, to enter the library. Besides, libraries are supposed to be silent places for the reading of books. Where else would one expect to find caterwauling if not at a cat party?

PRESERVES MONUMENT LOG

One of Dick's greatest public services to date has been to preserve the log of the Bunker Hill monument from an enemy which he and men have in common—mice. Every year thousands of visitors from all parts of the world sign their names in the books at the monument and mice have been devouring these tasty sample of imported hand writing.

Dick, having chased all the mice out of the library, visited the monument and added it to his hunting preserve. Sometimes Tim Harrington has to hang around the library until after 10 o'clock at night, waiting for Dick to return from the monument. Tim never locks up or goes home until Dick is safely in bed.

But Dick is pretty punctual, not at all like some of the young persons who would just as soon sit on the benches by the monument and whisper sweet nothings until dawn or a policeman chased them home.

Tim is so fond of Dick that he even goes to the library on his day off to make sure Dick has been fed. He makes sure that Dick has fish on Friday, so that he will eat no meat except mice on that fast day.

WAS KIDNAPED ONCE

Once, Patrolman Edward Winn, who used to be the officer at the library, kidnaped Dick and took him to police station 15 in City square. He did it, not to give the public the idea of looking for kidnapers in police stations, but to tease Mr. Harrington, who was worried nearly sick.

One pay day, Harrington visited the station, still mourning for his friend, the cat. Dick, on duty in the station, looked up and mewed his recognition. Harrington's sorrow was forgotten in reunion. The reunion was no whit less jubilant than the way Dick nearly bowls the postman over when a letter comes addressed to him, with a gift of catnip in it. Dick can smell such letters as soon as the postman enters the library door, and is on his shoulder and into his mail bag in an instant.

Whenever Miss Mariette Obenauer of the children's library, goes to her home in Norwich N. Y., for a vacation, she never forgets to drop Dick a line—with catnip. An elderly woman card holder in the library also sends him regular donations.

SOMETIMES JEALOUS

The other day, Dick ventured out on the library flag-pole, and, when he reached the ball on the end, he discovered he has grown too big to turn around on a dime. His wheelbase is too long, or something. He clung there, paralyzed with fright. At least, all of him was paralyzed except his meower, which seemed more active than ever.

Joseph Cotter, a student in the Tufts medical school, crawled out on the flag-pole, hand over hand, and pulled Dick back by the tail. But Dick was too intelligent to complain about the tail-pulling. He was glad to get back to his pile of books.

Dick sometimes is jealous of the books. When one of his friends is trying to read, Dick comes along and sprawls on his book, waiting to be patted. If his friend gives up and moves to another book, Dick moves, too. He keeps himself between the reader's eyes and the fine print until his friend surrenders, and gives all his attention to Dick.

RECOGNIZES BOUNDARY

A few days ago, a nondescript little dog foolishly ventured as far as the second floor of the library. Dick came riding down the stairs on his back, and chased him out of the building. Exultant over the victory, he toppled over the afternoon by disposing of two full-grown police dogs simultaneously.

Nonetheless, when Harrington goes home to lunch, Dick follows him as far as the monument, then sits and watches as the meows until he returns over the Bunker Hill an hour later. Dick seems to recognize an imaginary boundary as the limit of his domain. Within these limits, no cat or dog may walk with safety, but, once gained, the imaginary line is as much protection to fleeing animals as a wire fence would be. Dick will not pursue beyond it.

Dick may be said to be a lonely cat, and yet he isn't. He doesn't care for girl friends, human or feline. Even Miss Obenauer, who sends him the lovely catnip, receives no recognition from him. He is a man's cat, and pals around with Harrington and the men. But that doesn't mean that another Tom cat may walk in the neighborhood. Dick does not like the company of cats.

Special Skin Treatment for B. P. L. Nudists Who Got Pretty Dirty in Four Decades

It takes more than soap and water to clean Boston's outstanding nudists; the little boys who appear on the seal of the Boston Public Library. When first set up, in 1895, they were gleaming white marble and shocked Boston ladies took to wearing broad-brimmed hats. Later, when the statue of Bechante was set up in the library courtyard, heavy veils came into vogue.

Eventually Bechante was run out of town through force of public opinion, but the little boys, "in what artists call the nude," have stood proudly for nearly forty years, under the motto Lux Omnia Civium, which out-of-town visitors who have not had a classical education sometimes mistake for a plug of a popular soap.

There seems to be some truth in the saying: Beauty is only skin-deep; moral, little boys is not merely surface but goes right into the "pores," according to the Library engineering force. Even if the marble lads were firmly washed all over, the result would be only temporary. The "pore dirt" would work its way out. Sand-blasting would do no good, either, as the seal is made of Tennessee marble, which does not take kindly to such drastic treatment. Eventually the Library trustees, whose seal it is, decided to call in a specialist. It has been pretty embarrassing for the group to have those grubby little boys surrounded by the words: "The Trustees of the Public Library of the City of Boston, 1822-1878."

"Cleanliness," said the board of trustees to their president, Cardinal O'Connell, "is next to godliness."

Accordingly, they called in Edwards J. Gale, library architect, who got in touch with Arthur D. Little, Inc., chemists and engineers. They set up a staging and scaffolding, clambered up and gave a look at the unvarnished little boys and their stained to wash out, he muttered, and got to work with an assortment of chemicals, free of harmful acids, which he expects will make the boys spotless in no time.

The staging will be up for some time but it is expected that the pair will emerge from the treatment pure as the driven snow. If not, Elizabeth Arden and Helena Rubenstein will be called into consultation.

The Librarian

Rambles Among the Bookshelves

MEMBERS of the Massachusetts Library Club who attend the annual meeting, May 21 and June 1, at Andover, will get the lowdown on various local authors. At the morning session on Thursday, no less than three will tell of their work and their reactions to libraries. Octavia Roberts Corneau, author of "The Perilous Isle" will discuss the "Writing of an Adventure Story." Louise Andrews Kent, who wrote "The Red Rajah," will talk about the "Stay-at-Home Author," and Frances Lester Warner, author of "The Unintentional Burn of Men" (one of the most engaging titles ever devised) has promised to disclose "Confessions of a Fine-Payer."

During the afternoon session of that day, which like the morning one is to be held at the Andover Academy, Mrs. Helen Talbot, secretary of the Massachusetts department of conservation, will speak on the "Library and the C. C. C." and Clarence E. Sherman, librarian, Providence Public Library, will answer the question: "The Public Library Where Has It Been and Where Is It Going?"

In the evening there will be a concert and a talk on the "Development of Clipper Ships," by Dr. Charles E. Park, pastor of the First Church in Boston. Charles R. Green, president of the club, will preside at all three meetings.

Miss Edith Guerrier, superintendent of branches, Boston Public Library, and first vice president of the club, will preside at the Friday morning session at Memorial Hall Library, and the speakers will be Lewis Rex Miller, editor of the Christian Science Monitor weekly magazine section who will talk on "Geneva and the Press," and David McCord who will read from his book "Crowds and Other Poems."

In the afternoon George Washington Hall, Phillips, will be the scene of two annual meetings of the Massachusetts Library Club. Charles R. Green, president, and the Charles River Group of Librarians, Mrs. Florence B. Sloan, president, presiding. Juvenile reading will be considered at this session, with the following speaking: Mrs. Gertrude S. Hasbrouck, who will also answer questions and recommend books; and Lucile Gulliver, who will present the publisher's point of view.

The session will conclude with a discussion on "A Separate House for Boys and Girls: A Necessary Evil or an Advantage," by Mary H. Davis, librarian, Medford Public Library; Galen W. Hill, librarian, Thomas Crane Public Library, Quincy; and Julius Lucht, librarian, Newton Public Library.

There will be a dinner session at the Commons, Phillips Academy, at which Dr. Claude M. Fuess, headmaster, Phillips Academy, will be a guest. The meeting will close with a session at George Washington Hall, Phillips Academy, at which Dr. Samuel M. Lindsay, pastor of the Brookline Baptist Church, give a talk on "A Harvest of Dictators—a Challenge to Democracy."

Now on view in the treasure room of the Boston Public Library is a splendid collection of first editions and books printed by William Morris, arranged in honor of the centenary of his birth. Zoltan Hrasvany has this to say about Morris's printing abilities in More Books, the library publication:

"The influence of the Kelmscott Press on modern printing has been enormous. Within a few years of its founding, in England and in America—as also on the continent of Europe, especially in Germany—a large number of private, and semi-private presses were established with the purpose of producing well-made books. There has been indeed no shortage in imitators of Morris. Out of the host of followers, modestly distinguished, however, in time a smaller number of real printers, who soon struck out for new paths and found their own individuality. During the first decade of the present century, typography, which had fallen low during the Victorian era, experienced a powerful revival. The 'movement' is still on the impetus which Morris gave to the art of printing is still active."

"The novelty of Morris's experiment was that he applied in his work the principles of early printing, which were almost entirely forgotten in his time. Putting his books side by side with fifteenth-century books, the resemblance cannot escape even the casual observer. But the wisdom which Morris derived from the study of the printing of the fifteenth-century is not altogether valid for that of the twentieth. Morris's books are, naturally, archaic in appearance; and, though they are beautiful, they are much less legible than he thought them to be. In a sense, they are failures: for the ancient truth that art must be a part of the life around it—an expression of the place and age where and in which it was born—cannot be safely ignored by any artist. There are, on the other hand, inherent characteristics in every form of art which do not change, and the rediscovery of these in the case of printing was of the utmost importance."

"The significance of Morris's achievement as a printer, indeed, does not lie in the number of private presses which have been established under his influence, but in the fact that the principles which he emphasized have been adopted to a large extent by the commercial presses. Morris's books were expensive, but he was right in maintaining that the observance of the fundamental requirements 'will make a book printed in quite ordinary type at least decent and pleasant to the eye.'"

The Des Moines Public Library has the whole world stowed away in "Promises Room." If the staff wants to publicize the United States or foreign parts there is at hand posters of all sorts and sizes, small and large book racks, boxes, window blocks and standards for the display of individual books, colorful backgrounds and cut-outs, and files of book jackets arranged according to subject.

Mrs. Mildred Othmer Peterson, describing the Des Moines Library's travel exhibits in the current Library Journal, declares that such a room is a very useful adjunct to any library for the storage of such material that is frequently used. In Des Moines material which is collected for use at the main library is kept and used there again from time to time as well as being used at the ten branches and stations.

Each year it is the custom at the Des Moines Library to get in touch with all agencies in the city that distribute travel literature and pamphlets. They are most generous about supplying this. If they do not have sufficient material at hand, they forward a request to their home offices. Also the library gets material from railroads.

Not only is the material used for display, but it is placed in the files of the art and reference departments, branches and stations, or bound and circulated as books in some instances. When the material is received in abundance, it is distributed to the public.

Another group of material for exhibit consists of objects intimately associated with travel. Des Moines borrows pieces of luggage from local leather stores; golf clubs, tennis rackets and fishing equipment from sporting goods stores, and, on lucky occasions, miniature trains, buses, airplanes and models of early travel conveyances, from railroads and travel agencies.

Some lines neighbors of the Des Moines Public Library continuously exhibit a fine collection of objects to be used with exhibits devoted to those countries; or brass, copper and ruga for Oriental displays. Treasures of this sort are securely locked in glass cases. Mrs. Peterson points out. She also advises that valuable collections shown as part of a travel exhibit or separately should be insured either by the owners or the library.

Brookline Public Library's excellent collection of chamber music has been considerably augmented this year through the kindness of Mrs. Charles M. Baker who has presented to the library her husband's music library. While this collection is strong in the classics, as the library bulletin points out, it is also very rich in good music of a more popular type. Comprising in all 876 titles, more than one half of this collection (553 titles) consists of trios for piano, violin and cello. These include practically all the famous works written originally for that combination of instruments and many delightful arrangements from operas, symphonies, quartets, etc. There are fifteen other trios, eighty-two quartets, most of which are for piano and strings, and thirteen quintets, all of them for cello and piano, and only one for voice, cello and piano. Forty compositions are for organ in combination with piano, violin or cello, or with several instruments. A small number of compositions for violin and piano and for violin and cello complete this collection.

At the recent conference of the Pacific Northwest Library Association, Josephine Baumgartner, speaking of reference work at the Oregon State Library, said:

"There are many differences between reference work in a public library and in a mail order library such as ours. The most apparent one is that we do not deal directly with the borrower, but must interpret his needs from his letters, which are often most inadequate. A letter for 'material on Washington' may mean something on our first President, our neighboring State, or our National Capital."

In the public library much may be learned about a patron's needs by a few well-directed questions, while we sometimes learn them only after an exchange of letters. All too frequently our borrowers, being only human, put off writing their club papers or getting material for their speeches until the last possible moment. Then a frantic request comes to the library. Perhaps the information given is incomplete, or the scope of the subject is vague, but the request must be filled intelligently.

Restrictions are eliminated as far as possible in the mail order department. All residents of Oregon who are without library service are entitled to borrow books from us. Others are served through their public libraries. No application blank is needed, nor references required. The only cost to the borrower is the postage. Books are ordinarily lent for four weeks, popular fiction and special day material for two weeks. Special groups for study or club work are sometimes sent for a longer period than the regular four weeks.

All kinds of books are requested by the individual borrowers—books for entertainment, for casual bits of information, and for study and research. In filling these requests we have a collection of about 320,000 books and pamphlets from which to draw. Government and State documents are widely used. Periodicals are not bound, but are circulated as freely as books. Extra copies of such useful reference tools as the World Almanac and American Year Books are bought, and sections clipped from them as they are needed. In this way one book may be serving several people in different parts of the State. Frequently short articles are copied from the more expensive reference books.

Martha Ostens, has left her New York apartment to spend the summer near Minneapolis, where she will work on a new novel which Dodd, Mead and Company will publish next fall. The scene of the story is Vancouver and the tentative title is "White Reef."

MONEY DISCHARGED BY LIBRARY BOARD

Says He Doesn't Know Nature of Charges

Theodore D. Money, former controller of the Boston Public Library and director of the E. R. A. and C. W. A. library projects, who has been under suspension since May 19, was notified yesterday that he has been discharged.

Money said last night that a special meeting of the trustees of the library was called Friday and his discharge was voted on the strength of charges the nature of which is unknown to him. The charges were made by Milton T. Lord, director of the library.

Money was employed by the library for more than four years. He says he wrote to the library trustees requesting a hearing to answer any charges, but declares he was discharged with no opportunity to appear before the trustees and without any answer to his request for a statement of the charges.

New Buildings for Boston's Library Program

As the supervisor of its 33 renowned branch libraries of Boston, Miss Edith Guerrier, Boston, now seeks to advance plans for an ultimate complete "turn-over" of the more ancient of these spots of learning by replacing them with new and modern buildings.

REPLACED ALREADY
Five handsome new replacements of this kind have been made under the Mayor Curley regime, two more are on the immediate carpet to be transformed by means of new buildings—and the highway has been widely opened for a further advance in rehabilitations in the new future.

"Some day not too far distant," the author supervisor tells you, "we shall have a complete new deal in our branch library buildings, with modern improvements, much beautification and artistic effect embodied in the rehabilitations." New branch libraries, the branch library supervisor points out, step up in a very distinctive manner, the numbers of people of Boston who patronize them. Boston more and more may be said to develop at the "centre of learning" because of the pulling power of this ring of libraries with their world famous aggregation of books and other cultural equipment.

Under the direction of Miss Guerrier the reporter paid a visit to the outlying centres of reading and dispensation of books, including places where new buildings have ousted the ancient libraries.

FANEUIL BRANCH
The first stop was at the Faneuil branch in Brighton, a handsome exterior and interior, with soft woods and lighting, color everywhere, and a children's mural donated by Oscar Ricker Freeman. Gertrude Connell, librarian, said: "We have almost outgrown the place. In 1915 the little old building had a circulation of 19,000. Today we have over 140,000. The community is proud of what they have achieved. There is always something going on."

Next came the new Parker Hill branch. This Gothic styled building is next to the Mission Church, Roxbury. Quiet and reposeful even when crowded, it contains a centralized desk that separates the children's room from the adults. Numerous paneled windows admit daylight and the modern electric lighting delights night readers. There is a modern rest room in the basement and a kitchenette for the staff as well as a lecture hall that holds 200. Librarian Mary M. Sullivan said:

"We have a real community spirit here and are an educational centre serving 22 schools and 19 hospitals. Our adult clientele comprises 68 per cent. and of exhibits during 1918 and 1919, and from then until 1922 she was supervisor of circulation at the Boston Public Library. In that year she was first chosen to supervise the branches of the city. She is author of "Wonderfolk in Wonderland," "The Federal Executive Departments as Sources of Information for Libraries," and of columns for papers and periodicals.

Cardinal Attends Library Meeting

CARDINAL AND PUBLIC LIBRARY EXAMINING COMMITTEE

Cardinal O'Connell, as the newly elected president of the board of trustees of the Boston Public Library, performed his first public official duty in the office yesterday when he presided as chairman at the first meeting of the examining committee for the year 1934 in the directors' room at the library. As president of the board of trustees the Cardinal is called upon to preside at the opening meeting of the examining committee, and at its last meeting in December.

Miss Susan J. Ginn of 11 Beacon street was elected as vice-chairman of the examining committee.

The examining committee was inaugurated in 1933, one year after the founding of the library.

The examining committee for this year includes Judge Elijah A. Dow, George Bramwell Baker, Walter B. Briggs, Harvard College Library; Walter S. Bucklin, Dr. Arthur H. Cole, Baker Library, Harvard University; Ralph Adams Cram, Ex-Mayor James M. Curley, Miss Susan J. Ginn, Francis X. Hurley, State auditor; Dr. Henry Jackson, Herbert F. Jenkins, Henry Lewis Johnson, Carl T. Keller, the Rev. Robert H. Lord, St. John's Seminary; Charles D. Maginnis, George R. Nutter, James P. Parmenter, Mrs. Elizabeth W. Perkins, Mrs. Edward M. Pickman, Judge Abraham E. Finanski, Mrs. Arthur A. Shurcliff, Mrs. Francis E. Slattery, the Rev. William M. Stimson, S. J., Boston College; Charles H. Taylor, D. Berkeley Updike, Dr. Henry R. Viets, Charles F. Weed, Mrs. Frederick Winslow and Cardinal O'Connell, president of the board of trustees, and Milton E. Lord, director of the library.

It seems I have stated rather than exaggerated the recent guess as to the number of books now in the Boston Public Library.

Librarian Milton E. Lord, director of the library, says there are now something over 1,400,000 volumes in the entire library system and that the number of branch libraries has now increased to 33, besides the Kirsstein Memorial building on City Hall avenue.

EXAMINING COMMITTEE OF BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY MEETS

Library, met yesterday for the first time with the examining committee of that institution, over which he presided, as its began its task of organization in preparation for its yearly work.

At another and final meeting in December, the committee, whose powers are merely advisory, will render its report to the trustee body.

Meantime, the vice-chairman of the committee, Miss Susan J. Ginn of 15 Beacon street, elected at yesterday's session, will divide the committee into sub-committees which will examine into the work of the library in various directions. These committee assignments will include books and catalogues, buildings and equipment, children's work and work with schools, general administration and finance.

Another subdivision of the examining committee will be made into a series of committees, each of which will be charged with the responsibility for visiting and examining the work of three of the 33 branch libraries.

The selection of the personnel for these sub-committees devolves on Miss Ginn, vice-chairman.

Late in the summer these sub-committees will begin their work, which will engage them during September, October and November, during which period they will hold their own group meetings, either at the library building in Copley square or elsewhere. By Dec. 1 these groups will render to Miss Ginn their reports.

Miss Ginn will work these into one report for the entire committee. In that form the report and the contained recommendations will come before a meeting of the whole committee, for suggestions and action, and when adopted, the report will be submitted to the trustees.

The proceedings of yesterday's meeting, which were informal, included discussion as to the committees and their assignments.

The examining committee has been in existence since 1853, the year after the Public Library was founded. Its work is one of the requirements of the law establishing the library and is entered into with seriousness and vigor by those who are appointed to it. The list includes a host of names eminent in Boston during the past 80 years.

The members of the 1934 examining committee are: Judge Elijah Adlow, George Bramwell Baker, Walter B. Briggs of Harvard College Library, Walter S. Bucklin, Dr. Arthur H. MEETING with Cardinal O'Connell for the first time, yesterday afternoon, the examining committee of the Boston Public Library outlined plans for committee organization of the current year with the cardinal, president of the board of trustees of the library, presiding over the gathering. Miss

Susan J. Ginn of 15 Beacon street, was elected vice chairman and will divide the committee into the various sub-committees which will undertake their tasks this fall and report to Miss Ginn; thereafter, in its advisory capacity, the committee will report to the board of trustees.

The sub-committees will examine into the work of the library, books and catalogues, buildings and equipment, children's work and that in schools, general administration and finance. The examining committee was established in 1853, the year after the Public Library was founded, and its work is required by the laws relating to founding of

CARDINAL PRESIDES AS BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY EXAMINING COMMITTEE HOLDS FIRST MEETING

The first meeting and organization of the new examining committee of the Public Library of the city of Boston was held yesterday afternoon in the rooms of the board of trustees at the Public Library in Copley Square.

Cardinal O'Connell, recently elected president of the Board of Trustees, presided and Miss Susan J. Ginn was appointed vice chairman of the examining committee with power to serve as chairman during the year. Cardinal O'Connell presides at two meetings of the examiners, the opening session when the vice chairman is named and the meeting in December when Miss Ginn presents her report to the executive board.

Many subcommittees will be appointed by Miss Ginn including committees on the 33 branch libraries, special libraries, rare book and treasure room, business branch, teachers' department, fine arts department, statistical, administration, building and equipment children's department and work with schools, books and catalogues, general policy and finance. Committees of three are appointed to visit the branch libraries at regular intervals. Each of these committees report to Miss Ginn who in turn will prepare the December report of the Board of Trustees.

The members of the newly organized examining board are:

Judge Elijah Adlow, George Bramwell Baker, Walter B. Briggs, Harvard College Library, Walter S. Bucklin, Dr. Arthur H. Cole, Baker Library, Harvard University, Ralph Adams Cram, Hon. James M. Curley, Miss Susan J. Ginn, Francis X. Hurley, Dr. Henry Jackson, Herbert F. Jenkins, Henry Lewis Johnson, Carl T. Keller, Rev. Robert H. Lord, professor at St. John's Seminary, Brighton, Charles D. Maginnis, George R. Nutter, Judge James P. Parmenter, Mrs. Elizabeth W. Perkins, Mrs.

Edward M. Pickman, Judge Abraham E. Pinanski, Robert Proctor, Charles M. Rogers, Mrs. Arthur A. Shurcliff, Mrs. Francis E. Slattery, Rev. William M. Stinson, S. J., Boston College, Chas. H. Taylor, D. Berkeley Updike, Dr. Henry R. Viets, Charles F. Weed, Mrs. Frederick Winslow and Cardinal O'Connell, president.

Afternoon tea was served at the conclusion of the meeting. Miss Ginn, the newly elected vice chairman, is active in educational affairs and is director of vocational guidance in the Boston Public Schools. She was recently elected president of the National Vocational Guidance Association.

The first meeting of the Board of Examiners was held in 1853.

In "More Books" the Bulletin of the Boston Public Library, is published, for the first time, the comments of John Adams on Napoleon and the French. These comments occur in the form of marginal notes, in "L'Etat de la France," a book published in 1800 by the Comte d'Hauterive, under-secretary of the French Foreign Office under Talleyrand. They were written in the summer of 1801, soon after Adams' retirement from the presidency of the United States.

Zoltan Haraszti, editor of the Bulletin, supplies these further notes on the personality of the author of "The State of France" which he considers of special interest to Americans. For two years, from 1792 to 1794, Hauterive was French consul in New York. His magistracy in the New World was fraught with the greatest difficulties, on account of the violent politics of the French ambassador, Charles Edmond Genet. The latter, soon after his arrival in America, began to fit out privateers against English commerce and recruited soldiers against Spain, planning an invasion into Louisiana and Florida. Washington requested the recall of the ambassador, and upon Genet's dismissal all the French consuls lost also their positions. Hauterive, afraid to face the Committee of Foreign Safety of Robespierre, decided to remain in America. He rented a few acres of land outside of New York, bought on credit some seeds and a shovel, and settled down to be a gardener. By the following spring he was already selling his vegetables in the markets of New York.

Upon Talleyrand's return from exile, Hauterive, too, sailed for France. After the coup d'etat of Brumaire, Talleyrand became Minister of Foreign Affairs, and within a few months, he appointed Hauterive his under-secretary.

Dr. Haraszti is of the opinion that, in spite of his petulance, the retired President of the United States was dazzled by the great Corsican.

Hauterive sought to establish a comparison of Napoleon with Caesar. Though he dismissed all the popular or spiteful parallels which were floating in the air as deserving only contempt, he agreed that "in regard to all the gifts of nature which constitute genius and in regard to the moral qualities which are the ingredients of an elevated soul, the First Consul and Caesar may be objects of a biographical comparison." Adams accepted the statement without reserve: "This I believe," Hauterive continued: "While Caesar had to fight only with barbarous people, it has been the destiny of Bonaparte to vanquish the most warlike nations, the most disciplined armies, the most capable generals of Europe, and he never had to fight but against the enemies of his country." And Adams assented again: "This is all correct."

When Hauterive launched into a panegyric on Napoleon, writing eloquently, "France has placed her destinies in the hands of a man who himself has a great destiny to fulfill." Adams' attention, says the editor of the bulletin, was at once keyed up: "How flattering to Napoleon! Yet how true!" he reflected, adding as an afterthought, "For the present." Yet when the author became boastful of France's having repelled the hostilities of Europe, Asia, Africa and America, he found that Adams was "too much French for that" in this. Hauterive went on in this time of self-assurance, threatening that France might prove to her enemies the superiority of her forces. "Cauder will not deny this," Adams had to admit. "But"

The Librarian

MISS EDITH GUERRIER who recently received the honor of election to the presidency of the Massachusetts Library Club is supervisor of the thirty-three Boston Branch Libraries which open their doors to the public on week days from 9.00 A. M. to 9.00 P. M. These branches contain over 500,000 books from 4700 at Little Phillips Brooks in Roxbury to the Phillips Brooks in Roxbury. The branches are located in the following districts: Downtown, North End, South End, West End, and the various branches in the city.

Warm and well-lighted in winter and cool in summer, these libraries, comfortably furnished with tables and chairs, literally belong to the residents of their respective districts. The buildings have been so carefully located that the major part of the residents of Boston are within a half mile of a library service.

Last year the patrons of these libraries borrowed 4,533,393 books, the smallest number, 51,870, from Little Phillips Brooks and the largest number, 246,486, from Memorial Branch in Roxbury. The central part of the Memorial High School with an attendance roll of 3959 pupils.

Through the doorways of these libraries pours a constant stream of people—a cosmopolitan group of many tastes and many occupations. Opening at random the voters list, one street of thirty houses yields the following occupations: auctioneer, broker, bookkeeper, book-binder, cabinet maker, clerk, dentist, engineer, estimator, fireman, housewife, letter carrier, manager, mariner, mechanic, merchant, milliner, model, photographer, physician, policeman, printer, realtor, salesman, secretary, shoemaker, storekeeper, student, stenographer, super-intendent, tailor, teacher, telephone installer, therapist, typist.

The auctioneer may be interested in books on antiques or he may want a good adventure story; the letter carrier may ask for a travel book or a book on pioneer life; the typist may be seeking a book on business letters; the writer or a good love story. Whatever it may be, if it has ever appeared in print, the chances are that the library can either locate it or give some information about it.

These libraries are not run after the fashion of an automat lunch room where one deposits fifteen cents and a piece of squash pie leaps at him or by robot controls set to turn on a switch at 9.00 A. M. and to turn it off at 9.15 P. M. There is nothing hostile about the leaping pie nor the cold hand of the steel robot.

Hospitality, human sympathy, and friendliness, as well as a wide knowledge of books and sources for information are qualifications required of every library worker to the end that users of a library may feel that the library is theirs and that the librarian and her assistants are their friends.

The relations between Miss Guerrier and the thirty-three branches have always been marked by a splendid spirit of esprit de corps, and the supervisor has high praise for the branch librarians and their assistants who have carried on so magnificently in the face of serious handicaps. The service they have rendered to their districts, she declares, is in many cases beyond praise.

The following is an outline recently prepared by one of the branch librarians, which brief as it is, reveals volumes of neighborliness:

WHAT THE LIBRARY DOES FOR THE COMMUNITY

- 1.—Community Center:
  - (a) Provides recreational reading.
  - (b) Cultural reading: 1. art; 2. drama; 3. literature; 4. music.
  - (c) Vocational reading: 1. professions; 2. trades; 3. arts and crafts.
  - (d) Magazines and newspapers.
- 2.—Source of Information:
  - (a) Reader's adviser offers help on any specific subject for courses of study and reading.
  - (b) Provides about educational opportunities, concerts, lectures and programs of museum activities.
  - (c) Current events noted by posters and exhibits.
  - (d) Telephone inquiries.
  - (e) Information requested not at hand but obtained.
  - (f) Lecture hall: 1. readings; 2. concerts; 3. scout meetings; 4. knitters; 5. baby clinics and other neighborhood contacts.
- 3.—Specific Services to Local Agencies:
  - (a) Work with schools: 1. talks; 2. books sent on deposit; 3. pictures sent on deposit.
  - (b) English houses, settlement houses and institutions: 1. books on deposit.
- 4.—Comfortable place to read, study or browse.

Rambles Among the Bookstacks

For more than six months the circulation at the Boston Public Library has been steadily falling. In a recent address to the American Library Association, Miss Edith Guerrier, supervisor of branches, analyzed the reasons for such an unusual decrease. They are as follows:

1.—The most vital reason is a greatly reduced book fund. In 1932 the branches were allowed $99,180 and in 1933, $58,473. 2.—In October, 1932, occurred what was known as "Fine Cancellation Week." During those two weeks fines on all fine-bearing cards were cancelled. Thousands of cards were restored to borrowers and the circulation in the Boston Branch Libraries increased 137,877 over the two corresponding weeks of 1931. Hundreds of these cards are now back in our files again classed as "finable." During the first half of 1933 the circulation reflected the impetus given it by Fine Cancellation Week. Oct. 16 to 21, 1933, the anniversary of the 1932 week, the volume of books drawn dropped 68,653, thus emphasizing the fictitious quality of an artificially-stimulated circulation.

3.—Another reason for the drop is found in the fact that thousands of men and women who had been drawing from four to eight books weekly went to work on alphabetical projects or for private companies. 4.—Many people now belong to reading circles and book clubs, the members of which buy from ten to twelve books a year.

5.—Many more are taking educational courses for which they purchase textbooks. Attendance at classes and required home study leave scant time for outside reading. 6.—Improved radio programs for adults eat up time formerly spent in reading.

7.—Numbers of people are living in such crowded quarters that reading at home is impossible and every foot of library space is at a premium. Hence, people who formerly took out books are now sitting in the library rooms reading, but not taking books home.

8.—Lending libraries are increasing and from them the type of fiction which appeals to the casual borrower can be most readily obtained.

9.—The drop in circulation of children's books is difficult to account for, rather, it is difficult to accept the reasons advanced in explanation of this phenomenon. Some say inertia; others insist that children become adults in their high chairs.

10.—Each year there are more educational and recreational opportunities planned for children. Social service agencies offer activities which take most of the children's time outside the home. Nearly every organization, including the Hebrew schools, which are building up extensive collections for use of their pupils, circulates books.

11.—The influence of the movies seems to be worse than ever and children are becoming so sophisticated that books are eagerly sought in former years are now passed over by young readers in search of the type of thrillers not to be found in a public library.

Boston Library Veteran Retiring After 43 Years

Joseph W. Ward, 70, Has Befriended Many During Long Service

Retiring this month after 43 years of service, Joseph W. Ward, 70, now in charge of the replacement of missing books at the Boston public library, stands to benefit by the city of Boston employees' retirement act, which was instituted by himself.

His retirement is not a voluntary act. It is automatic because he has reached the age of 70.

TWO ACHIEVEMENTS
On the eve of quitting the city's service after nearly half a century, he said today two achievements stand out in his memory. They are the retirement act, passed after a stiff battle in 1923, and the organizing of the Public Library Employment Benefit Association in 1902. This latter started with nothing, he said, and now has over $30,000 and pays death benefits.

Born in the South end, he attended the old Rice and Brimmer schools, but he quit very young, and went to work as a plumber's helper. After that he sold soap and did many other jobs, on his own. He has continued to sell jewelry all his life, even after he went to work in the library. He didn't think that job would be permanent.

Pleasing and genial, he made friends easily, and during his career at the library has met many celebrities. He has served under seven directors or librarians, and said today "all were fine people."

"The library workers are a fine set of people," he said, "and it is one of the best places in the world for a girl to work. Today the Boston public library ranks sixth in the United States, but I feel sure that under Mr. Lord it will come back to first place."

HAS MET ROYALTY
It amuses him to remember when he was playing small parts on the stage that he "almost" had stage fright, but by reappearing the next night when he wasn't supposed to go on, he overcame it for all time, and claims Barrymore had nothing on him. He has owned one of the finest collections of autographs of stage and operatic stars, and other eminent people who came into the library.

He has escorted some very noted people through the new library building, as he distinguishes it from the old library, on the site of what is now the Colonial building, among them ex-President Lowell of Harvard, a cardinal from Canada, and ex-President Theodore Roosevelt. He also had the honor of being presented informally to the late King Albert of the Belgians and Queen Elizabeth.

He recalls that the old library was a very beautiful building to him, as he started to work there in 1891. He has worked in various departments, the fine arts, the shelf department, and at one time he had charge of the treasure room. Today he is in charge of the replacement of missing books. Every book in the library at some time comes to him, and there are more than 1,125,000 books.

Good will seems to be his outstanding characteristic. "Every one tries to do the best they can in these public positions, it is no one's right to censor, we all make mistakes," he philosophized. "In a large organization there are bound to be cliques, but I always try to take people as I find them. I entered liking all and I am leaving in the same spirit, and I hope they feel the same toward me."

MARRIED 40 YEARS
He was married over 40 years ago and has one daughter, Helen, who keeps house for her dad. He lost his wife over four years ago. He and his daughter live on Inwood street in Dorchester, and have for the past 20 years gone to Houghs Neck for their summer vacations. He has always enjoyed dancing, and still dances.

Today many noted writers and celebrities recall aid and assistance given them when they were students here in Boston by Joe. Among them is Fred Allen, now a world famous comedian. Such a writer as Royal Brown will recall Joe. Royal worked in the branch department of the library when attending Harvard.

Fred McIsaac and George English many a time called on Joe to assist them, as they too worked their way through school.

Mr. Ward is a tall man of imposing stature and wears a crown of bushy iron-gray hair. He is often to be seen evenings at the window where books are returned and fines paid.

ORGANIZED BENEFIT BODY
When he organized the Public Library Employees' Assn., the Quarter Century Club there were 45 men and women eligible for membership, eligibility being based upon service in the library system for 25 years or more. Today there are more than 75 members of the club, some of whom have handled the public's books for as long as 54 years, beginning when the Public Library stood where the present Colonial Theatre is. And Mr. Ward remembers looking up Tremont street from the library steps and he also remembers when deer were enclosed on Boston Common.

"Many of these dear people," he said, "will never receive just recognition of their merits. They are like flowers born to bluish unseen, yet many a good story could be obtained from their various and varied experiences."

Mr. Ward is very modest about the help he has been to thousands during the years he has worked for the city, nor does he mention the very valuable assistance he many times extended to newspaper men, but these are all good marks on the right side of his ledger.

PIECE OF CORNICE FALLS FROM PUBLIC LIBRARY

Pedestrians narrowly escaped injury when a piece of cornice fell from the Huntington-av side of the Boston Public Library yesterday. The piece of granite about a foot square was broken into fragments when it struck the sidewalk.

Fearing that more of the cornice might fall the library superintendent had a small fence erected at the Huntington-av corner of the building.

ROCK FALLS OFF LIBRARY

Piece of Cornice Smashes on Stone Steps

A large piece of granite from the roof of the Boston Public Library fell to the stone steps in Copley square yesterday.

Under the direction of William F. Quinn, library superintendent, a temporary fence was erected to safeguard visitors to the library from the danger of any more pieces falling.

The piece that fell from the cornice, Mr. Quinn said, was about a cubic foot in size. As the result of the accident he said that workmen will immediately start an inspection of the library roof at that point.

The roof is about 40 years old and in some places is beginning to show signs of age.

Interesting Careers for Women — The Successful Librarian

WANT to study Greek philosophy? Or read the latest American novels dealing with the labor movement? Want to know how to make a boat? Or some real Italian ravioli? There are 410 public libraries in this tiny Commonwealth just teeming with information on these subjects and innumerable others. And, since the early part of the year, these 410 libraries, together with the thousands in other parts of the country, have been co-operating in a campaign to make the average person aware of the practical help as well as the cultural riches that may be found in every public library. With the day State a pioneer in public library service, it is natural that the Massachusetts Library Club should be working day and night in the interests of this campaign to make the public "library conscious."

This and more, President Edith Guerrier of the Massachusetts Library Club told the reporter over a hurried luncheon of jellied consommé, tiny and energetic Miss Guerrier has been in library work all her life and, for many years, has been actively connected with the Boston Public Library and its branches. Chairman of the State Library Planning Board and president of the club, Miss Guerrier's committee is responsible for the success of the campaign in Massachusetts.

"This State and nationwide library plan will do more than enlarge the scope of public libraries," Miss Guerrier says. "We hope to raise the standards of the libraries themselves by putting into effect a coordination plan already operating in many States. We're also talking of regional library systems. The late Mr. Belden—former librarian of the Boston Public Library—was particularly interested in this development." Regional systems permit the inter-library lending of books and magazines so that if, for example, your own particular library cannot afford the limited edition of "The Maritime History of Massachusetts," it may borrow it from a neighboring library and, in exchange, lend that library books from its own shelves.

Miss Guerrier's first library work came when she was engaged as children's librarian in the North End branch of the B. P. L. North End children of all ages would run in at all hours of the day and give to Miss Guerrier over their book selection, glimpses of Italian home life. So interested did the young librarian become in the people of this section that she picked her bags and moved into their midst.

The North End branch became a democratic meeting place where girls from six to twenty-one would gather to discuss books and information; so much so, in fact, that Miss Guerrier had the basement made over into a club house and formed the girls into seven or eight groups—one of which was the original of the Saturday Evening Girls club. In summer she took them camping at West Gloucester and over week-ends they would go for hikes. Miss Guerrier still remembers the longest hike they ever took—to her summer place at "Pepperell," with a stop-over at Concord. "They were times," says she, "when I thought we'd never get there. Some of the girls weren't used to long walks—they didn't realize how far it was going to be." Miss Fanny Goldstein, present librarian of the West End branch, was a member of one of Miss Guerrier's original groups—and an editor of the paper which her groups wrote, printed and sold ad space for.

When the war broke out, Edith Guerrier went to Washington, volunteered her services wherever they were most needed. From '17 to '19 she traveled about the country on a national library publicity job, in the latter part of which time she was made director of National Library Service. It was while she was in the Capitol that Miss Guerrier first became interested in Government publications—now one of her foremost hobbies. Says Miss Guerrier, "Excellent pamphlets are published by the Government on almost every conceivable subject, but astoundingly few people are acquainted with the fact that they are public property for the asking." For some time after her return to the Boston Public Library, Edith Guerrier edited a supplement to its "Library Life" in which she reviewed Government pamphlets and expanded on their usefulness. She was at this time serving as supervisor of circulation, a position which she held until, in '22, she accepted her present position as supervisor of all the branch libraries.

Author as well as librarian, Miss Guerrier while children's librarian in the North End, wrote a charming juvenile "Wonderland in Wonderland," and (much later) an informative volume dealing with her consuming hobby, "The Federal Executive Departments as sources of information for libraries."

Outside of business hours, this B. P. L. supervisor, is just as energetic a person as she is while working out an idea for her State library planning board. An enthusiastic gardener and an authority on early American pottery, life for her in her suburban home is never dull. And when she is not editing one of her information pamphlets or supervising her class in the running of a branch library, you will probably find her taking a busman's holiday, which for Edith Guerrier means delving into a good book to broaden, still further, her wide field of knowledge.

Hundreds of Girls and Men Under ERA Busy Modernizing Library Shelf Data

Group of workers in huge ERA Boston Public Library project, including typists, filing clerks, proofreaders, etc.

James W. Kenney, library chief in charge of ERA Recataloging.

Hold Forth in Double Shifts at Park Square Building

More than 600 girls and many men are hard at work rewriting the present Boston Public Library shelf list, now written in longhand, into a standard library-card-size file.

2,500,000 CARDS

More than 700,000 titles, involving the writing of 2,500,000 cards, comprise the work, another ERA project.

The work is being done at the Park Square building, under the direction of James W. Kenney, in charge of the book bindery department of the Public Library. The need of all-time records has been long felt by the library, but because of the cost involved it has never been suggested to the city of Boston.

This is the only project in the state where there is an ERA direct representative on the job, and Robert W. Fiske, who was in charge of the assignment

The work is carried with about 350 in e arranged that the and ready by Thurs working Friday, Saturday and Monday, while the other works Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, and they alternate the months so each group will enjoy summer week-ends.

James W. Kenney is big, blond and humane and large hearted as his size. He especially feels that this is an opportunity for every American citizen to be grateful to a President who is giving them an opportunity to earn at least something toward a living. He has always been interested in government and civic projects, and is lecturing continually on these topics, before various clubs, and over the air.

TAUGHT LIBRARY SYSTEM

In whipping this work into shape, Mr. Kenney decided the best plan would be to borrow a few of the library staff, and have each of them teach the girls (and men) the library system. It required care and caution, as well as education. In a short time these girls qualified as supervisors, and today they fight, yes actually fight for promotions for worthy girls under their wing. After the first few weeks, these supervisors were able to give the preliminary and specific training necessary to each employee. Mr. Fiske said that it is only necessary to suggest a convenience or comfort, and the director has it there for them, realizing that in the long run the best is the cheapest economy. For example, when over 30 girls were overcome during this past torrid spell, through the foresight of these gentle-work, and the government enough money to keep this splendid group working indefinitely."

BORN DIRECTOR

Mr. Kenney says very little about his method. He himself is a born director, and this group emanates a businesslike as well as professional manner.

Born of very long lived parents, and grandparents who lived to be 102 and 107 respectively, this man considers this additional duty as just part of his job, and one for which he gets no more pay. He never went further than the ninth grade of grammar school, and put himself through evening high school in the days when he worked 59 hours a week. His doctrine has always been, the bigger the man, the more modest he is, and cited Abraham Lincoln. He has been employed at the library for 25 years. At 16 he was president of the Catholic Temperance Society. At 21 he was elected president of the Democratic committee in Somerville, in which city he lives, and served on the board of aldermen for five years. He organized the Red Cross in Somerville during the world war; it was the largest unit in the state. He is married and has three children. Upon the death of his first wife, he married about seven years ago a library employee named Augusta Arvedon, and says again he is most fortunate in being so happily married. In Somerville he was for many years on the committee of education and civic affairs, and is still very much interested in civic life.

A GREAT LITERARY FRAUD

The treasure room of the Boston Public Library regularly displays publications or manuscripts which are remarkable as authentic antiques. Just now it is exhibiting several pamphlets which are remarkable because they are not!

Back of the exhibition is the story of "the biggest fraud in the history of book collecting." As told in "More Books," the library's monthly bulletin, it is not a pretty tale, for it involves the reputation of one of England's most eminent bibliographers, Thomas James Wise.

The expose was published recently by two young Englishmen, John Carter and Graham Pollard, in a volume innocently entitled, "An Enquiry into the Nature of Certain Nineteenth Century Pamphlets." Their investigations demonstrate that several hundred "first edition" pamphlets of the more famous works of Elizabeth Browning, Swinburne, Ruskin, Tennyson, George Eliot, William Morris, Thackeray, and Kipling, which have been distributed around the world as "very rare items" and sold, in many cases, for several hundred dollars each, are rank forgeries. In most instances, neither the paper nor the type used was in existence at the time of the alleged publication.

The identity of the actual forger is not given. Nor is it apparent that he gained much financially by his enterprise. But it does appear certain that Mr. Wise labored many years for the "bibliographical canonization" of the pamphlets and presented many of them, in the spirit of a generous benefactor, to the British Museum and other great libraries. Mr. Wise is clearly in a delicate position. Either he must say that he always knew the pamphlets were fraudulent, which would hardly be a pleasant admission, or that he never knew they were, which would reflect almost as disastrously on his intelligence as a literary connoisseur. In the London Times Literary Supplement for Aug. 23, Lord Esher calls on Mr. Wise for a complete explanation. It should make interesting reading.

Dorchester Library Branch Stands In Scenes of Rich Historical Lore

Lower Mills Building Ideal Spot for Quiet Research; Old Events Recalled

BY ERIC G. MAKRIIS

It has been said that in a library a germ of thought may be picked up which may lead to a career.

Surrounded by shelves of inspiring books and facing the wide bay windows in the rear of the large non-fiction room at the Lower Mills branch in Dorchester we could well believe that foregoing statement.

Through these windows one looks out on the lovely and most attractive garden of Mrs. Ellen Rouse, who has been the library's next-door neighbor for upwards of 50 years. Indeed, the grounds all about the library buildings are picturesque and colorful; tall, stately trees, neatly clipped lawns and lilac bushes lending the surrounding atmosphere that country like air of peace and serenity.

People of the community passing along Richmond street on warm, sunny days are not surprised when they see a person comfortably reclining in a beach chair and reading in the shade afforded by one of the trees, for they know that the library workers are often in the habit of spending their noon lunch hour in this fashion.

ONCE A BANK

The library building stands strategically at the corner of Richmond and Washington streets facing the Morton street artery and although in Dorchester it is not far from the Milton line. The present structure was erected in 1871 and was first used as quarters for the Blue Hill Bank. About this time thieves broke into the bank and robbed it of a considerable sum of money. Mr. John French, a quaint old character who has lived in this community all his life and the present custodian of the building, told us this and also added that his mother, from the window of her house on Washington street, saw the bank robbers making their getaway. Meanwhile what was to form the nucleus of the Lower Mills branch library as it is today was located in the counting room of a store on the corner of Richmond and River streets. In 1883 they moved from the counting room to the now vacant bank and occupied the back half of the building having an entrance on Washington street. One year later the authorities decided to utilize the space in the front on the Richmond street side and established a police station there. Opening off the police built a tiny dark chamber that served them for a cell-room. Now it is lined with book shelves and wired with an electric light but the hinges of the massive door that used to be there may still be seen imbedded in the wall while the door itself, rusty with age, reposes in the furnace room in the basement.

The vicinity around the library is rich in historical data. Directly across from the red brick building, on Washington street, stands a house in which Abraham Lincoln slept when he was visiting this neighborhood. At that time he was a candidate for the office of the presidency of the U. S.

Within walking distance from the library across the Dorchester line one can visit the Lincoln cabin in Milton. To reach it you must cross what was once a wooden bridge built by farmers in the community about the time of the American revolution.

Somewhere near here is the site of the first sawmill erected in America. Grouped about on either side of this bridge are various factory buildings all part of the Walter Baker chocolate plant, where the Baker's cocoa and chocolate are made. The air all around the vicinity of the plant is scented with the rich sweet odor of chocolate in the making; and even here in the library seated by an open window the fragrant smell reaches your nostrils.

ROOM FOR CHILDREN

By the present arrangement one enters the branch from Washington street and the first room you enter, a room as long as it is wide with a high raftered ceiling, belongs to the children. Books are discharged and issued here also. Opposite the charging desk on the further wall is an old-fashioned marble mantelpiece and a fireplace that would fill old Saint Nick with a desire to climb right down even though it were a library chimney.

Unlike most libraries this one is divided into three separate rooms; one for the children and the other two, one for fiction books in the other non-fiction, are shared by the adults. All the rooms have bay windows practically the length of the wall and almost on a level with the street.

The librarian in charge is Miss Isabel E. Wetherald, a kind motherly sort of a person with winning manners. She has succeeded in giving a personal touch to her work and tries to make people feel at home and at their ease when they are in the library. Informality and a more intimate personal service than is usually possible in larger libraries are the pervading influences to be found here.

A little before 8 o'clock in the evening the busiest part of the day for this branch, we stood by the charging desk watching the steady stream of borrowers that passed through the double doors. There were groups of young girls chattering away gaily, elderly men and women, young factory workers and little boys scurrying in to read magazines. All were clean and well dressed and even if one had not seen the many attractive two-family houses in which these people dwell and were judging solely from observing the patrons one would without hesitation call it a fairly prosperous community.

WARM ENTHUSIASM

Later Miss Sara Zeserson, acting children's librarian, was introduced to us. We spoke for some length. She is a very vivacious keen young lady and you can not talk with her long without sharing some of her warm enthusiasm.

Among other things she told us was the fact that the library is surrounded by churches and schools. There are four churches, the Methodist, Baptist, Congregational and St. Gregory's, which is a Catholic church. All four are within sight from the library windows. Considering the five schools and four churches one would certainly say the community was well served with religion and knowledge.

In her work with the children Miss Zeserson meets many amusing things. Not so long ago one of her 7-year old boy friends dashed in and said to her:

"We got a Persian cat over at our house and she had nine Persian kittens and we're gonna give 'em Persian names. Have you got any?" How would you like to have to get nine Persian names in short order?

Another time a little girl came up to her and shyly asked if she might have a book on the stars. The librarian confessed she was amazed at the time for one does not often meet such precocious youngsters showing an interest in astronomy. Anyway she hunted up some children's books on stars and gave them to the girl. As she was about to leave the child she noticed a startled, somewhat bewildered expression on her face.

"Are those books all right?" she asked. "They're all right," this in a sad, doubtful tone of voice, "but I didn't mean these stars. I meant movie stars."

On our way out a regulator clock hanging upon the wall caught our eye. At the moment the room was quiet except for the steady tick-tock as the pendulum swung back and forth in a sing-song rhythm. Then we remembered that talk we had with the custodian and we recalled him having told us that this clock has been running steadily for over 50 years, keeping the time correctly during the while without a stop or repairs of any kind.

The Lower Mills branch is an ideal small library in which to enjoy a quiet read. So I was thinking when I heard my bus rumble along Dorchester avenue. Sprinting down the street, I was in time to catch it and also to hear the bell in the tower of the Baptist church on Richmond street peal out nine deliberate notes on the night air.

Kirstein Memorial Branch Library Is Centre of Business-Like Activity

Miss Grace Brady (left), librarian of the Kirstein Memorial Branch Library at 20 City Hall, and Miss Mary Watkins Dietrichson, in charge of the business library.

Treasure House of Knowledge for Boston's Industries

BY ERIC G. MAKRIIS

At one time libraries were located in secluded, out-of-the-way places; within their cloistered pale lean, ascetic-faced monks or austere elderly gentlemen fingered the priceless tomes with rapt expressions of inward ecstasy—misers in their treasure houses of knowledge. Contrary to this idea of a library as a retreat of solitude and meditation is the atmosphere of the Kirstein Memorial branch at 20 City Hall avenue.

The interior of its demure, graceful building is filled with a distinct but subdued hum of business-like activity. It has more the appearance of a busy modern office. Smartly dressed business men and clerks bustle about, some consulting Poor or Moody's business manuals, others engaged in writing. Through the wide entrance door, conspicuous for its white paneling and shiny brass knocker, an almost endless stream of persons flows and the library attendants do not think it unusual if they accommodate 1000 patrons daily during the winter months.

KIRSTEIN SUPPLIED FUNDS

The Kirstein library has the distinction of being the first and only building ever erected for the B. P. L. (Boston Public Library) by private gift. Louis E. Kirstein supplied the funds for a public library to be built in downtown Boston in memory of his father, Edward Kirstein. The architect, Putnam & Cox, designed a recreation of the famous Tontine Crescent created by Thomas Bullfinch in the 18th century. The structure has three stories and is chiefly distinguished by its lovely white pilasters in the front reminiscent of graceful Greek columns and lending a classical dignity to City Hall avenue.

On the first floor in a spacious, airy room lighted by arched windows is the Business Library, not to be confused with the upstairs branch library which is a regular part of the B. P. L. branch system. Mrs. Mary Watkins Dietrichson and her staff of trained assistants are in charge here and they handle the problems that confront the patrons efficiently, with tact and an admirable business finesse. For instance, a man wants to know who the officials of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad are; another person would like to know the price of Chesapeake & Ohio stock on March 1, 1913. Some one else wants the highest price of the pound sterling during the civil war. And so they ask ad infinitum every conceivable question under the sun.

The second floor, which is also part of the Business Library, consists of a balcony with small alcoves furnished with chairs and tables and shelves of reference books. Going up one more flight to the third and top floor we enter a room similar also a heavy demand for biography, history, literature, philosophy and science. Contemporary fiction is an important factor in our circulation. "Anthony Adverse" had a reserve list of 70, all desirous of reading the now international best-seller. So you see if the type of reading of these Bostonians is used as an indicator of their mentalities it gives you a very encouraging picture on the whole, doesn't it?

Brain-teasing questions are asked in this department, too. Here is a sample: What was the number of war prisoners by American divisions? Another: What is the origin of the Japanese cherry blossom? One person went so far as to ask for a picture of the Pithecanthropus Erectus, which is or once was some kind of a man.

We were told that the telephone was in use constantly by inquirers who wanted to settle or get information on points of etiquette. That's why they keep a copy of Emily Post within reach of the telephone in this branch.

Young Scheherezade Cracks 83 Books in West End Library Reading Contest

West End's infant intelligencia today receive awards in the ground and lofty reading competition which has been going on at the Branch Library all summer. Each of the mental athletes was provided with a ten-rungged ladder along which he (or she) climbed book by book. The majority of contestants were girls, as most of the boys reported that they were too busy blacking boots and selling lemons to go in for intellectual pursuits. Interest in the contest continued keen from the moment the first child inquired: "How many ladders do I have to crawl up to get a prize?" until word got about that Mildred Shahan was about to crack her seventy-fifth volume. A few desultory readers fell away at this point, but the incident occasioned a burst of reading speed among Mildred's nearest competitors. Miss Shahan showed her heels to them all, however, romping through eighty-three books.

The ladder, as was explained to the unimaginative over and over, was not a genuine one, but a pencil drawing, on cheery gold-colored paper. Above each was the contestant's name, school and grade. As the child concluded a volume and reported on its contents to the children's librarian or one of her assistants, the author and title were entered on the ladder rung and the reader progressed upward. It was not long before sixty-one contestants had vaulted from the top rung and were headed toward the empyrean.

In order to go up a rung, readers had to do more than just ruffle the pages of a book; the children's department put them through a shrewd quiz on each. It was necessary to know author, title, names of the principal characters and a resume of the plot in order to pass. The dazzling speed with which Mildred Shahan could repeat the adventures of Hans Brinker or Anne of Green Gables has won for her the title of "Scheherezade of the West End." Samuel Greenwald, the runner-up, who read fifty-nine books, has also achieved fame as a swift plot-sketcher.

The West Branch was fortunate in having a garden to take care of the overflow of contestants. The gift of the Beacon Hill Garden Club to the section was never more appreciated than by the constant readers, from four years old to high-school age, who packed the green-painted benches under the linden trees. They read through their books from the time the climbing roses were in bloom until the contest ended with the coming of the marigolds and "the last graces of Michaelmas daisies."

Many a contestant who sped up the "steep" course of reading, followed Hans Andersen's tales or the romances of the Five Little Poppers while minding the baby, for infants and culture thrive equally on the West End Branch Library grounds.

Prizes of books are to be awarded today to the first three children to climb the ladder; that is, read and report on ten books. Three other volumes go to those reporting on the greatest number of books. Each child who entered the contest is to receive a souvenir bookmark of leather engraved in gold with the words: "West End Reading Contest, 1934." These charming reminders were made by the library bindery out of stock stamps.

The West End has been seething with the rumor that lollipops will be distributed, but it appears that the refreshments will be even more lavish. There will be ice cream cones, from Miss Fanny Goldstein, the librarian, not to say patron of the arts and philanthropist, who paid for them, herself, not out of her budget.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 21, 1934

Art Treasures in Libraries on View This Week

Library officials in this city wish to call special attention during this Free Public Library Week to their art department. Many citizens, it is believed, do not realize that both the main building and the branch in their vicinity have various art treasures as well as art books for their enjoyment and profit.

As a matter of fact there are, divided among the Central Library in City Square and its 24 branches, picture collections numbering approximately 3000 mounted items. These are available for various uses.

If a woman's club is studying Italian art the nearest branch library will provide half a ton of the paintings and sculpture of early as well as of later artists for their aid.

Many travel clubs depend upon the libraries for plates depicting scenes in every known quarter of the globe. These are largely supplied by lack of numbers of the National Geographic Magazine. It may be remarked in passing that many persons subscribing to these magazines are glad to leave back numbers at the library, thus making it possible, since a library has only one copy for cutting and mounting purposes, for both sides of the page to be used.

Some of our branch libraries possess works of art which have been bestowed upon them by persons interested in a particular section of the city. Perhaps the most notable of these is the Dante Memorial at the North End Branch. As this is used largely by many Italian people who live in that neighborhood, the Boston Branch of the Società Nazionale Dante Alighieri decided to offer a piece of sculpture to be both an ornament to the building and an inspiration to the young folks who frequent it.

This sculpture, executed by an Italian artist, Luciano Campese, who gave his labor as his own contribution, was described by the society's president, as a symbolical representation of Italian art and literature, and the inspiration of Dante the great father of Italian language. This gift is the pride and joy of this particular branch and those who use it.

Poster displays are features of branch work which take much thought and time. The posters, many of which have real artistic merit, are used to advertise certain classes of books. One in use in October bears the caption "Colombus Discovered America. Have You Discovered Your Library?"

Streamlined and airplane advertised a collection of books on travel to poles, deserts, mountains, distant continents and islands.

In the exhibition room of the Central Library department of the Central Library, there are frequent exhibitions of paintings and prints by local and other artists. And from time to time there are similar, if smaller exhibitions, in various branches. Sometimes, too, there are talks on art, or Japanese prints, perhaps, and other subjects.

REGIONAL book centers as suggested by the late Charles F. D. Belden, librarian of the Boston Public Library, and the Massachusetts Board of Free Public Libraries Commissioners, were discussed by Miss Julia Wright Merrill, chief of the public library division, American Library Association, in her address on "Planning for Library Progress," at the autumn meeting of the Massachusetts Library Club.

"It was Mr. Belden's dream," said Miss Merrill, "that the State might select a few strategically located, strong public libraries and make it financially possible for them to lend books freely in their regions or districts, to supplement the smaller collections. This service would be prompter than borrowing from the State library agency, and the reader could often go directly to the regional library."

"In New England, the State Government has always recognized a responsibility for library development," continued Miss Merrill, "not only through a State library agency but by appropriating direct State aid. The tendency is to increase State financial responsibility, for such new activities as regional book centers can most easily be financed through State appropriations, and because of the shift away from property taxes to other forms which are collected by the State. And the State library agency will be needed more rather than less, to coordinate a new library program and to be the keystone of the whole structure."

"The library in the days to come must necessarily become a full share of responsibility for stimulating curiosity and reading interest," in Miss Merrill's opinion. It will co-operate with other educational agencies, supplementing their educational offerings with reading suggestions and promoting the use of such facilities. Every citizen should be conscious of the intellectual and cultural opportunities the library offers, as the result of continuing publicity for its books and services through newspapers, radio, moving pictures, distribution of reading lists and reading courses, through book discussion groups, lectures and other meetings in the library, and through the observance of "Library Week."

Such library service, for all the people, is the objective of State library planning.

Exhibits at Libraries

For library week every one of the 23 branch libraries of the Boston Public Library system yesterday arranged exhibits of posters and books, some of the latter showing the best some of today compared with some of the best sellers of half a century ago. The exhibits will continue through library week.

Yesterday afternoon the series of radio broadcasts under the auspices of the Charles River Library Club of the Charles River Library Club was inaugurated at WEEI, and Miss Barbara Abbott of Needham told of the service the Public Library offers to the community. It was the first of eight broadcasts which will be made on Monday afternoons at 4:30, ending Dec 10.

In the evening the Massachusetts College of Pharmacy entertained Boston Chapter of Special Libraries Association, and there was a large attendance. Supper was served in the college cafeteria. The program at the business meeting included a historical sketch of "Sixteen Years of Boston Chapter S. L. A.," given by William Alcott, librarian of the Boston Globe, former president.

Miss Ethel J. Heath, librarian of the pharmacy college, gave a sketch of the founding of the college and its library and spoke of some of the rare collections owned, including a collection of pharmacopoeias, in English, German and Spanish, which probably are not to be duplicated anywhere in the country outside of the library of the surgeon general in Washington.

Meeting in Concord

Dean Theodore J. Bradley of the college told of the progress of pharmacy and its relation to medicine, and of the generous gifts amounting to millions of dollars which had been made to the college.

Next Friday at Concord the fall event of Library Week, the Fall meeting of the Massachusetts Library Club will be held. Sessions will be held morning and afternoon and the attendance will probably exceed 500. Featured on the program will be Miss Julia Wright Merrill of the library extension division of the American Library Association, who will speak on "A National Plan for Library Progress." Miss Merrill is one of the leading library workers in America and comes from Chicago for this special engagement.

Others on the program are Frank W. Wright, Deputy Commissioner of Education in Massachusetts; Alden G. Alley, formerly professor of history at Dana College, and Mrs. Roland G. Hopkins, managing editor for Boston of the Group Theatre, Inc.

The speaker gave high praise to the efforts of this State in library planning. "The founding of the Boston Public Library eighty-five years ago," he reminded, "the creation of the first State library commission in 1890, the achievement of the objective of library service for all the people, have all had national significance. Massachusetts may therefore be expected to lead in developing a library plan to meet new conditions and needs."

"Each State library plan must of course grow out of conditions within the State. No outsider can offer you one ready made, but can only tell you what others are considering and doing. The first step, perhaps, is to assemble and face the facts squarely to inventory the present library resources of the State. Another is to study the objectives and programs of other educational and social agencies in the State and to consult with their leaders. Citizens library committees have been held recently in several States at which representatives of many State-wide agencies have participated, telling what they hoped for from libraries in the future, and discussing plans and ways and means."

"Fundamental in a State with many small libraries, is the question of how these can be strengthened to meet the new adult education and other developments. If library opportunities are to be at all equal—as they should be in a democracy—the citizen of a rural town has the same need, the same right, as a citizen of Springfield to demand access to a broad book collection, when he needs it, and to the advisory service of a skilled staff. The small library will be able to give this grade of service but many of them, we must admit, are handicapped, even with the help of the Massachusetts Division of Libraries."

Former Boy Prodigy at Work on ERA Project

ERA LIBRARY HEADS

Thirty different colleges and 20 distinct nationalities are represented in one of the most unusual of the federal projects sponsored by the United States government to alleviate unemployment—a task that employs 728 men and women in recataloging a new shelf list for the Boston Public Library.

ONE-TIME PRODIGY

The work is conducted on the third floor of the Park Square building, under the direction of James W. Kenney, for a quarter of a century associated with the Public Library, and his assistant, Robert W. Fiske, in charge of the CWA when it was started last year.

The persons engaged in the work run the gamut from homeless young women to a former professor at the University of Milan in Italy, the nephew of a former President of the United States, and a one-time infant prodigy who, 27 years ago, astounded the educators of Boston by his youthful brilliance.

Few persons who have inspected the project perhaps have realized that the alert-appearing man in charge of the proof room still holds the distinction of being the youngest boy ever admitted to the Boston Latin School. He entered the school in 1867, when the age limit was 11, and few boys that young were able to gain admittance.

He, however, applied for admission to the school at the age of 9. After considering his case and judging his ability, the school committee made an exception to allow him to enter at that unusual age. He was 18 the following year, and was an automobile enthusiast, driving the shell-torn battlefields of France.

When he was 19 he was a member of the Foreign Service, and served as a pilot in a crack-up ended his career. He reads, writes and speaks fluently three foreign languages. While representing a steamship company in Nicaragua he was appointed by the King of Denmark as the royal Danish consul at Bluefields, Nicaragua. He also was foreign correspondent for the Associated Press of New York during the Sandino trouble, and was personally acquainted with the "little Caesar."

One of the proof-readers is a nephew of the late President Grover Cleveland. Still another was well known as a college football player in Boston, and once served as coach of football at a Southern College.

Former Professor

Probably the most thoroughly educated of all the proof-readers is a former university professor, who had been employed as a ditch-digger until ERA officials discovered that his knowledge and background might be utilized to his advantage. He taught English in Milan University for several years, is a master of French, Italian, German, Latin and Ancient Hebrew. At one time he was associated with one of the leading Italian newspapers in this country.

Mr. Fiske, personnel director of the project, who has some 60 women under him, is another of the interesting persons engaged in the work. Mr. Fiske, incidentally, feels that it's much easier to handle women by the hundreds than singly.

ERA Directors Urged to Aid Curley By Administrator Removed by Carney

A circular letter was received yesterday by local civil works administrators throughout the commonwealth urging them to abandon party bias in the current election campaign and to work for the election of James M. Curley as Governor.

The letter carried the signature of John T. Scully, who was removed by Joseph P. Carney as emergency relief administrator last March, shortly after Carney took over the direction of relief work for the federal government in Massachusetts.

Scully's letter follows: "You and I were engaged in the same undertaking—to assist the unfortunate in need of help during the formative period of the federal emergency relief administration from August, 1933, to March, 1934. My connection with the organization was abruptly terminated March 17.

You know the happiness and contentment that permeated the homes of the men and women who worked on the various projects.

I am sure you would like to see the same class of people provided with the opportunity to continue the worthwhile activities in which you took a prominent part.

If the government is going to continue work relief this coming winter, we should have a leader in this state who is in sympathy with the federal plans and familiar with the wants of those in need, one who will advance the program for relief.

As Governor of Massachusetts I believe James M. Curley will forcefully carry his pleas to Washington and secure greater benefits for the deserving unemployed than any man in Massachusetts.

Party ties in this harrassed period have vanished because the people are concerned only with qualified, determined men who will fight for their protection and advancement.

As a humble citizen who, with you, carried out honestly and impartially the President's policies on relief, I ask you to stand by those whom you served by helping to elect James M. Curley Governor.

OBSERVANCE OF LIBRARY WEEK

Five Projects Announced by the E. R. A.

The observance of library week, from Oct 21 to Oct 27, in conformity with the proclamation of Gov. Ely, was ushered in yesterday by several events.

Most important was the announcement by the E. R. A. administration of the approval of five library projects which will give relief to unemployed librarians. Some of the projects got under way this morning. The projects included the preparation of a union list of special periodicals and expensive reference books in the libraries of the State, the preparation of a union list of newspapers in Massachusetts libraries from 1821 to date, preparing an index of the proceedings of the Massachusetts Bar Association, survey of special collections in Massachusetts in cooperation with a nationwide survey of the same purpose and the work of classifying and cataloguing certain small libraries in Massachusetts.

These projects had been called to the attention of E. R. A. authorities in this State through a committee of librarians representing several library associations and the Massachusetts State Library, and the work was started through Edward H. Redstone, State librarian, and the division of Public Libraries of the Department of Education.

Field and Stream Walk to View CCC Work Here

At the Field and Forest Club lecture course at the Boston Public Library last night, Robert Fechner, national director of the CCC, discussed "The Civilian Conservation Corps Rebuilding Human Value Together with Natural Resources." He gave a concise picture of the establishment and workings of the CCC and the results of the efforts in the things accomplished both materially and in health and morale of the boys in the corps. Mr. Fechner convinced his hearers that this was a phase of the New Deal that has more than paid its way, besides lifting a burden from local relief funds.

Dr. Ralph C. Achorn, president of the Field and Forest Club, presided and extended an invitation to the public to join the club in a hike and tour of inspection of the Harold Parker State Forest in North Reading and Andover Sunday.

Richard F. Smith of the State Forestry Department will be on hand to conduct the hike over the region. He will show the recreational features that have been completed, such as picnic areas with fireplaces, also man made lakes that have been stocked with fish, and camp sites. He will show one beautiful lake, which was merely a hollow, but which through drainage has been converted into a beauty spot at the trifling expense of only ten bags of cement.

The Field and Forest Club trip on Sunday starts from Wakefield railroad station, at 11 A. M., and from there motors to the entrance of the Harold Parker State Forest on Haverhill street just over the town line of Andover and North Reading. Trampers are asked to bring lunch and a cup. The club cook will furnish hot coffee.

C. C. C. CAMPS GIVE OUTLET FOR ENERGY

Fechner Tells Bostonians
Plan Is Nonmilitary

The use of the C. C. C. camps as a nonmilitaristic outlet for the energies of youth, the direct opposite of the forced military training now in vogue in Europe, was described last night by Robert Fechner, national director of the camps, in his lecture at the Boston Public Library.

More than 300 persons heard the former Bostonian deliver the first lecture in a series on field and forest which are free to the public.

The fears of many persons that the camps would become training schools for the army under the direction of army officers have been proved entirely wrong, Fechner said. In fact the army officers directing these camps found the army's ideas of discipline and punishment had to be laid aside for a civil form of management.

The primary object of this great body of men, reforestation, has been relegated to the background by the more pressing needs of fire prevention, drought control, erosion prevention, the study of tree blights and the protection and preservation of wild life, said the speaker.

Arthur J. O'Keefe, representing Mayor Mansfield, introduced the speaker. Milton E. Lord, director of the library, and Frederick M. Brooks, chairman of the lecture committee, were on the platform.

Children Guided to Right Reading by Hub Library

Miss Mary C. Toy, who looks out for the children's room at the Boston Public Library in Copley square.

Room Set Apart for Their Use Cultivates Power of Discrimination and Makes Them Book Lovers in Finest Sense

By ERIC G. MAKRIIS

When one stops to consider the many and varied functions of Boston's library system as it is today, one is first of all impressed with a vivid contrast it presents to the public library of the 19th century, not only in this city, but in other parts of the world as well.

The contrast appears in its relation to boys and girls. It is reasonably safe to say that before 1850 no literature exclusive for children existed, much less such a thing as a "children's room" in any public library. Here in Boston small children, except when they were accompanied by their parents, were forbidden the use of the library. More astonishing still was a ruling requiring minors to bring a written request from their parents before a volume of fiction was delivered to them, and the Boston report of 1869 says in part: "It does seem rather strange that a man of 20 should have to bring his father's permit before he is allowed to read a volume of Ivanhoe."

SERVICE IS INVALUABLE

Anne Carroll Moore, pioneer of juvenile libraries in America, once wrote: "America was the first country in the world to give boys and girls a place of their own in a public library 30 or 40 years ago." Actually the first children's room to be provided for in the architect's plan was in the construction of the Pratt Institute School of Library Science in 1886. But previous to that there had been a growing and urgent need for separate children's quarters in the larger libraries.

We read in an historical account written by Miss Alice M. Jordan, the present supervisor of children's work in the Boston Public Library, that in May, 1895, less than two months after the opening of the Copley square building, the librarian, Mr. Herbert Putnam, set apart a room on the second floor and appointed it the children's room.

Today, scattered throughout the suburbs of the city there are 32 such departments, all managed directly by trained librarians under the supervision of Miss Jordan. The service they render to the children is invaluable, not only because it supplements the work of the schools, but also to use the words of Francis Jenkins Olcott, because "the guiding of the children's reading is of great importance because it is fundamental." This implies the grave responsibility of directing a child's reading, cultivating his powers of discrimination, and making him a book lover in the finest sense of the word.

ATMOSPHERE IMPORTANT

Atmosphere and surroundings are an important factor nowadays in all libraries, and Boston's pride located in Copley square certainly has its share of both. But of all the various departments in the building, that room situated on the second floor of the Boylston street side and known and loved by thousands as the children's room can lay strong claims to being one of the most beautiful and interesting sections of the building.

When Mary Antin, as a young immigrant girl from Russia, tells in her book, "Promised Land," how the Boston Public Library became her latest home when she lived in this city, she was referring more directly to Bates hall, but we venture to say that she was not unacquainted with the children's room.

It is a low-ceilinged room longer than it is wide and by standing in the entrance from the corridor one receives at first impression the pleasing effect of infinite distance which the room suggests. Three sides are lined with book shelves representing the finest classics of children's literature, tastefully bound and a perfect symphony in color to the eye. Oil paintings done originally by the famous illustrator, Howard Pyle to illustrate Woodrow Wilson's biography of Washington enhance the beauty of the room. Howard Pyle himself considered these paintings as some of his best work and a group of friends purchased them and presented them to the library. A subdued light falling through the windowed niches at the further end make these surroundings an ideal starting point for a child's "travels in the realms of gold."

ADAMS'S PRIVATE LIBRARY

Opening off one side is the comparatively smaller teachers' reference room, essentially a study room similar to the renowned Bates hall. Probably one of the most complete collections of pedagogical books in the state are contained in this room. Housed here also, on upper shelves reached by a ladder only, are some 3000 volumes once belonging to the private library of John Adams, second President of the United States. They were books given to him by friends during the time he lived in England and France. Adams, in his will left the books to the city of Quincy but that town having no available quarters in which to house them, they were transferred in 1893 to the Copley square library. Many of the books are very valuable and bear the autograph of John Adams on the flyleaf.

Miss Manning, who is in charge of the room, says students still use them occasionally, the average number being about 10 a week. At the rear facing the entrance is a passageway leading to the lecture hall. On either side of it hangs framed handwritten copies of two famous songs, one Julia Ward Howe's "Battle Hymn of the Republic" the other that immortal anthem by Smith, "America." The influence of the author of the "Battle Hymn" is felt more strongly and distinctly in the room perhaps by the ceiling decorations than by the "handwriting on the wall." The design, "The Triumph of Time," was painted by John Elliot, who married Maude Howe Elliot, the daughter of Julia Ward Howe. This beautiful work, a painting with a subtle depth of classical dignity and subdued color, was painted in Rome.

In his recent book, "Recollections of Seventy Years," Cardinal O'Connell refers to his friend John Elliot, who was at work on this painting when the cardinal was in Rome. Mrs. Elliot is living today and her most recent biography, "My Cousin, P. Marion Crawford," was published this month.

Branch Library Is Developing Hobbies of Children by Information in Books

Five-year-old Ruth Hughes of Moreland street, Roxbury, perusing a book in the midst of the hobby exhibit at the municipal building, Dudley and Vine streets, Roxbury.

Exhibit Expressing Idea Attracts Roxbury Residents

Development of simple and entertaining hobbies through information obtained by reading is under way at a branch of the Boston Public Library in the Municipal building, Dudley and Vine streets, Roxbury, and this week one corner of the library has been filled by an interesting exhibit expressing this idea.

DESIGNED FOR CHILDREN

Both the books and the hobbies are designed for children. Miss Margaret Reed, the librarian, explained, and are of a type combining amusement and education. The exhibit centered around a large poster of a bucking bronco in action which bore the legend, "Have a Hobby and Ride It." Placed about on tables and floor were individual displays.

In one corner woven baskets stood beside books on the art of weaving and basketry. In another a camera and snapshots were likewise associated with volumes on photography, while a model boat and books on sailing occupied still another position.

Directly under the poster in the center of the display there was a large table covered with dolls in brilliantly colored and elaborate costumes. They were also attractive looking and simply written books on travel. The dolls, it turned out, represented various nationalities described in the books.

TINY MODEL AIRPLANES

The model sailboat in the exhibit, Miss Reed emphasized, was made by students at the George T. Angel school and then she proudly showed the reporter a number of tiny model airplanes in a bookcase on the other side of the room. She explained they had been built by Richard Cunningham, Jr., aged 9, of Hartford street, Dorchester.

Meantime, Ruth Hughes, 5 years old and serious-faced, of Moreland street, Roxbury, and a little companion had entered the library to admire the exhibit. There were many other girls and boys in the room, but Ruth was so absorbed in a book that the photographer decided to take her picture. He did, as you see.

PUBLIC LIBRARY ACQUIRES THREE VOLUMES OF MILTON

Several interesting volumes have recently been added to the rare book collections of the Boston Public Library. One is a copy of the first edition of Milton's "Paradise Regain'd," and "Samson Agonistes." The work was printed in 1671 in a small octavo volume of 220 pages. It is a splendid copy, with the leaf of "License" preceding the title page and the leaf of "errata" at the end. The beautiful binding—olive levant morocco elaborately gilt with borders of trees on pointlike background, with back to match, and with gilt edges—was made by the Riviere Bindery in London.

Another valuable Milton item acquired by the Boston Public Library at the sale is a copy of "The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce," printed in London in 1645, and apparently of the third edition. The volume is bound in dark blue levant morocco, with gilt tooled back and with gilt borders and corner fleurons. The third edition bears the author's initials on the title page.

A first edition copy of Tennyson's first book, "Poems, by Two Brothers," has been acquired by the library. The volume—a very rare item—is of the large paper issue and is almost perfect. Only two leaves have repairs in their margins, with five letters on one page slightly injured.

All three volumes formerly belonged to the library of the late Dr. Roderick Terry, Newport, R. I.

INQUIRY IN LIBRARY'S ERA WORK

Personnel Director Reported Relieved of Duties

Revelation that Robert W. Fiske, personnel director of the Boston Public Library's ERA project, housed in the Park Square building, had been relieved of his ERA duties came last night as Colonel Thomas F. Sullivan, Boston ERA administrator, admitted he is investigating some complaints concerning Mr. Fiske's work.

EXPECT FISKE'S RESIGNATION

While Francis Hannigan, director of the library ERA project, refused to state whether or not Fiske had been removed from his position, Administrator Sullivan made it plain that Fiske's resignation "is expected at once."

Fiske's duties as personnel manager of the library's huge ERA project were taken over Tuesday, it was revealed, by Walter C. Curley, payroll auditor. Director Hannigan stated yesterday that he had not seen Fiske for two days and that he "has no idea what it is all about."

He declared that he did not know where Fiske is, or why he has not reported for work for the past two days. He would not state whether Mr. Fiske's position is being held open or not.

Colonel Sullivan would not go into details regarding the complaints brought against Mr. Fiske other than to say that "Fiske has not been doing quite the job, so we expect him to resign very shortly. We've had a series of complaints," he said, "and something had to be done."

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT
DECEMBER 12, 1934

BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY is fortunate in owning books printed at the Cambridge University Press at Cambridge, England, during the four centuries of its existence. About a third of the one hundred books now on exhibition in the Treasures Room of the library, and which were lent by the university, is represented by copies in the Boston Public Library, according to the Boston Harasziy, editor of the library publication, More Books.

The oldest volume printed at the Cambridge University Press now in the Boston Public Library is William Whitaker's "Disputatio de Sacra Scriptura," printed by Thomas Thomas in 1588. It belongs to the Prince collection, bearing the signature and date "T. Prince, Sudbury, June 1, 1713." The library has also a copy of the first Cambridge edition of the "Authorized Version," 1629. It was acquired by the library in 1878 and once was owned by W. S. Medlicott of Longmeadow, Mass. It is a perfect copy, beautifully bound in contemporary tooled binding.

Almost all the editions of "The Book of Common Prayer" printed at Cambridge may be found in the collection of prayer books bequeathed to the library by Colonel Josiah Benton. There is a copy of the very rare 1662 edition, printed under the supervision of Archbishop Sancroft. The book was hardly finished when the king ordered the vice chancellor of the university "to secure the sheets that none may be disposed of." And there are copies of the beautiful editions produced by John Baskerville in 1760 and 1762; indeed, the library has two of each. And there is a copy of Baskerville's Bible, 1763, a truly magnificent work, which the printer himself regarded as his "magnum opus."

A splendid catalogue of the exhibition was printed at the Cambridge University Press, England. The introduction gives an interesting history of Cambridge printing, beginning with the establishment of a press by John Siberch, a friend of Erasmus, in 1521.

In 1534 Henry VIII granted to the university a charter to elect "three stationers and printers, or sellers of books . . . to print all manner of books approved by the Chancellor . . . and to sell and expose to sale in the university or elsewhere within the realm, as well such books as other books printed within or without the realm, and approved of by the Chancellor."

In 1629 appeared the first Authorized Version printed at Cambridge a folio produced by Thomas and John Buck. A great typographical revival was initiated at Cambridge at the end of the seventeenth century by Richard Bentley, Professor of Divinity, who procured fine types from Holland.

The most famous name in the history of Cambridge printing throughout the eighteenth century is that of John Baskerville. Dr. Harasziy reminds Baskerville printed an octavo Prayer Book and a Folio Bible for the University Press. The work which is regarded as perhaps the most beautiful product of the press is the Codex Bezae, printed by John Archdeacon in 1733.

Bruce Rogers, the eminent American typographer, served for two years after the World War as typographical adviser for the Cambridge press. Five books designed by him are included in the exhibition at the Library.

Text of President's Address To Relief Workers in Capital

Must Take People Off "Dole" He Declares— Says Our Problem Worse Than Any Other Nation's

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 (AP)—President Roosevelt's address to relief workers at the White House today follows:

My friends, I will tell you an official secret. Harry Hopkins wrote out two and a half very excellent pages of suggestions as to what I should say. They are on the desk. I subscribe to his sentiments 100 per cent. But I am not going to read them.

TO TALK UNOFFICIALLY

I don't want to talk to you officially, but unofficially and extemporaneously. First of all, I want to thank you for coming here. This group, representative of the entire country, has in its hands to accomplish something that no nation has ever before done. As you know, during the past eight months we have tried honestly and practically to face a problem that no other nation in modern history has ever been confronted with. We have heard a great deal of unemployment on the other side, in England, in France and in Germany, but at no time in any one of those countries has the unemployment situation even approximated the unemployment situation in the United States last spring. You can figure it at 12 or 14 or 16 million, or whatever you like—on the basis of population that is a larger percentage of men, women and children out of work—in most cases suffering physically and mentally—a large proportion than anywhere else.

During these months a great many of our unemployed have gone back to work. The number has been estimated variously at from 3,500,000 to 5,000,000. The actual figures make very little difference because there are still a great many, still millions out of employment and this particular effort in which you and I are engaged at the present time is to put 4,000,000 people from the list of those still unemployed back to work during the winter months so that we can honestly say as a nation that this winter is not going to be like last winter or the winter before.

I like to stress not only the fact of 4,000,000, but also the fact that of those 4,000,000 of people 2,000,000 are today on what we might just as well call, frankly, a dole. When any man or woman goes on a dole, something happens to them mentally and the quicker they are taken off the dole the better it is for them during the rest of their lives.

We hope we can recruit 2,000,000 from the ranks of people who perhaps ought to have been on the dole—perhaps people who were too proud to ask for assistance. In every community most of us know of cases—many cases—of families that have been living along, barely subsisting, yet too proud to go and ask for relief. We want to help that type of American family.

Now this work is really and truly a partnership—a partnership between the federal government, the state governments and the local governments—a partnership in which each one of those three divisions is expected to and is going to do its share. This $400,000,000 isn't going to cost the federal government any more money, because we are taking it out of the large public works appropriation of $3,300,000,000. It is using a portion of that fund in a very practical way.

MAY BE TRANSFERRED

We might as well be perfectly frank, it has been exceedingly difficult, honestly to allot the entire sum of $3,300,000,000 to worthwhile projects, every one of which has had to be scanned by local authorities, state authorities and finally by the federal government.

I believe the question was raised this morning as to the transfer of some of the projects to which allotments have already been made by public works, and I have been asked by the Governor of Wyoming to clear up that point. It is possible that certain allotments already made by Secretary Ickes to public works may be transferred to Mr. Hopkins's civil works administration.

The process, I am told, will be to have that request made to the original person who did the allotting—in other words, the secretary of the interior—and if he approves of the transfer, it will then be made under Mr. Hopkins. I think that straightens out the question the Governor of Wyoming raised.

CHARGES OF POLITICS

Just one word more and I am sort of talking in the family. We have heard a good many charges and allegations that have been made in regard to relief work—the same kind of charges that were made when I was Governor of New York—charges that politics were entering into the use of public works funds and of emergency relief funds.

I want to tell you very, very simply that your national government is not trying to gain political advantage one way or the other out of the need of human beings for relief. We expect the same spirit on the part of every Governor of every one of the 48 states and on the part of every mayor and every county commissioner and of every relief agent. I would like to have the general rule adopted—that no person connected with the administration of this $400,000,000 will in any single case in any political division of the United States ask whether a person needing relief or work is a Republican, Democrat, Socialist or anything else.

I am asking you to go ahead and do your share. Most of the work will fall on your shoulders. Most of the responsibility for the practical application of the plan will fall on you rather than on us in Washington. I can assure you that Mr. Hopkins, Secretary Ickes and all of the people connected with the federal government are going to co-operate in putting this plan to work quickly.

Speed is an essential. I am very confident that the mere fact of giving real wages to 4,000,000 Americans who are today not getting wages is going to do more to relieve suffering and to lift the morale of the nation than anything undertaken before.

EMPLOYMENT TO BE GIVEN TO 4,000,000

$400,000,000 to Be Spent Largely on Lesser Municipal Projects

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 (AP)—Harry L. Hopkins, civil works administrator, announced tonight that the $400,000,000 appropriated for the new organization would be disbursed to the states on the basis of 75 per cent. of their population and 25 per cent. on their unemployment relief needs.

Hopkins gave out only the number of men to be employed in the various states on the basis of population, and did not compute the additional 25 per cent. to be employed on a basis of unemployment needs. He emphasized the list was subject to correction.

The number of men to be employed in Connecticut is 35,000; Massachusetts, 97,000; New Hampshire, 11,000; New York, 297,000; Rhode Island, 14,000; Vermont, 5000; Maine, 16,000.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 (AP)—A demand that politics be laid aside and speed be applied to administering relief under the civil works division was voiced before 500 state and city officials today by President Roosevelt.

Speaking to the crowd that had assembled in the White House, the chief executive said reports had come to him that politics had crept into the administration of relief.

"I simply want to tell you that your national government is not trying to gain political advantage one way or another out of the needs of human beings for relief," he said.

EXPECTS SAME SPIRIT

"I expect the same spirit from every Governor and I expect the same spirit from every mayor and from every relief administrator."

"I want it understood that no person connected with the administration of this $400,000,000 will in any instance ask whether a person needing work is a Republican, Democrat, a Socialist or anything else."

"Our effort is to put 4,000,000 men back to work in the winter months so that we can honestly say as a nation that this winter will not be like last winter or the winter before."

The President was referring to the civil works plan that already had been outlined to the state and city officials by Harry L. Hopkins, the civil works administrator, and Secretary Ickes, public works administrator. Both Hopkins and Ickes were applauded as they told of the plan they said was designed to hold back poverty and destitution until the $3,300,000,000 public works program could get fully under way.

The officials listened to Hopkins for an hour as he read and then explained the rules under which the plan would operate. At noon regional representatives of the relief administration, with which the civil works division is coupled, explained in more detail the plans for various states at luncheon conferences. Hopkins urged haste in getting under way the projects, all of which he said were to use a maximum of day labor. Ickes called the plan one that would tide the nation over the winter months until the public works program, held up by necessary technical work, could get under way.

Hopkins, too, stressed that politics were to be banned.

"It is unthinkable," he said, after outlining the general policy, "that anyone would think of using any of this money for political purposes or for private or personal gain."

HASTE NECESSARY

"Haste is necessary if we are going to put 4,000,000 men to work immediately. The state civil works administrations will be federal agents. They will take the oath as federal officials. They will have full authority to approve projects."

"We intend to completely decentralize the civil works administration and put the responsibility entirely on the state civil works administration. Funds will be made available immediately and there will be a federal disbursing officer in each state."

Large building projects such as bridges and public structures will not be undertaken, Hopkins said. These require too much time to get under way and really come under the public works act, he added. The work would be largely confined to lesser city and state projects.

Cities and counties were called upon to put up some of the money to be spent. Where this is not possible, Hopkins said, the federal money should all be allotted for civil works projects and the city and county money used for direct relief, taking over as much as possible of the cost of providing for the $1,000,000 families that still will be on the relief rolls.

"Don't look on this as the federal government doing something for the cities and states," he said. "Look on it as the nation doing something in a great cooperative movement."

Ickes said that tomorrow he would begin to turn over to Hopkins what are known as "border line" projects.

30-HOUR RULES

In outlining the plan, Hopkins said the public works administration rules as to hours of work and wages would govern. These forbid working more than 30 hours a week except that time lost because of bad weather may be made up within 20 days and on projects where complete housing of employees is necessary they may be worked 40 hours.

Minimum wages were set at 40 cents an hour for common labor and $1 for skilled labor in the southern zone, 45 cents and $1.10 in the middle zone and 50 cents and $1.20 in the northern zone.

Officials said that beginning tomorrow the first 2,000,000 men to go onto these projects would be transferred to the full 30-hour basis, the complete transfer to take place within the next three or four days. These are men now working a few hours a week to obtain money and food for their families.

Immediately afterward, the plans call for hiring 2,000,000 more men through the United States employment service. These would be men without jobs but not on relief rolls.

Hopkins urged that in considering projects attention be given to providing jobs for engineers, and other skilled workers and for women.

Washington Hopes to Have

By Dec. 15

Selection of welfare recipients for jobs on civilian works projects began last night as four New England Governors and a score of mayors returned from Washington where President Roosevelt unfolded his plan to put 4,000,000 men to work by Dec. 15.

All were enthusiastic at the prospect of relieving welfare departments of tremendous burdens by immediate cooperation with the newly-launched civil works program.

While Gov. Ely left Washington before the Massachusetts portion of the $400,000,000 civil works fund was decided, it was estimated last night that this state will receive at least $12,000,000 as a free grant. Nearly 100,000 men will be put to work here.

Joseph W. Bartlett of Newton, chairman of the state emergency finance board, yesterday was named chairman of the Massachusetts civil works board which will allocate the $12,000,000 in this state. He will be assisted by State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley and William B. Coy, who are members of the state emergency finance board also.

To speed approval of the projects, Mr. Bartlett announced last night that with the consent of the other members of the civil works board he will call a meeting of city and town officials and welfare agents at the Gardner auditorium in the State House next week.

IN HIGH SPIRITS

The government leaders were in high spirits as they returned from Washington. Gov. Louis J. Brann of Maine said he had been given a tentative estimate of money sufficient to put 20,000 men to work. He declared that his first project will be the creation of a Roosevelt park on Mt. Katahdin in Maine, a project that will provide work for 3000 men.

Gov. Stanley C. Wilson of Vermont declared that 3000 men could be put to work in his state, while Gov. John G. Winant of New Hampshire promised "work for a substantial number of men" and the chief executives of Rhode Island and Connecticut. Govs. Theodore F. Green and Wilbur L. Cross, were ready to begin at once. Road projects were uppermost in their minds because of the necessity for starting before snow arrives.

Mayor Curley at Washington continued to urge approval of his plan to spend $1,500,000 for the improvement of the South Boston strandway and bathing beaches, and also sought quick action on city projects under the public works program to cost $6,000,000. The mayor will return to Boston today.

So pleased was Mayor Murphy of Somerville with the civil works program that he telephoned orders to the Somerville police department to begin a census of the unemployed men in that city. He described the plan as "the most constructive thing yet," and told Somerville department heads, "I don't want one second's delay in our city. We must take advantage of this program."

WORCESTER EXECUTIVE

Mayor John C. Mahoney of Worcester was another executive who vigorously praised the civil works plan. He had with him a list of projects which, he said, would put 2987 men to work "at a moment's notice" for three months' time. The projects include grading and widening streets, sewer construction, the building of three baseball diamonds, two tennis courts, a football field, and excavating for a swimming and a wading pool on Worcester parks.

While in Washington, Mayor Mahoney presented an outline of his projects, which would cost $682,782, to Chairman Bartlett and received his tentative approval. The projects of Mayor Dwight R. Winter of Springfield, also presented to Bartlett, were also approved, subject to the further approval of State Treasurer Hurley and Mr. Coy. The Springfield projects are mainly the building of "feeder" roads.

In calling the meeting of city and town officials and welfare agents to explain the provisions of the civil works programs, the state civil works board is moved by a desire to speed approval of various projects. It is acting under special authority of Col. Harry L. Hopkins, civil works administrator, to whom President Roosevelt delegated authority to allocate the $400,000,000 to the states on the basis of 75 per cent. of a state's population and 25 per cent. on its unemployment needs.

By holding a mass meeting and explaining that the President took the $400,000,000 from the public works administration fund to eliminate red tape, Chairman Bartlett believes he can hasten the flow of applications and approvals and consequent employment.

APPLICATION BLANKS

Within 24 hours the state civil works board expects to have application blanks ready for distribution to the various communities in the state. These blanks, unlike other application blanks sent out by the federal government, will be quite simple. Arrangements will be made today at a meeting of the state civil works board to handle the flood of applications.

The disbursing agent of the Boston office of the veterans' administration will act as disbursing agent for the civil works board in this state.

Projects calling for new construction, garbage disposal and snow removal were specifically barred by Administrator Hopkins. Repair work on public buildings, park construction, road and sewerage work were set forth as projects coming within the administration program. The Springfield program, tentatively approved, is predominantly road construction.

Interviewed last night, Chairman Bartlett explained the civil works plans: "It is the administration's plan to put 2,000,000 men now on the welfare rolls to work by Dec. 1," he said. "Then by Dec. 15 the President would like to find jobs for 2,000,000 unemployed men, not welfare recipients. To do that means that the projects must be the kind on which work can begin shortly after approval is given and the money allocated."

"Within 24 to 48 hours blanks will be sent to all city and town governments. It will be no simple task to say 'This project will employ 1000 men, and then provide the men. The men must be selected and this work should be going on now. I have advised those Massachusetts officials I have seen to start this process of selection so that once the word is given the men can be put to work."

"Next week it is my plan, which must be approved by the other members of the board, to call a meeting at the Gardner auditorium in the State House. The civil works program idea will be explained to these officials and the necessity for speed shown. Specifically, we want the blanks filled out correctly, for instance, a complete description of the projects, number of men to be employed, length of time it will take to complete it, and so on."

"Those projects which will go beyond Feb. 15, as I understand it, are out. By that time the public works administration will have allocated money to start much bigger construction items. Items which have been submitted to the PWA are barred, also, but the PWA can refer them back to the state board for approval."

Chairman Bartlett said he was aware that originally it had been planned to allocate six projects, at $5000 or so each, to each of the 3000 counties in the country. He explained that the administration had been dealing with the problem of allocation on a county basis, but that densely populated Massachusetts, with only 14 counties, used the city or town as the unit. For that reason when he asked for application blanks for each city and town, the civil works administration was quite surprised until he explained.

Directly after he arrived in Boston yesterday, Chairman Bartlett took a train to Manchester, N. H., where he spoke before New Hampshire Assessors Association. He said then that "the federal government has thrown red tape out the window to provide 4,000,000 jobs during the winter months by the expenditure of $400,000,000."

Failure of the public works program to provide work, owing to the amount of time consumed in inspecting each project, forced President Roosevelt to launch the civil works program. Massachusetts under the public works program has not received one cent, and not one man has been put to work, Mr. Bartlett said.

The public works administration rules governing hours of labor and rates of wages, will apply to the civilian works projects. In the northern zone this rate is 50 cents an hour for unskilled labor, and $1.20 an hour for skilled workmen. These rates are minimum rates and are not to be considered maximum. The rules prohibit men working more than 30 hours a week except that time lost because of inclement weather may be made up within 30 days; and on projects where complete housing of employees is necessary the men may be worked 40 hours.

50,000 GET JOBS IN STATE AT ONCE AS DRIVE STARTS

SPRAGUE FAVORS HOUSING SCHEME

Would Encourage Mass Production of Modest Homes With Public Aid

[Special Dispatch to The Herald]
WASHINGTON, Nov. 20 — A large scale building program intended to supply adequate housing for people with small incomes is advocated by Prof. O. M. W. Sprague, financial adviser of the treasury, as a step which would put great numbers to work and go far to raise the country from the current depression. He has discussed the measure with President Roosevelt, and today mentioned the plan in a clearance plan promoted by the public works administration as a step in the right direction. Dr. Sprague suggested what would amount to mass production of homes to rent at from $20 to $40 a month. He felt that construction should be carried out as far as possible by private interests, but thought the government could give aid by facilitating the supply of money at low interest and by experimenting with a few sample areas to see what could be done in the direction of lowering production costs.

How to Obtain Jobs Under Civil Work Plan

Here's how jobs will be given out under the civil works program: If your name was on the welfare list of a city or town as of Nov. 16, last, you get first consideration for any work created between now and Dec. 1.

There is no need to make application. Preference will be given veterans and citizens with dependents.

If your name is NOT on any welfare list in a city or town you must register with the federal re-employment service in your community. In those communities where there is no such office, the welfare department or some similar agency will act for the re-employment service.

In Boston those whose names are NOT on the welfare list should register at the state employment bureau at 169 Congress street.

BARTLETT HAS PLAN TO END CONTROVERSY

Governor and Board to Confer Today—To Ignore
Red Tape

The greatest single job-giving program in the history of Massachusetts will get under way today. Fifty thousand unemployed men in Massachusetts will be ordered to work shortly after the civil works commission confers this morning with Gov. Ely. It was learned last night. These 50,000 are expected to all be given jobs before the end of the week.

47,000 MORE BY DEC. 15
The remainder of the 97,000 Massachusetts men to be put to work under the allotment of $12,000,000 federal funds will be gainfully employed in public works projects before Dec. 15.

Every man employed in the gigantic group of projects will be paid with money; employment will be limited to 30 hours a week, and no employment will be permitted on so small a basis that the remuneration would be insufficient to care for the man's family.

A plan for the allotment of funds which will end the controversy between Massachusetts mayors will be presented to the Governor today by Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the civil works board, and the other members of the board, State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley and William B. Coy.

Bartlett, Hurley and Coy worked until late last night perfecting the plan for the allotment of funds to various cities and towns.

PROTESTED AGAINST PLAN

Declining to reveal the basis of the plan, Bartlett said last night that it is not the "75-25" plan which evoked a storm of controversy among mayors of cities at a meeting Saturday. That plan allots federal funds on a basis of 75 per cent. for population and 25 per cent. for unemployment need.

Mayors of well-managed cities vigorously protested against the plan on the ground that it would penalize cities and towns that have been wisely managed during years of financial stress.

Red tape will be ignored today and tomorrow by officials of the civil works administration, state officials and officials of cities and towns in their efforts to get as many men to work as possible before Thanksgiving.

CITES EXPERIENCE WITH PUBLIC WORKS

NEW YORK, Nov. 20.—The only hope of relief for the unemployed through public work projects lies in nation-wide and simultaneous efforts on those lines, Gov. Ely of Massachusetts declared here tonight in an address before the New York state economic council.

The Governor recognized his duty to co-operate with all the force at his command with the federal public works program, but he cited his abandonment of a similar program in Massachusetts early in 1932 because of the futility of a single state acting alone to accomplish anything toward the ending of the depression.

He expressed apprehension at the prospects of keeping his native state in its present favorable financial position in view of the policy of the federal government to use all its agencies toward the expenditure of money. He predicted that the states along the eastern seaboard eventually would be compelled to foot the major portion of the expense of the nation-wide public works program although its benefits would be enjoyed more by other sections.

TASK OF ECONOMY

Mr. Ely discussed the Massachusetts administration of business affairs in considerable detail and told his audience that the task of enforcing economy was the result of nothing "but careful planning, cold analysis of figures and an utter disregard for political consequence—mostly the latter."

As an example of his success in disregarding political consequences he cited his personal experience in the city of Fall River over which he was forced in the second month of his administration in 1931 to place a finance commission.

In spite of the ruthless manner in which the commission went at its task of reducing municipal expenditures, he

Men employed on civil works projects will not work a staggered shift. They will work 30 hours each week at a minimum wage of 50 cents an hour for unskilled labor, and $1.20 an hour for skilled labor. This applies to single men and aliens as well as citizens. Men with a large number of dependents will receive the same amount of money as others with fewer, or no, dependents.

'LET'S GET GOING,' SAYS GOVERNOR

Nation Ready to Take on
2,000,000—Largest Undertaking of Kind

At least 3500 men drawing welfare aid will be employed today on civil works projects throughout the state, it was announced early this morning by the Massachusetts civil works board after it had approved projects totaling more than $1,000,000.

By tomorrow 20,000 men will be working, and perhaps 50,000 by the end of the week. Shortly after midnight, Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett sent a requisition to Washington for $1,600,000 to meet payrolls this week.

Yesterday's activities constituted a vivid demonstration of how speedily the processes of government can move under stress of emergency despite the tradition of red tape. Officialdom moved with a celerity usual only in the face of an impending national disaster.

Under the spur of pressing necessity, with an aroused and impatient citizenry demanding jobs, the more ponderous machinery of government was abandoned and a swifter procedure substituted. The idea of giving the most possible men jobs in the shortest time was paramount and was realized with astonishing suddenness.

When the board adjourned early this morning, to re-convene today at 2 P. M., the following projects had been approved:

CAMBRIDGE—880 men to work—allotted $294,302, of which the city will pay $55,700.50 for materials, for the reconstruction and widening of Concord avenue from the Alewife Brook parkway to the Belmont line, and for the grading and construction of a playground at Coffman's pit.

NEWTON—400 men—allotted $121,330 for filling and grading the Nevada street, Edmonds, Thompsonville, Cold Spring and Auburndale playgrounds and the Wellington lot.

WATERTOWN—105 men—allotted $15,200 for grading and filling Russell-Lowell school grounds, and constructing gravel sidewalks.

WORCESTER—500 men—allotted $106,000 on tentative approval for 12 street projects. Men will go to work today when full approval is given, contingent on city obtaining sufficient picks and shovels.

FALL RIVER—370 men—allotted $110,125 for sewer and drain construction.

GARDNER—135 men—$11,440.42 for grading hockey field, repairing Elm street fire station; constructing rural fire protection sumps; sewer work; building gravel road.

MASSACHUSETTS—State department of agriculture allotted $307,612 to hire 1260 unskilled and 300 skilled men, to further apple pest control work.

Other allotments made were: West

Hurley and William B. Coy, and their colleagues on the state emergency finance board, Theodore M. Waddell, director of the division of accounts in the taxation department, and Daniel H. Doherty, a retired businessman and banker.

ELY SOUNDS KEYNOTE

Gov. Ely, the first to speak, sounded the keynote "Let's get going." He told of President Roosevelt's desire to get men to work and urged the assembly to forget politics temporarily. He declared that red tape had been eliminated to provide work at once. "In this state we have 350,000 persons on the welfare lists, with 106,000 employable men," the Governor said. "Administrator Hopkins set 97,000 as the number to be put to work, but this is tentative. I hope a large number of them will be working by the end of the week."

"There are inequalities in this plan, and no doubt mistakes will be made. But don't place any technical difficulties in front of a national desire to get men to work. Bear with us, we intend to do our best. But keep in mind that speed is the essential element. We are geared to do something for the unemployed if you will co-operate. Massachusetts expects everyone to help."

Chairman Bartlett, known to many of the government heads as chairman of the emergency finance board, was next. In clear, simple language he explained the civil works plan to place 2,000,000 now drawing welfare aid to work by Dec. 1, and 2,000,000 men not drawing such aid to work by Dec. 15. "Massachusetts will possibly have 97,000 men to employ and possibly $12,000,000 to allot," he said.

PROCEDURE TO FOLLOW

Local chairmen of public welfare boards will be named civil works administrators for their districts, he explained. Projects will be submitted to them, and if approved sent to the state board and the money allotted. Later, answering a question, Chairman Bartlett indicated that if local politics swayed the judgment of the local civil works administrator into disapproving projects "there will be a new administrator appointed."

"The board is willing to work into the night to carry the program through," he continued, "but we do not intend to be rushed off our feet. You've got to do something that can be completed by Feb. 15, when the civil works plan will be dropped, according to present plans. All projects must have day labor, and not contract."

"Men will work no more than 30 hours a week, except for administrative and supervising forces. No person under 16 can be hired. The men shall be paid a just and reasonable wage, and the maximum human labor will be used. The minimum wages in this zone are 50 cents an hour for unskilled labor, and $1.20 an hour for skilled labor."

"On road projects the wages paid shall be those paid by the state under the national recovery act. You can rest assured there will be money available to pay for projects started Tuesday or Wednesday. We expect money by Saturday night, but if necessary we will use funds of the emergency finance board."

ANSWERS QUESTIONS

Then Chairman Bartlett offered to answer questions. One of the first to accept was State Senator Joseph A. Langone of the North End, who began a speech, was checked by Bartlett, and finally inquired whether the civil works money could be used to hire additional nurses in municipal hospitals where there is urgent need for them.

The chairman said a survey would be made for that purpose. Langone continued to talk, but a chorus of "Sit down, keep quiet" and similar remarks caused him to whirl and shout that as a member of the Senate he had a vote which might be helpful to the cities and towns some day. He left the auditorium amid jeers.

Mayor George J. Bates of Salem asked whether a contribution by the community from its welfare fund was a pre-requisite to obtaining money. He was told it was not, but every city or town which had its program approved last night was asked to make such a contribution, although not ordered to do so.

Answering a question by Mayor Mahoney of Worcester, Chairman Bartlett said that oral approval would be given for small projects, if found necessary. Maps and plans will be needed only to "let us know what is on your mind." To

JUDGE KILLED BY REDS

The first reported death in disorder attending the election was in rioting in Seville. Judge Juan Alonso was said to have been killed and another man badly wounded when about 20 communists opened fire on a group of Rightists. There were several other clashes in the district and numerous injuries.

Breaking of election urns (ballot boxes) was widely reported. More than 20 in the city and province of Seville were reported smashed, and three in Madrid. At Seville, Rightist leaders charged Radical Republicans with breaking them to prevent a Rightist victory.

Barcelona reported two or three regiments of soldiers were being closely watched by guards, fearing a movement among the Leftist non-commissioned officers and soldiers. ## SIX DEATHS IN ELECTION DISORDER

MADRID, Nov. 19 (AP)—In Spain's first federal election under the new constitution, marked by widespread disorders and at least six deaths, the result swung sharply to the right today in an avalanche of votes which indicated a complete change in the political complexion of the country.

Late tonight a cabinet meeting was called in the office of Premier Martinez Barrios following insistent rumors that a dangerous leftist movement was planned in retaliation for a decisive rightist victory.

It was reported the cabinet was considering urgent measures against a military plot. It was learned in reliable quarters that troops in Madrid, Barcelona, Seville and other sections were being held in readiness for emergency and the closest surveillance was being maintained.

In the first national election open to Spanish women, the swing toward conservatism was credited in some measures to the 12,000,000 men and women of Spain who had the right to vote electors of the second republic, which convened December 2. The first congress, recently dissolved, was for the purpose of drawing up a constitution.

Although returns were not complete at midnight, reports from provincial centers and an unofficial count in Madrid left little doubt of a widespread leftist defeat.

There were specific and persistent rumors that a prominent Socialist had been approached by leftist elements of the army and other sectors to head an uprising toward a dictatorship to counteract the rightist power demonstrated in the elections.

The first reported death in disorder attending the election was in rioting in Seville. Judge Juan Alonso was said to have been killed and another man badly wounded when about 20 communists opened fire on a group of Rightists.

There were several other clashes in the district and numerous injuries.

The most violent disorders were at Bilbao, where five were reported killed in two clashes. Three Socialists were said to be among the casualties, but this was denied, a correspondent reporting they had been severely wounded.

One was killed and three injured in an election clash at Valencia and another killed at the village of Ferrera. At Gallarta, near Bilbao, a priest, Jose Urbondo, was reported fatally wounded by Socialists who tried to prevent him from casting his ballot. The priest took a pistol from an assailant and although shot in the abdomen, insisted on voting before being taken to the hospital.

Two more were reported killed in a clash at Castro Urdiales, between Bilbao and Santander. Nationalists were said to have poured a volley of shots into Socialist quarters. There were other unconfirmed reports of deaths in scattered localities.

In Madrid, the capital, a crowd attempted to smash an unidentified market central plaza. The men escaped into the ministry of public works, where they were rescued by guards and arrested.

TO STRESS NEED OF SPEED

After the civil works board confers with the Governor this morning officials of cities and towns of the state will be called into the conference.

Bartlett will outline to city and town officials their duties under the plan of allotment. He will stress the need of speed in the inauguration of the program so every man possible will be taken off public welfare rolls before the middle of December.

So rapid is the progress of civil works plans in this state that it is likely that 50,000 men will draw wages in cash next Saturday. These men will be heads of families who have been on the public welfare rolls.

From the manner in which the civil works board labored all day yesterday it was apparent that Bartlett had been instructed from Washington last week that it is imperative to have the plan in operation this week.

So bright was the prospect of the execution of the civil works program last night that it appeared that Christmas, 1933, will be a brighter holiday for thousands of Massachusetts men than it has been for four years.

In an effort to prevent a rush to public welfare rolls, by men under the impression that those receiving city or town charity will be given preference in the program, civil works officials announced last night that the only qualification for work will be the fact that a man is unemployed and that he has dependents.

The initial effort will attempt to include the heads of families, thus putting about 50,000 men to work. Single men and women will then be taken care of as speedily as possible.

"Any head of a family who is able to work and refuses to work under this program will be put in jail for non-support," Bartlett said last night.

The majority of men, however," he said, "are eager to get to work and get off the public welfare list, which most of them dislike very much because of its implications of charity."

In Boston, alone, 3500 men will be employed. The men will include workers from every branch of industry from "white collar" workers to men used to doing the rough work which will be the order of the day for the majority.

said, the people eventually appreciated the necessity of it and showed their approval by votes. He said he carried Fall River by 2500 in 1930 before the commission was installed and by 7500 in 1932 after it had acted for nearly two years.

He said in part:
Having engineered Massachusetts into a favorable financial position, I am now tremendously disturbed as to the method of keeping that position for the coming year. How can you economize when every agency of the federal government seems devoted to the spending of money? It is my duty to give the fullest co-operation to the federal public works program, and see to it that men are put to work in Massachusetts by this means.

GAVE IT UP IN 1932
I adopted a public works program in 1931 for unemployment

but abandoned it in 1932 because one state acting alone could not accomplish anything. The only hope from public works lies in the universal and simultaneous effort of the whole country. And in any event, the eastern seaboard will pay a very much larger percentage of the total cost than it can ever receive of the total expenditure.

We shall endeavor, however, to apply for funds for the construction of only those projects which are, or may become within a year or so, essential to the well-being of Massachusetts and her citizens, having in mind as well the selection of work which does not materially increase the maintenance cost thereafter.

Civil Works Laborers To Have 30-Hour Week

Men employed on civil works projects will not work a staggered shift. They will work 30 hours each week at a minimum wage of 50 cents an hour for unskilled labor, and $1.20 an hour for skilled labor. This applies to single men and aliens as well as citizens. Men with a large number of dependents will receive the same amount of money as others with fewer, or no, dependents. Record Nov 21

700 MEN IN QUINCY START WORK TODAY

Seven hundred men on the Quincy welfare rolls will go to work tomorrow as a result of $200,200 allotment by the Civil Works Administration. The money will be used for school and street repairs and park construction. Expenditures will be under the supervision of Roland G. Broberg, welfare commissioner.

HISTORY-MAKING SESSION

During a history-making special meeting of mayors, selectmen and welfare agents at the State House yesterday, Mr. Bartlett announced allotments of 37 cities of $7,645,000 out of the estimated $12,000,000 fund for this state.

At the same time the civil works administration in Washington disclosed that it hoped to have 1,000,000 men on its payrolls by the end of this week and that it was prepared to pay 2,000,000 should they be recruited by that time.

Harry A. Hopkins, the administrator, said the task would be the largest single disbursing operation ever attempted by the federal government. He said the veterans' bureau had arranged to hand checks to every person on the civil works payroll Saturday without fail.

VARIOUS PROJECTS

The Massachusetts board began considering various projects submitted to it directly after the end of the session and continued until 10:30 o'clock last night. During the day thousands of met stormed the civil service department at the State House, necessitating the calling of state troopers, and welfare departments and employment bureaus throughout the state in the erroneous belief that jobs were to be had for the asking.

Four hours after Mayor John C. Mahoney of Worcester had dramatically appeared his program down on a table before the civil works board at the special meeting, it was returned with tentative approval of 13 street projects to cost $106,000 and the employment of 500 men. A few minutes later full approval of a program offered by Mayor Charles H. Slowe of Lowell to employ 400 men at a cost of $80,000 was granted. Work will begin today in both cities.

Last night in Boston City Hall, as in city and town halls throughout the state, department heads and city leaders were filling out application forms for submission to the civil works board today.

Boston has been tentatively allotted $2,533,500. Mayor Curley, at the close of a conference with department heads, said that his program would need $2,500,000 and would employ from 8000 to 10,000. There are 22,000 heads of families on the Boston welfare list.

Out of the unique special meeting loomed the figure of Chairman Bartlett. For hours he stood and answered the questions of confused leaders regarding the civil works program with such clearness that he was roundly cheered when the meeting adjourned and the gathering enthusiastically approved a resolution thanking him for his efforts.

The start of the special meeting was not quite so joyous. Unemployed men, many of them in hand-me-down clothes, stormed the civil service department and took over the Gardner auditorium in which was to be held the special meeting called by Gov. Ely and Chairman Bartlett to explain the plan under which 4,000,000 men, 2,000,000 now on welfare lists and 2,000,000 not on the list, are to be re-employed by Dec. 15 by the expenditure of $400,000,000 set aside by President Roosevelt.

State troopers were hurried to the civil service department to prevent trouble, while at the same time Boston police went to City Hall as 500 job-seekers thronged the building, many seeking voting certificates as evidence of their eligibility for work.

Fully 100 men went directly to the office of Gov. Ely and sought executive influence to obtain work. All left their names. About 150 applied to Miss Luberta Clause, secretary of the civil works board.

At the state employment bureau, 169 Congress street, hundreds jammed the office and steps leading to the office, overwhelming the small office force. A large crowd milled outside. In Lowell two men were slightly injured when the job-seekers stormed City Hall. Scenes of this sort were duplicated in every large community in the state.

Additional hundreds filled the Gardner auditorium and pre-empted the seats reserved for mayors, selectmen and welfare agents. State troopers ejected these persons, many of whom were state legislators. State department heads were among those forced to stand up, and did so willingly. Mayor Curley was a late arrival.

John T. Scully, Massachusetts federal relief administrator, presided. Seated at the center desk were the members of the civil works board. Chairman Mahoney of Worcester, State Treasurer Charles F.

ELY SOUNDS KEYNOTE

Gov. Ely, the first to speak, sounded the keynote "Let's get going." He told of President Roosevelt's desire to get men to work and urged the assembly to forget politics temporarily. He declared that red tape had been eliminated to provide work at once.

"In this state we have 350,000 persons on the welfare lists, with 106,000 employable men," the Governor said. "Administrator Hopkins set 97,000 as the number to be put to work, but this is tentative. I hope a large number of them will be working by the end of the week."

"There are inequalities in this plan, and no doubt mistakes will be made. But don't place any technical difficulties in front of a national desire to get men to work. Bear with us, we intend to do our best. But keep in mind that speed is the essential element. We are geared to do something for the unemployed if you will co-operate. Massachusetts expects everyone to help."

Chairman Bartlett, known to many of the government heads as chairman of the emergency finance board, was next. In clear, simple language he explained the civil works plan to place 2,000,000 now drawing welfare aid to work by Dec. 1, and 2,000,000 men not drawing such aid to work by Dec. 15. "Massachusetts will possibly have 97,000 men to employ and possibly $12,000,000 to allot," he said.

PROCEDURE TO FOLLOW

Local chairmen of public welfare boards will be named civil works administrators for their districts, he explained. Projects will be submitted to them, and if approved sent to the state board and the money allotted. Later, after answering a question, Chairman Bartlett indicated that if local politics swayed the judgment of the local civil works administrator into disapproving projects "there will be a new administrator appointed."

"The board is willing to work into the night to carry the program through," he continued, "but we do not intend to be rushed off our feet. You've got to have something that can be completed by Feb. 15, when the civil works plan will be dropped, according to present plans. All projects must have day labor, and not contract."

"Men will work no more than 30 hours a week, except for administrative and supervising forces. No person under 16 can be hired. The men shall be paid a just and reasonable wage, and the maximum human labor will be used. The minimum wages in this zone are 50 cents an hour for unskilled labor, and $1.20 an hour for skilled labor."

"On road projects the wages paid shall be those paid by the state under the national recovery act. You can rest assured there will be money available to pay for projects started Tuesday or Wednesday. We expect money by Saturday night, but if necessary we will use funds of the emergency finance board."

ANSWERS QUESTIONS

Then Chairman Bartlett offered to answer questions. One of the first to accept was State Senator Joseph A. Langone of the North End, who began a speech, was checked by Bartlett, and finally inquired whether the civil works money could be used to hire additional nurses in municipal hospitals where there is urgent need for them.

The chairman said a survey would be made for that purpose. Langone continued to talk, but a chorus of "Sit down" kept quiet and similar remarks caused him to whirl and shout that as a member of the Senate he had a vote which might be helpful to the cities and towns some day. He left the auditorium amid jeers.

Mayor George J. Bates of Salem asked whether a contribution by the community from its welfare fund was a pre-requisite to obtaining money. He was told it was not, but every city or town which had its program approved last night was asked to make such a contribution, although not ordered to do so.

Answering a question by Mayor Mahoney of Worcester, Chairman Bartlett said that oral approval would be given for small projects, if found necessary. Maps and plans will be needed only to let us know what is on your mind." To

White Collar Men, Women, to Have Jobs

State and City Making Provisions for Handling These Classes

Million Checks Here Saturday

Newly Employed Will Not Have to Wait for Pay

Dr. Payson Smith, State commissioner of education; Dr. Arthur W. Gilbert, State commissioner of agriculture, and Mayor James M. Curley of Boston today simultaneously revealed plans for putting white collar workers back into the ranks of the employed.

Women are also included in the provisions for emergency work although there is no specific allotment of funds for them, or any enumeration of jobs on which they could be employed. Mrs. Lois Rantoul, who has been connected with the Trade Union League, has been appointed director of women's activities within the Federal emergency relief administration. The appointment was made by John F. Scully, State director of emergency relief, and Mrs. Rantoul entered upon her duties today at 15 Ashburton place. She will establish contact with all agencies in the State interested in creation of employment for women. Her office will become a clearing house for women looking for work.

Dr. Smith said that he was working on two plans through which he hopes to be able to provide employment for between 1200 and 1500 of the "white collar class" under the civil works program. The commissioner was not prepared to make public the details of the plans but expected to do so within two days. He had been making arrangements under the old public works program for benefiting unemployed teachers on the welfare lists before the new civil works program was inaugurated.

Dr. Gilbert announced after a conference with county agricultural agents at the State House that 1500 men to be employed in thirteen counties of the State would begin work tomorrow on apple pest control.

control under an appropriation of $307,612 approved by the Civil Works Board.

It is planned to employ 1260 unskilled workmen and 300 skilled workers and under the department's plan ninety per cent of the appropriation will be spent for labor.

The unskilled workmen will receive fifty cents an hour and the skilled labor $1.20 per hour. The meeting of the county agents was called by Commissioner Gilbert to acquaint them with the plans and to speed the work, which will consist principally of the destruction of wild apple, wild cherry and other nuisance trees surrounding commercial orchards.

The commissioner's office is preparing an employment schedule for each city and town with half the unskilled workers employed to be taken from the welfare lists. Town foremen, who will be paid seventy-five cents per hour, may be selected from persons not receiving welfare aid. A supervisor for each county would be appointed by the commissioner on nomination of the county agents. Towns in which there are no commercial orchards would be authorized under the plan to furnish workmen to other nearby communities if they were needed. Suffolk County is the only county in the State in which the work will not be carried on.

Part of Mayor Curley's program for the repair of public buildings is expected to aid white collar workers and skilled artisans. They will find employment, particularly in the repairing of the Boston Public Library, in finishing the block system for the assessing department and in installing a new card system at the library. The assessing department will have 200 architects, engineers and draughtsmen for the block system, now two-thirds finished.

A special squad of police was called to maintain order at Cambridge City Hall today when the crowd of applicants for jobs under the C. W. A. became too large to be handled by officials there. About 500 men had gathered in the basement. Police formed them in two lines, filling the corridor and extending 150 feet into the back yard.

Million Pay Checks

One million pay checks for use in Massachusetts in connection with the new civil works program are in process of preparation and will be in Boston before the end of the week so that the men and women who get jobs this week under the new plan may draw their pay on Saturday—or within a day or two afterward on whatever is selected as the weekly pay-day.

The Civil Works Board, which was in session until midnight making allocations of funds to the various cities and towns, and approving their work projects, will meet again this afternoon and continue in session till midnight again, if necessary, to expedite arrangements so work may start at once in every community where the local authorities are ready.

Some cities had the plans so well advanced that they could begin work this morning; others report that they will be ready tomorrow. Before the end of the week thousands of men and women will have been transferred from the relief list to the civil works list and will be earning their own bread. The workers themselves are as much aroused over the prospects as are the public officials who in their own communities are responsible for the care of the unemployed, to give them work or food and shelter. Thousands of unemployed in Boston were up early this morning and reported at the places where they expected to get orders to go to work.

Herbert H. Barraclough, disbursing officer in Boston of the United States Veterans' Bureau will be in charge of the payments out of the Federal fund. He will be the sole authority here on the handling of the fund, but will have no actual cash in Boston. On his requisition to Washington a fund will be placed to the credit of Massachusetts, and he will issue checks against this fund. A million blank Civil Works Administration checks are being printed for use in Massachusetts, so that every worker will be paid by check each week, for about eleven weeks, if work is provided that long.

To assist him in the issuance and distribution of the checks Mr. Barraclough will have an assistant disbursing officer in every city and town where there is a job. In most places the city or town treasurer will be designated to serve in that capacity, and they will be notified by telephone or telegraph today to come to Boston tomorrow for a meeting with Mr. Barraclough, and perhaps members of the Civil Works Board, at the State House. This meeting will be held at noon, and Mr. Barraclough will explain the payment system to the assistant disbursing officers, all of whom will be bonded in amounts from $5000 to $25,000, according to the size of their emergency payrolls. Every check will be signed by Mr. Barraclough and by the local disbursing officer, and will be issued to the name of the worker.

Most of the money is to go for labor, and as little as possible for material; but whatever material must be used will be paid for out of the same Federal fund, by Mr. Barraclough.

Mayor Charles A. Ross of Quincy pointed out today that there are 3000 unemployed in his city, so that the $200,000 thus far allotted to Quincy out of the civil works fund will not go very far. But work will begin at once. Tomorrow 150 men will be put to work on parks and playgrounds, to improve them. By the end of the week 300 to 400 will be at work, and within ten days about 700 men will be given jobs. The disbursing officer for the city will be Roland Broberg, the welfare commissioner.

Mayor J. Fred Manning of Lynn applied to the Civil Works Board today for funds to pay 900 men who are at work repairing roads, improving the parks and working on public buildings in return for welfare assistance. Lynn has been tentatively allotted $329,400 under the civil works program.

Other applications received today were from Stoneham for $29,000 for the laying of water pipes, providing for 32,000 man-hours of work; Foxboro, $2800 to provide 1800 man-hours on forest and road improvements; Stoughton, $20,000 to provide 6700 hours of work on sewers and various small projects.

129,260 ORDERED TO WORK AT ONCE

Hopkins Pushes Nationwide
Civil Work Projects

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22 (AP)—Immediate employment of 129,260 men on hundreds of federal projects throughout the country was ordered late today by Harry L. Hopkins, civil works administrator.

Included is a group of 15,000 engineers who will be assigned to the coast and geodetic survey of the commerce department. Twelve thousand five hundred clerks to do clerical and research work for the United States re-employment service also are included.

These two groups constitute the largest number of skilled workers yet affected by the civil works plan which became effective a week ago.

Others to be employed include: Indian affairs projects on 113 reservations in 23 states, 4000; southern tick eradication campaign, 12,000; District of Columbia park development 700; rural sanitation and malaria control under the public health service, 60,768; work on army post tents and stations and at national cemeteries, 25,000.

These are the first of the half million men Hopkins has announced he will employ on federal projects. Last week he allotted 1,500,000 jobs to the states and territories, the men to be taken from work relief and destitution relief rolls.

Hopkins prepared for a payroll for 1,000,000 or more men by Saturday although he said they could not estimate how many would be working by then.

The civil works administration is being financed with federal relief funds, state, city and county relief funds and an allotment of $400,000,000 from public works money. The plan calls for employment of 4,000,000 men by Dec. 15, the first 2,000,000 to be taken from work relief and destitution rolls.

The national re-employment service, operated by the United States employment service of the labor department, has been deluged with applications. Hopkins today directed that 12,500 per-

REGISTRATION IN LOCAL DISTRICTS

Registration of residents outside of Boston for work under the Civil Works projects will be conducted in their own communities within a few days, according to announcement by M. C. McCartin, director of the State Employment Service. Registration of Boston residents will be continued at the South Armory, in Irvington street. This is for persons not on the welfare rolls or soldier relief.

BY JOHN GRIFFIN

A radical change in the interpretation of the Civil Works Board, announced yesterday, will mean that thousands of unemployed who are not on welfare lists will be put back to work in the cities and towns of the State under the civil works programme. Until yesterday, when instructions were received from Washington, the board handling the programme in Massachusetts had operated on the theory that the workers must be taken off the welfare and soldiers' relief rolls until Dec. 1.

The interpretation authorized last night, however, calls for half of the workers to be taken from those unemployed, but not on the welfare lists. This doesn't mean, according to officials of the board, that cities which have already started men to work under these projects, must replace half of them with other unemployed men. In hiring more men, however, the 50-50 ratio must be maintained.

Some of the projects throughout the State are: Point of Pines bridge; carpenter shop, power plant, male employees' building and employees' and officers' building at the Boston State Hospital; laundry building at Westborough State Hospital; boilers and stack at Tewksbury State Infirmary; boiler plant alterations at Grafton State Hospital; development of dining hall and kitchen at Westboro State Hospital; three dormitories at Norfolk State Prison Colony; fire prevention at Tewksbury State Infirmary.

Power plant at Northampton State Hospital; storehouse and cold storage at Monson State Hospital; dining and service building at Northampton State Hospital; State troopers barracks (already mentioned); kitchen, etc., at State Teachers' College, Framingham; electrical distribution cables at Metropolitan State Hospital, Waltham; wings, medical and surgical building, same hospital; steam and electric systems, library and men's dormitory at Massachusetts State College, Amherst.

Some 300 women will be employed in the library work, Mayor Curley explained, and provisions for the employment of white-collar workers are in the block assessing item. In that project, the Mayor explained, 300 engineers will be employed, while the city planning board will use 100 engineers. In all there will be jobs for at least 1000 white-collar workers, Mayor Curley estimated, in the event that his applications are all approved.

May Start Tomorrow

Commissioner Long informed the board that the first workers in his department will start by tomorrow, or by Monday at the latest. The work will include completion of the West Roxbury golf course, and grading, drainage, etc.

Chairman Bartlett warned Mayor Curley that if the price for materials contained in the applications are above prevailing market prices, the money will be withheld by the government. The Mayor's reply was, "Our purchasing department is a competent organization and you need have no apprehension."

On the grounds that the alleys are private ways, the board refused one of the Mayor's applications for $144,000 for the surfacing of the alleys. Mayor Curley announced his intention of asking the City Council to take over the alleys as public ways, in order that the grant may be obtained.

Dr. Payson Smith, State commissioner of education; Dr. Arthur W. Gilbert, State commissioner of agriculture, and Mayor James M. Curley of Boston today simultaneously revealed plans for putting white collar workers back into the ranks of the employed.

Women are also included in the provisions for emergency work although there is no specific allotment of funds for them, or any enumeration of jobs on which they could be employed. ## White Collar Men, Women, to Have Jobs trol under an appropriation of $307,612, approved by the Civil Works Board. It is planned to employ 1500 unskilled workmen and 300 skilled workers and under the department's plan ninety per cent of the appropriation will be spent for labor.

The unskilled workmen will receive fifty cents an hour and the skilled labor $1.20 per hour. The meeting of the county agents was called by Commissioner Gilbert to acquaint them with the plans and to speed the work, which will consist principally of the destruction of wild apple, wild cherry and other nuisance trees surrounding commercial orchards.

The commissioner's office is preparing an employment schedule for each city and town with half the unskilled workers employed to do the work and the other half to be paid. Town foremen, who will be paid seventy-five cents per hour, may be selected from persons not receiving welfare aid. A supervisor for each county would be appointed by the commissioner on the nomination of the county agents. Towns in which there are no commercial orchards would be authorized under the plan to furnish workmen to other nearby communities if they were needed. Suffolk County is the only county in the State in which the work will not be carried on.

Part of Mayor Curley's program for the repair of public buildings is expected to aid white collar workers and skilled artisans. They will find employment, particularly in the repairing of the Boston Public Library, in finishing the block system for the assessing department and in installing a new card system at the library. The assessing department will have 200 architects, engineers and draughtsmen for the block system, now two-thirds finished.

A special guard of police was called today when the crowd of applicants for jobs under the C. W. A. became too large to be handled by officials there. About 600 men had gathered in the basement. Police formed them in two lines, filling the corridor and extending 150 feet into the back yard.

Million Pay Checks

One million pay checks for use in Massachusetts in connection with the new civil works program are in process of preparation and will be in Boston before the end of the week so that men and women who get jobs this week under the new plan may draw their pay on Saturday—or within a day or two afterward if whatever is selected as the weekly pay-day.

The Civil Works Board, which was in session until midnight making allocations of funds to the various cities and towns, and approving their works projects, will meet again this afternoon and continue in session till midnight again, if necessary, to expedite arrangements so work may start at once in every community where the local authorities are ready.

Some cities had the plans so well advanced that they could begin work this morning; others report that they will be ready tomorrow. Before the end of the week thousands of men and women will have been transferred from the relief list to the civil works list and will be earning their own bread and will be earning themselves as much as much as the public officials who in their own communities are responsible for the care of the unemployed, to give them work or shelter. Thousands of unemployed in Boston were up early this morning and reported at the places where they expected to get orders to go to work.

Herbert H. Barracough, disbursing officer in Boston of the United States Veterans' Bureau will be in charge of the payments out of the Federal fund. He will be the sole authority here on the handling of the fund, but will have no actual cash in Boston. On his requisition to Washington a fund will be placed to the credit of Massachusetts, and he will issue checks against this fund. A million blank Civil Works Administration checks are being printed for use in Massachusetts, so that every worker will be paid by check each week, for about eleven weeks, if work is provided that long.

To assist him in the issuance and distribution of the checks Mr. Barracough will have an assistant disbursing officer in every city and town where there is a job. In most places the city or town treasurer will be designated to serve in that capacity, and they will be notified by telephone or telegraph today to come to Boston tomorrow for a meeting with Mr. Barracough, and perhaps members of the Civil Works Board, at the State House. This meeting will be held at noon, and Mr. Barracough will explain the payment system to the assistant disbursing officers, all of whom will be bonded in amounts from $5000 to $25,000, according to the size of their emergency payrolls. Every check will be signed by Mr. Barracough and by the local disbursing officer, and will be issued to the name of the worker.

Most of the money is to go for labor, and as little as possible for material; but whatever material must be used will be paid for out of the same Federal fund, or Mr. Barracough.

Mayor Charles A. Ross of Quincy pointed out today that there are 5000 unemployed in his city, so that the $200,000 thus far allotted to Quincy out of the civil works fund will not go very far. But work will begin at once. Tomorrow 150 men will be put to work on parks and playgrounds, to improve them. By the end of the week 300 to 400 will be at work, and within ten days about 700 men will be given jobs. The disbursing officer for the city will be Roland Broberg, the welfare commissioner.

Mayor J. Fred Manning of Lynn applied to the Civil Works Board today for funds to pay 900 men who are at work repairing roads, improving the parks and working on public buildings in return for welfare assistance. Lynn has been tentatively allotted $329,400 under the civil works program.

Other applications received today were from Stoneham for $29,000 for the laying of water pipes, providing for 32,000 man-hours of work; Foxboro, $2800 to provide 1800 man-hours on forest and road improvements; Stoughton, $20,000 to provide 6700 hours of work on sewers and various small projects.

129,260 ORDERED TO WORK AT ONCE

Hopkins Pushes Nationwide Civil Work Projects

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22 (AP)—Immediate employment of 129,260 men on hundreds of federal projects throughout the country was ordered late today by Harry L. Hopkins, civil works administrator.

Included is a group of 15,000 engineers who will be assigned to the coast and geologic survey of the commerce department. Twelve thousand, five hundred clerks to do clerical and research work for the United States re-employment service also are included.

These two groups constitute the largest number of skilled workers yet affected by the civil works plan which became effective a week ago.

Others to be employed include: Indian affairs projects on 113 reservations in 23 states, 4000; southern tick eradication campaign, 12,000; District of Columbia park development, 700; rural sanitation and malaria control under the public health service, 60,766; work on army post tents and stations and at national cemeteries, 25,000.

These are the first of the half-million men Hopkins has announced he will employ on federal projects. Last week he allotted 1,500,000 jobs to the states and territories, the men to be taken from work relief and destitution relief rolls.

Hopkins prepared for a payroll for 1,000,000 or more men by Saturday although he said they could not estimate how many would be working by then.

The civil works administration is being financed with federal relief funds, state, city and county relief funds and an allotment of $400,000,000 from public works money. The plan calls for employment of 4,000,000 men by Dec. 15, the first 2,000,000 to be taken from work relief and destitution rolls.

The national re-employment service, operated by the United States employment service of the labor department, has been deluged with applications. Hopkins today directed that 12,500 per-

Approve More Jobs to Put 6000 at Work

After the interpretation was received from Washington in a telephone conversation, the board sent telegrams to all the local civic works administrators in the cities and towns, informing them of the decision. The telegraphic message was: "On all projects approved to date and hereafter to be approved, 50 per cent of the employable number of men shall be taken from welfare and soldiers' relief rolls; the other 50 from United States employment agencies as soon as the agencies can furnish the persons."

The announcement clears up a situation which had been the cause of much worry by unemployed persons who were not on relief rolls. It means that as fast as the United States employment agencies, which will be set up in many cities and towns, and which are operating now in some places, can certify the men, they will be put to work and not be forced to wait until Dec. 1, as previously understood.

Approve Jobs for 7000

In Boston, according to the interpretation of the board officials, it means that half of the approximately 3000 who are scheduled to start to work in a few days, must be unemployed who are not on either the welfare or the soldiers' relief rolls.

This development was outstanding in a busy day in which the fast pace set by the board was maintained, and even increased. Sitting all day and until midnight last night, the board, composed of Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett, State Treasurer Charles F. Wither and William B. Coy, approved projects of more than a score of cities and towns, calling for the expenditure of $1,700,000 and the employment of upwards of nearly 7000 men.

Working Men Getting Aid

The day's grist also produced the first instance of discovery that men on welfare rolls were actually employed on other jobs. This was revealed in Newton, where several welfare recipients admitted that they could not take jobs because they already have jobs unknown to the welfare authorities. Immediate steps were taken by welfare officials to drop the men from the welfare lists, and investigation of their alleged fraudulent acts will be started.

Another interesting revelation was that there is at least one town which may not ask for any of the money allotted to it for the civil works. Frederick Gaskins, chairman of the board of selectmen of Milton, stated that whether or not that town will seek an allotment will be decided at a meeting of the selectmen tonight. Gaskins said a few days ago that the number of welfare recipients in that town was small and was constantly being cut down.

Cambridge in Full Swing

All through the State yesterday the jobless were going back to work and others without jobs were storming the service agencies and municipal offices to get their names down on the lists of eligibles. Today other cities will swing into action with their projects. The army of jobless was on the march toward work, and optimism was running high throughout the State.

Cambridge and Springfield led the way, the University City being out in front with 500 men going to work. The programme in that city was in full swing. Charles L. McMenimen, local CWA administrator, announced that 700 men started in the morning with 700 men and others were added to the payroll as fast as they reported at the City Hall. The approved projects on which work was being done were the widening of Concord avenue from the Alewife Brook parkway to the Belmont line, and the grading of Cofran's Pit.

Cambridge is also prepared to add to the working forces as soon as other projects are approved.

$775,328 for Hub

The big item of the day was, of course, the Boston projects involving the expenditure of $775,328 and contemplating the employment of 2866 men and women. In addition to the total of the projects approved for Boston, the board tentatively approved several others to the amount of $140,881, in which several hundred additional workers will be used.

The projects approved were: $55,742 for laying water pipes, to employ 250 men; $270,617 for grading 102 streets and installing surface drains, 800 men; $278,007 for park department improvements, 1455 men; $96,400 for assessing block survey, 200 men; $48,355 for cataloging books in libraries, 120 workers; $16,200 for painting libraries, 37 men; $8807 for cleaning library books, 45 workers; $3000 for special cataloging of picture collections in libraries, 10 workers. The tentative approval was for projects for repairs to public buildings and bridges and the cleaning of brooks.

Jobs for 10,000 Here

Mayor Curley, after being asked by Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett, declared that the city will contribute $400,000, which will be part of the city's share of the quarterly federal relief grant, and the Mayor urged that other cities and towns take similar action.

The Mayor informed the board that the city is not in a position to employ as many as 10,000 men and women under the civil works programme. He promised that 10,000 will be employed, 5000 to come from the welfare lists and 5000 from the unemployed not on welfare rolls.

The board turned down several items on the ground that the figures presented were not definite enough, also some of the data, particularly that relating to painting jobs and purchases and prices. Park Commissioner Long stepped forward with the data for his department, and Chairman Bartlett, looking at the material, said: "That's the way we want to see them."

Whereupon, Mayor Curley complimented Commissioner Long, labelling him as the most competent official ever connected with the city government. He added that Chairman Bartlett would not have been so much as police and stations at Framingham, Concord, Hyannis, Shelburne Falls, Topsfield, Athol or Westminister, Reading and Falmouth or Falmouth, and work at the State College at Amherst.

List of Projects

Some of the projects throughout the State are: Point of Pines bridge; carpenter shop, power plant, male employees' building and employees' officers' building at the Boston State Hospital; laundry building at Westborough State Hospital; boilers and stack at Tewksbury State Infirmary; boiler plant alterations at Grafton State Hospital; development of dining hall and kitchen at Westboro State Hospital; three dormitories at Norfolk State Prison Colony; fire prevention at Tewksbury State Infirmary.

Power plant at Northampton State Hospital; storeroom and cold storage at Monson State Hospital; dining and service building at Northampton State Hospital; State troopers barracks (already mentioned); kitchen, etc., at State Teachers' College, Framingham; electrical distribution cables at Metropolitan State Hospital, Waltham; wings, medical and surgical building, same hospital; steam and electric systems, library and men's dormitory at Massachusetts State College, Amherst.

Varied Jobs

Storage for artillery transportation at Natick; sewer beds at Monson State Hospital; sand filter beds at Lakeville State Sanatorium; sewer beds and drain at Rutland State Sanatorium; sand filter beds at Westfield State Sanatorium; highway, Arlington, Belmont, Lexington-Lincoln; fire protection at Massachusetts Reformatory, West Concord; storehouse, Gardner State Colony; widening State highway, North Andover and Lawrence; laboratory and mortuary building, Boston State Hospital; nurses' home, tunnel to assembly buildings and vegetable storage building, Westboro State Hospital, and storage barn and bunks at State Prison Colony, Norfol-

Some of the municipal projects include sewerage treatment plant at Marlboro; street construction at Salem; water filtration plant, Newburyport; water supply system, Paxton; street improvements, Worcester; highway and sewer construction, Springfield; sewer improvements, North Adams; surface water drains, Brookline; water main extension, North Andover, and municipal light building, Belmont.

$11,112,860 MORE

Public Works Projects for This State Involving This Expenditure Approved in Washington—No Time Limit on This Work

A report received from Washington by the Massachusetts State Recovery Board revealed that appropriation of $11,112,860 for Massachusetts for public works has been approved. Other projects entailing an estimated expenditure of $6,992,300 are still pending approval. If approval is given, there will be left some $4,000,000 available for Massachusetts' public works projects. The work on the public works projects carries no time limit, as does the Civil Works projects. Both State and municipal projects are included in those approved at Washington. Among the State projects which have received approval are a headquarters for State holes" in the park department statement. The chairman replied that he had no desire to punch holes in any application, but that the city must undergo the same examination as other municipalities.

Some 300 women will be employed in the library work, Mayor Curley explained, and provisions for the employment of white-collar workers are in the block assessing item. In that project the Mayor explained, 300 engineers will be employed, while the city planning board will use 100 engineers. In all there will be jobs for at least 1000 white-collar workers, Mayor Curley estimated, in the event that his applications are all approved.

May Start Tomorrow

Commissioner Long informed the board that the first workers in his department will start by tomorrow, or by Monday at the latest. The work will include completion of the West Roxbury golf course, and grading, drainage, etc.

Chairman Bartlett warned Mayor Curley that if the price for materials contained in the applications are above prevailing market prices, the money will be withheld by the government. The Mayor's reply was, "Our purchasing department is a competent organization and you need have no apprehension."

On the grounds that the alleys are private ways, the board refused one of the Mayor's applications for $144,000 for the surfacing of the alleys. Mayor Curley announced his intention of asking the City Council to take over the alleys as public ways, in order that the grant may be obtained.

HERE'S HOW NUMBER OF JOBS FOR THIS CITY WAS COMPUTED

Nov. 23, 1933

Arithmetic, But Size of Figures Makes It Hard—
Other Communities Figure Same Way

Try this on your arithmetic scholar. Just when Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State Civil Works Board learned from Washington yesterday afternoon that the basis of apportionment of the new Federal works was to be jobs, not money, the Boston officials were due with their first projects.

They had previously figured Boston's allotment of projects on a money basis, the city's quota of the $12,500,000 total for the State.

Mr. Bartlett explained: "We have to figure Boston's quota now on the basis of jobs. The State's job quota is 97,000 jobs. This is to be apportioned 75 percent on the basis of population and 25 percent on the basis of welfare load. I haven't had a chance to figure it out for Boston yet. Who's got a pencil and can figure?"

A lawyer, a Budget Commissioner, a welfare director and two private secretaries began to figure.

"What's the population of the State?" Bartlett asked a girl. She had to look it up. It was 4,250,000.

"What's Boston's population?"

"About 780,000," said Budget Commissioner Charles J. Fox.

"Well, put 780,000 over 4,250,000 and multiply by 75,000. That's three-quarters of 97,000, near enough."

"Now what's Boston's welfare load?"

"About 31,000," said Welfare Director Walter McCarthy.

"Well, take out the mother's aid and such permanent cases."

"Twenty-five thousand."

"All right. The figure for the state is 102,000. Put 25,000 over 102,000 and multiply by 24,000. That's one-quarter of 97,000. Near enough. You add the two and you get Boston's quota of the jobs we've got to figure on."

Pencils began to move. Clock hands ticked away 13 minutes. The problem was this:

$$\frac{780,000}{4,250,000} \times 72,000 + \frac{25,000}{102,000} \times 24,000 =$$

After 13 minutes, the budget commissioner said, "get 19,061."

"Well, I just did it rough. I got about 19,000," said lawyer Bartlett.

The secretaries said nothing. The welfare director was busy looking at his papers.

Incidentally, any other community can figure its quota of jobs by substituting its population for Boston's figure and its welfare load for Boston's in the above problem.

JOBS FOR 10,000 APPROVED OVER CURLEY'S VETO

City May Borrow from State, Says Bartlett, Passing $951,000 Projects

NOT ENOUGH WORK TO DO, MAYOR OBJECTS

Boston Unable to Add to Works Fund, Chairman
Is Told

State control of the 1934 Boston budget loomed last night as the Massachusetts civil works administration indicated that it will require Boston to borrow money from the state, if necessary, to put 10,000 men to work on civil works projects.

Should Boston borrow money, it must agree not to increase any item on the 1934 budget without the consent of the state emergency finance board, three members of which constitute the civil works board.

Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the civil works board, yesterday approved Boston projects totaling $951,000 to provide employment for 3241 men. Despite the protests of Mayor Curley that the city cannot find projects sufficient to put 10,000 men to work at once, Chairman Bartlett insisted that plans be drawn up with this purpose in view.

The board adjourned after midnight this morning, having approved a total of 101 projects submitted by various of the 366 cities and towns of the state. Chairman Bartlett explained that some applications had been rejected "because the expenditure for materials was too great in comparison with the employment to be furnished."

He pointed out also that complete details must be furnished to assure speedy action by the board, that some delay had been caused because essential and required information was lacking from the applications.

ISSUED BY BARTLETT

An important ruling was issued by Chairman Bartlett last night after he conferred by telephone with Washington officials. On all civil works projects in this state, whether approval has been given or not, jobs must be divided equally between those on welfare lists and unemployed men not on the welfare lists.

At the same time, it was learned today that the state itself will take a larger proportion of the estimated $12,500,000 civil works fund than first expected.

Among the large projects approved

Commr. Long then put in his park department budget which will use 1485 men at a cost of more than $315,000.

"That's fine, just what we want," said Mr. Bartlett, as he looked over the papers. "There's the detailed stuff." The park department projects were approved, and work will begin Monday according to Long. Requisition on the welfare department will be made, materials bought and work started by that time.

The public works department program was presented by Commrs. Fox and Carven. Construction of "loading platforms" in city yards was seized upon by Chairman Bartlett. He asked for an explanation and was told that instead of using a derrick and boom to load the water pipe onto trucks, a platform would be built so that the pipe could be transferred.

When Chairman Bartlett inquired about loading platforms in "suburban yards" but Carven quickly decided that the platforms in those yards were not necessary.

Mayor Curley explained that the city had made arrangements with ash contractors to supply ash for fills, and in this way the city would have between 25 and 50 tons of clean ash fill for projects.

The West Roxbury golf course was taken up. The park department wanted to irrigate the fairways. Mayor Curley declared that the city bought the land from Harvard for 2½ cents a foot, the state built a road and the land quadrupled in value. He asserted that the Franklin park golf links produced a $14,000 annual profit, and that the course charge at West Roxbury would be higher. "More expensive, but more exclusive," he chuckled. When the course is finished it will be one of the best in the world.

When Long had completed his testimony, Curley said: "If you are finished with Mr. Long he can leave and get things moving so that men can go to work."

Chairman Bartlett recalled Mr. Long and Curley continued: "You won't be able to punch a hole in what he says." "I don't want to punch a hole in anything, Mr. Mayor," Bartlett retorted. "We have to go on faith a lot right now."

Then, as it came to mind, Bartlett added:

All we can do is to roughly check your figures for materials with the market price. The veterans bureau, where the disbursing office is located, will pay the bills. But if we find that you are paying more than a fair market price for materials, why we just won't pay, that's all.

In the projects submitted was one to clean up 44 alleys in the city. Chairman Bartlett was inclined to disapprove, he said, when he found that the alleys were owned privately.

Mayor Curley then explained: For 25 years to my knowledge we have been talking about fixing up the alleys, some of which are disease breeders. But we do not think that the property owners, except in the Back Bay, can afford to pay the betterment tax.

In one block on Shawmut avenue in Roxbury we found that there was a greater percentage of deaths from tuberculosis than in any part of the city. We fixed the alley in which disease was breeding and the death rate fell.

We could quickly obtain the consent of the property owners to fixing the alleys.

Unsatisfied with this, Chairman Bartlett pressed to learn whether the city could take over the alleys, repair them, put in catch basins and pipes.

"We certainly can do that," Mayor Curley cried. "I'll have the orders introduced at a meeting of the city council Monday and passed under a suspension of the rules. The city will maintain the alleys after that."

Chairman Bartlett did not know whether he had authority to ask this be done, but agreed that unless instructed to the contrary he would approve the plan to clean up the alleys at a cost of $150,000 and to provide employment for 525 men.

The mayor explained that the fire department projects had been sent back for greater detail. He asked that the City Hospital projects be considered, but Chairman Bartlett pleaded that he had kept men waiting for several hours. The hospital projects involve $300,000. It was decided that Boston will be heard again Friday at 11 A. M.

Try this on your arithmetic scholar. Just when Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State Civil Works Board learned from Washington yesterday afternoon that the basis of apportionment of the new Federal works was to be jobs, not money, the Boston officials were due with their first projects.

city was willing to give office space, transportation and other things, but not money.

"Is that the right attitude for Boston?" asked Bartlett. "Can't you give something from your welfare and soldiers relief appropriations?"

"I doubt it," answered Fox. "Unless we'll be overboard in the welfare department by $400,000."

"Didn't Mayor Curley say at Washington he would give one-half as the city's contribution?" continued Bartlett.

"The mayor is an optimist," observed Commissioner Fox, dryly.

"Well, in a telephone conversation he said he would pay 10 per cent. and now we're down to nothing. I hate to think of Boston not contributing. Can't you give something?" Bartlett inquired.

In the pipe laying project the city is providing the pipe," Fox explained.

"Why can't you borrow money for this program?" Bartlett urged.

"Why can't you borrow money for this program?" Bartlett urged.

"The only way we can get money is to borrow, and it is against our policy," Fox said.

"Didn't you borrow under chapter 307?" the chairman inquired.

"We intended to ask power to borrow $400,000 for welfare and $100,000 for soldiers relief," Fox told him. "We held a meeting of department heads last week and found all the balances small."

"The mayor doesn't want to borrow?" Bartlett shot in.

"I didn't say that," quickly replied Fox. "We were considering it. Then we thought, with the CWA coming along, it would put men to work and remove the impending deficit."

Mayor Curley entered at this point. Chairman Bartlett explained that he did not like to recall the mayor's words about contributing part of the money, but he felt that Boston should make a "material contribution."

"Take 50 per cent. of the federal relief money we are to receive," the mayor proposed.

"You mean 50 per cent. of Boston's supposed share of the money?" Bartlett wanted to know.

"Yes, take 50 per cent. of it and put it in as Boston's share and I think that is a substantial contribution. It amounts to one-sixth of the Boston civil works funds if every city and town in the state did the same, it would help things a lot."

Theodore M. Waddell, director of the division of accounts in the taxation department and a member of the state emergency finance board, then sat down at the table.

Bartlett tried to elicit from Mayor Curley the amount the city would receive and the mayor said he had been unable to obtain the information at Washington. He "supposed" Gov. Ely had sent the state requisition several days ago.

"You could make a temporary loan," Bartlett pointed out.

"I could, but I don't think we ought to be required to do so," Curley snapped back.

The discussion then centered about the money the state would receive from the federal government, and all agreed that no definite word had been received. Then, told that Boston's allotment of 19,000 men for work had been worked out, Curley observed:

"I think that we will be doing well if we get 7000 to work. In the public works we have 7200 welfare recipients at work and they are only 30 per cent. efficient."

DISAPPROVES PROJECTS

Chairman Bartlett then disapproved several projects because the costs of materials was not stated on the application blank. Mayor Curley said that the city purchasing agent could give estimates of the cost, and the details supplied later.

"I don't want the details of every blooming thing, but I do think you ought to put in lumber, so many feet at so much a foot, so many gallons of paint at so much a gallon, and so on. In fact, I will require you to do so," Chairman Bartlett ruled.

Commr. Long then put in his park department budget which will use 1485 men at a cost of more than $315,000.

"That's fine, just what we want," said Mr. Bartlett, as he looked over the papers. "There's the detailed stuff."

The park department projects were approved, and work will begin Monday according to Long. Requisition on the welfare department will be made, materials bought and work started by that time.

The public works department program was presented by Commrs. Fox and Carven. Construction of "loading platforms" in city yards was seized upon by Chairman Bartlett. He asked for an explanation and was told that instead of using a derrick and boom to load the water pipe onto trucks, a platform would be built so that the pipe could be transferred.

When Chairman Bartlett inquired about loading platforms in "suburban yards" but Carven quickly decided that the platforms in those yards were not necessary.

Mayor Curley explained that the city had made arrangements with ash contractors to supply ash for fills, and in this way the city would have between 25 and 50 tons of clean ash fill for projects.

The West Roxbury golf course was taken up. The park department wanted to irrigate the fairways. Mayor Curley declared that the city bought the land from Harvard for 2 1/2 cents a foot, the state built a road and the land quadrupled in value. He asserted that the Franklin park golf links produced a $14,000 annual profit, and that the course charge at West Roxbury would be higher. "More expensive, but more exclusive," he chuckled. When the course is finished it will be one of the best in the world.

When Long had completed his testimony, Curley said: "If you are finished with Mr. Long he can leave and get things moving so that men can go to work."

Chairman Bartlett recalled Mr. Long and Curley continued: "You won't be able to punch a hole in what he says."

"I don't want to punch a hole in anything, Mr. Mayor," Bartlett retorted.

"We have to go on faith a lot right now."

Then, as it came to mind, Bartlett added:

All we can do is to roughly check your figures for materials with the market price. The veterans bureau, where the disbursing office is located, will pay the bills. But if we find that you are paying more than a fair market price for materials, why we just won't pay, that's all.

In the projects submitted was one to clean up 44 alleys in the city. Chairman Bartlett was inclined to disapprove, he said, when he found that the alleys were owned privately.

Mayor Curley then explained:

For 25 years, my knowledge we have been talking about fixing up the alleys, some of which are disease breeders. But we do not think that the property owners, except in the Back Bay, can afford to pay the betterment tax.

In one block on Shawmut avenue in Roxbury we found that there was a greater percentage of deaths from tuberculosis than in any part of the city. We fixed the alley in which disease was breeding and the death rate fell.

We could quickly obtain the consent of the property owners to fixing the alleys.

Unsatisfied with this, Chairman Bartlett pressed to learn whether the city could take over the alleys, repair them, put in catch basins and pipes.

"We certainly can do that," Mayor Curley cried. "I'll have the orders introduced at a meeting of the city council Monday and passed under a suspension of the rules. The city will maintain the alleys after that."

Chairman Bartlett did not know whether he had authority to ask this be done, but agreed that unless instructed to the contrary he would approve the plan to clean up the alleys at a cost of $150,000 and to provide employment for 525 men.

The mayor explained that the fire department projects had been sent back for greater detail. He asked that the City Hospital projects be considered, but Chairman Bartlett pleaded that he had kept men waiting for several hours. The hospital projects involve $300,000. It was decided that Boston will be heard again Friday at 11 A. M.

14 Projects at Total Cost of $2,286,826 Submitted by Lefavour to Gov. Ely

Herald 11-23-33

Fourteen projects totalling $2,286,826 were submitted by Chairman Henry Lefavour of the state emergency public works board to Gov. Ely last night for approval. To this sum must be added $540,000 for increases in costs of labor and materials under the NRA.

The projects, if approved by the Governor, must go to the federal finance board in this state, headed by former Gov. Alvan T. Fuller. After approval they will be sent to Washington to Secretary Ickes of the interior department and on the third approval the money will be allotted.

The projects follow:
1—Widening of route 20 in Charlton and Sturbridge, $133,800.
2—Fire protection (airic sprinklers) and new electric wiring at the Worcester State Hospital, $95,000.
3—Construction of a hydrotherapy building at Worcester State Hospital, $103,562.
4—Removal of the upper portion of the central tower at Concord reformatory, $22,600.

5—Construction of a hospital building, an infirmary building and one section of a nurses home at Taunton State Hospital, $804,368.
6—Install sprinklers at Taunton State Hospital, $17,440.
7—Power plant changes at Bedford State Hospital, $183,100.
8—Widening of state route 138 in Eastham, Raynham and Taunton, $241,700.
9—Supply building for state police barracks at Framingham, $34,879.
10—Sewer mains at Massachusetts hospital school at Canton, $60,589.
11—Mothers' cottage at women's reformatory at Framingham, $70,050.
12—Two generating units at state farm at Bridgewater, $38,368.
13—Install sanitation facilities at state farm at Bridgewater, $23,365.
14—Two industrial buildings at Norfolk prison colony, $399,999.
The list is the seventh of its kind submitted by the board and brings the total of its allotments to $15,400,000. Under the provisions of the law the state was granted $22,000,000 under the NRA. Another list is expected next week.

Dr. Quinby's Chief Work

Dr. Quinby was appointed last Summer to his employment post. It was expected that his chief immediate function would be to recruit men for the public works projects, which have failed to provide any work yet in this State.

Failing the development of the public works program, Dr. Quinby's chief problem for months has been to try to prevent unemployment from thinking that he had jobs to give out when he had none.

Now he has an unimagined avalanche of jobs and no organization to handle them. He had a field force of three on Tuesday and at that time had made no contact with local officials to seek any temporary arrangement for the registering local unemployed. He had agencies established in Boston, Worcester and Springfield. The Boston employment office has been deluged with men from all the suburbs, who found no arrangements for enrolling them in their own cities. Despite prominently displayed announcements daily in the newspapers that only Boston residents can be registered in the registration center at the South Armory, suburban unemployed continue to stand in line waiting for the only chance to register that they can find.

Telegrams Sent to Communities

Both yesterday and the day before Dr. Quinby sent telegrams to those communities which had secured approval of projects from the Civil Works Board the day before. He instructed those communities—28 in all up to last night—that he was taking steps to establish local registration for the 30 percent of men to be supplied by his service.

The 26 other communities which received approval of large projects yesterday with instructions that they must immediately divide the employment equally on all projects and give half the jobs to the men to be employed under Dr. Quinby, had, up to this morning, no communication from Dr. Quinby.

Many local officials were in the utmost confusion, faced with throngs of men seeking work and no means to deal with them or even anything to tell them.

At least one community under this pressure actually put men to work without authorization from anybody.

Local Registry Competent

The fact is that most communities in Massachusetts have lists of unemployed that have been very competently registered under unemployment committees or by public officials. These lists are at the disposal of Dr. Quinby and have been ever since President Roosevelt's announcement of his Civil Works program and the procedure for hiring men under it a week ago.

Some local officials that have gone to Dr. Quinby have secured immediate arrangements for enrolling men in their towns. No steps have been taken by Quinby's office to provide explicit instructions to all communities.

A prospect of relief from this impasse in job recruiting loomed today as word came from Washington that

WHERE HUB WOMEN MAY BE REGISTERED

Unemployed women of Boston who want to register for jobs under the Civil Works programme may do so at the office of the State Employment Service in the new Public Works building, 100 Nashua street, near the North Station. This applies to residents of Boston only. Women who have registered at the State Employment Service offices at Federal street and Congress street during the last two months need not register again, as their names are already on file.

Disbursing Officers Must Be Bonded

City and town treasurers who have been named local disbursing officers for the civil works administration must be bonded, William B. Coy, a member of the civil works board, declared yesterday.

Bona fide signatures of the treasurers must be sent to the State House for reference purposes, he added. Coy was named yesterday to handle the accounting end of the civil works administration.

Boston List of Projects Approved by Bartlett

Here are the Boston projects approved yesterday by Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the civil works administration:

$79,345.05 for laying water mains; to employ 250 men.

$59,003 for painting and repairing bridges; to employ 105 men.

$315,931.10 for park department improvements; to employ 1485 men.

$45,017.88 for cleaning brook courses; to employ 180 men.

$272,207.50 for grading 102 streets; to employ 800 men.

$51,830 to catalog library books; to employ 129 persons.

$17,000 for painting libraries; to employ 45 men.

$7132 for cleaning library books; to employ 45 persons.

$3200 for special cataloging; to employ 10 persons.

A total of $951,166.53 was allotted to Boston, to employ 3241 men.

THOUSANDS MORE FILE APPLICATIONS FOR JOBS

Globe Nov. 23, 1933

New Cheerfulness With News Those Not on Relief Lists Are Eligible For Work

Thousands of job seekers again crowded into the South Armory on Irvington at today placing their names on the Civil Works list with high hope of a job after Dec 1. There was a new cheerfulness among some of the men, born with the information that half the jobs would go to those not on relief lists, and only half to the men on soldiers' relief or welfare lists.

Although the pressure had let up by this morning, 46 clerks were kept busy receiving the applications, while about 3000 men lined the walls of the vast room, or waited patiently outside the doors. Applications were being accepted at a rate of 100 every 10 minutes, which means that by nightfall 1400 more names will have been added to those seeking employment.

The men were asked to show their certificates of residence in Boston, and to list their dependents, their former jobs, their education and the reason for losing their former jobs. Many of them carried themselves with the unmistakable erectness taught with military training, and they were requested to name any military service they had experienced. These men, who are not on any soldiers' relief list, but who have had military service, will receive preference when the jobs are handed out.

As the men filed in and out, many of them felt optimistic for the first time in years. Some have been out of work for as long as three years, and this is the first hope they have had for steady employment in months. Employment through the cold months to come looks mighty good to them.

Already the work of sorting these men out, and deciding which ones are most suited for the various jobs, has begun. Others are deciding which ones are the most in need of work. They cannot all have jobs.

Every effort will be made to place each man in the position for which he is most suited, but the officials point out that because their time is limited the task cannot be performed perfectly.

REFIGURING QUOTAS ON JOBS BASIS, NOT MONEY

Mayor Curley Will Present More Projects at Hearing Tomorrow to Aid Unemployed

Just how tremendous a challenge to administrative resourcefulness and imagination is involved in President Roosevelt's offer to finance 4,000,000 immediate jobs, municipal officials only began to realize today as they refigured their quotas on the basis of jobs instead of money.

At first the word had been that Massachusetts would have $12,000,000 for 97,000 jobs, to be completed by Feb 15, and the first half to come off welfare lists.

It was easy for many a city executive to figure on how to spend his share of the money, and the prospect of immediate unloading of the welfare lists onto a Federal payroll was alluring.

But now the Government says, "Forget about the money, figure the jobs you are entitled to and see that half of them go to the unemployed who have not gone on the welfare list."

Many officials see in this an implied pledge that the Government will furnish more money after this first $400,000,000 is used, if the jobs are found and work is started.

It took only a stroke of the pen for President Roosevelt to slice off this $400,000,000 from the vast $3,300,000,000 public works appropriation, which has as yet been only partially tapped for the more elaborate public works originally contemplated. It would require only another administrative act to take more money from the same source if the new civil works program provides quick jobs.

One very interesting project on which the Mayor counts to employ more than 500 men is the reclamation of the private alleys all over the city. This calls for $144,000.

Council Meeting Monday

Chairman Bartlett could not see his way to approve work on private alleys, but suggested that he might if Curley could find a way to take them over by the city. The Mayor declared he would have the City Council act on the matter Monday. He emphasized the public health aspect of the condition of the alleys. He plans draining and surfacing them.

Large schoolhouse and hospital repair projects are also to come up tomorrow. Fire and Police and Health Department projects have yet to be developed.

Putting the emphasis on the jobs

BOSTON QUOTA NEARLY FILLED

Listing for Civil Work to Be Pushed in Towns Fitzgerald, Bradford Also Will Authorize Projects

13,175 Men Provided For,
$4,088,127 Allotted

The highly geared job-making machinery of Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State Civil Works Board, which yesterday occupied a good part of the State House, has turned out a total list of approved projects amounting to $4,088,127 and calling for the employment of 13,175 men, since Monday, according to figures compiled by the board late yesterday afternoon.

This great amount of work has been achieved by conducting hearings which have started early in the morning and lasted until late into the hours of the night for the past four days. Yesterday the work was further hastened when John J. Fitzgerald, the State Board's engineer, and Robert F. Bradford, assistant secretary to Gov. Ely, who has been working on the civil works in Washington, were deputized to conduct hearings and pass judgment on proposed projects.

Lists Lag Behind Projects

This allowed four hearings to go on at once, with chairman Bartlett passing final judgment on controversial issues. State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley conducted the fourth session. The Governor's office and the Treasurer's office were both commandeered for the purpose.

The board yesterday approved 46 projects totalling $1,444,307, which will give work to 7350 men.

The only hitch apparent last night seemed to be employing half of the men outside welfare or soldiers' relief lists. This work is being done by the Federal Reemployment Service, directed by Dr. Robert S. Quinby, which has been working steadily in an attempt to set up local registration offices to enlist eligible men. So far this has not been able to keep up with the approved projects.

Chairman Bartlett intimated last night that some new plan will soon be introduced to register these men in the smaller towns. The officers in Boston and other large cities have been functioning well and have already registered thousands for jobs under C. W. A.

Boston List Nearly Filled

Thousands of jobs are still waiting for men to start work, and thousands of men are waiting to get at the jobs, but the process of connecting the two has not yet been fully worked out. The Boston branches under the direction of Everett Hanna, have been working steadily since Monday morning and reported last night that the greater part of Boston's unemployed not on welfare lists were signed up and ready to be applied to the work already allotted.

A ray of hope was entertained for speedy solution of the problem yesterday when word was received from Harry L. Hopkins, Civil Works Administrator in Washington, to staff Dr. Quinby's department with 400 men from the unemployed lists.

Chairman Bartlett stated last evening that $2,000,000 of the $12,000,000 allotted to the Commonwealth by the Federal Government in the drive to put men and women to work will be used on State projects. Gov. Ely asked that amount be apportioned for the State work.

clared in discussing what Boston projects would come up when Mayor Curley comes before the board at 11 o'clock this morning.

Having the emphasis placed on the jobs instead of the money will again be brought out this morning. On Wednesday Mayor Curley threw up his hands at the 19,000 jobs assigned as Boston's quota, and much interest has been aroused to see what projects he will propose this morning to take care of all these men, as he originally was counting on about 6100 jobs.

Will Not Let Jobs Go Begging

Even if all the local communities cannot fill up the quota allotted to Massachusetts by the Federal Government, Gov. Ely and Commissioner Bartlett will not let jobs go on begging with the Government ready to foot the payroll. Additional work will be given to the conservation and other State departments.

Thousands of men all over the State went to work yesterday in communities where projects have been approved. Most of the group were welfare men from local relief or soldiers' aid lists. Where only half the men required for a project have been recruited in a few days by the Federal Reemployment Service, local chairmen were assured.

Commissioner Bartlett was emphatic last night in announcing that the welfare rule striking any person's name off the lists who is offered work and declines it will be rigidly adhered to in the present C. W. A.

All workers who are placed on jobs by the new Civil Works Administration will be fully protected by the Government against loss by injuries, according to a telegram received from Harry L. Hopkins in Washington yesterday. In the telegram it was explicitly stated that any workers hurt while on the job will be adequately treated and come under the rules of the United States' Employees' Compensation Committee.

MUST STEP ON IT, SAYS HOPKINS

Doubts Work Delay Here Could Be Avoided

Federal Offices Cannot Place

Men Till Dec 1, Persons' View

Boston Globe
11-23-33
By CHARLES S. GROVES

WASHINGTON, Nov. 23.—Reports of delays, whether necessarily unavoidable or otherwise, in getting the unemployed in Massachusetts cities and towns off the relief rolls and at work on local projects brought the comment from Civil Works Administrator Harry L. Hopkins tonight that local officials would have to "step on it" to assure full participation in the $400,000,000 Federal allotment for emergency employment during the four winter months.

"Any State which delays in the Civil Works program will have its quota transferred to other States which are ready with their projects and where the cities and the towns and the State cooperate in the enterprise financially as well as in other ways," said Administrator Hopkins.

"Not in Picture Till Dec 1"

Mr. Hopkins communicated with civil relief authorities in Massachusetts and then stated that he doubted that whatever delay there might be in getting the local machinery running could have been avoided.

The suggestion that the Federal Reemployment Bureau in Boston is dilatory in enrolling unemployed for civil works projects brought from W. Frank Persons, director of the United States Employment Service, the statement that, until Dec. 1, the Federal Employment Service is out of the picture so far as "placing" men is concerned. "However, the reemployment office should be ready now to register applications for those who can be placed after the first of December," he continued.

The regulations under which the Civil Works Administration is operating provides that until Dec. 1 persons receiving relief either as work relief or direct relief are to be employed on civil works projects by "direct transference" from the relief office to civil works projects, according to Persons.

"Relief Transfer First"

The objective of the Civil Works Administration is the employment of 4,000,000 idle persons before Dec. 15. Two millions of these are to be taken off relief rolls by Dec. 1 and immediately transferred to civil works employment. The other 2,000,000, throughout the country, are to be placed at work on civil works projects, from applications made through the local employment agencies designated by the United States Employment Service.

Registration for these jobs is already underway, Mr. Persons said, but the Federal Reemployment Service cannot make any placements until after Dec. 1, when the time for transferring from the relief rolls has expired.

Rules on Transfers

The particular rules applying to the transfer of persons and work relief projects read as follows:

"Transfer of persons and work relief projects.

"It is contemplated that all persons on work-relief projects under way as of Nov. 16, 1933, in order to share in the funds available for civil works projects, are to be transferred between Nov. 16 and 19, 1933, to the Civil Works Administration.

"The objective of the Civil Works Administration is the employment of 4,000,000 persons by Dec. 15, 1933. Two millions of these persons receiving relief on Nov. 16, 1933, either as work-relief or direct relief, are to be employed on civil works projects by direct transference from the relief office to civil works projects on or before Dec. 1, 1933.

"On or after Dec. 1, or prior to this date, if the relief quota has been transferred and employed by the Civil Works Administration, all applications for employment will be made through the local employment agencies designated by the United States Employment Service, and placements will be made in accordance with preferences as set forth in Title II of the National Industrial Recovery act."

Where Unemployed Women May Register

Unemployed Boston women who desire to register for work in connection with the civil works program may do so at the office of the state employment service in the public works building, 100 Nashua street, near the North Station. This was announced yesterday by Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, director of CWA women's activities, who said that those who have registered in the last two months need not register this time as their cards are on file for work opportunities.

Disability Pay to Civil Works Employees

Metropolitan District Commission Grant Is Reduced $15,000

Employees of the Civil Works Administration who suffer injuries while in the performance of duties will be paid compensation during disability, and provided with medical attention, Harry L. Hopkins, Federal Relief Administrator, today informed Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State Civil Works Board.

In a telegram to Chairman Bartlett the administrator declared: "All employees of the civil works administration who suffer injuries while in the performance of duty will be paid compensation during disability and provided with medical attention under the conditions prescribed in the Federal compensation law of Sept. 7, 1916, and in accordance with the rules and regulations of the United States Employees Compensation Commission.

"You are hereby authorized to instruct all civil works administrations to pay Federal works employees during periods of disability resulting from accidental injuries in the performance of duty at a rate not to exceed sixty-six and two-thirds per cent of their regular weekly wage.

"No payment shall be made, however, for the first three days of disability. Pending receipt of copies which we will forward of this act and subsequent regulation you and the local administrations may utilize the local Post Office where copies of the act and regulations concerning duties of official superiors, and list of designated medical facilities are available.

The application which has been presented to the Civil Works Board by the Metropolitan District Commission seeking a grant of $215,000 to provide work for 1200 men was reduced to $200,000 by the board today.

William E. Whitaker, secretary of the District Commission, said that the amount allowed would provide work for 1100 men through Feb. 15. He said the new setup was a very good one for the community pay toward the expense of the district. It was stated that Boston will furnish about 50 per cent of the 1100 men.

The State Board today allotted $10,000 to the town of Wellesley to be used for swamp drainage in the section south of Worcester street. This project will provide work for sixty-one men. The tentative grant for Wellesley has been set at $25,000, and other projects are to be passed upon tomorrow.

FEDERAL AID IS APPROVED

Large Number of Public Works Jobs in State To Benefit

Herald 11-23-33

TOTAL PROJECTS OVER $11,000,000

Federal aid for a large number of non-federal public works projects in Massachusetts totalling $11,112,860, in addition to $308,700 for Newton schools and $45,000 for hospital improvements for Boston, announced yesterday, has been approved at Washington, according to information made public through the Massachusetts state recovery board.

Still other applications for aid for state and municipal projects in this state have been forwarded to Washington by the state advisory board of the public works administration. The total of these, including the $853,700 of the Newton and Boston items approved yesterday, bring the total of Massachusetts non-federal projects thus far applied for up to $18,105,000. If all these are granted there still will be approximately $4,000,000 of the $22,000,000 of public works funds allotted to Massachusetts still available for Massachusetts communities that are enterprising enough to try to obtain it.

FEDERAL ALLOTMENTS

The federal allotments do not always show the entire amount that will be spent, as in a number of cases cities and towns applied only for the federal grant, which the national government donates outright, to pay 33 per cent of the labor and materials cost, and of the municipality will raise the remainder, considerably increasing the amount of money that will be spent.

The state projects thus aided far outnumber those of municipalities. The commonwealth receives full loans and grants for building a troop headquarters for the state police at Framingham, to cost $72,000; state police stations costing $40,000 each at Concord, Hyannis, Shelburne Falls, Topsfield and Athol or Westminister and stations costing $41,000 each at Reading and either Norwell or Pembroke.

The State College at Amherst will benefit by steam and electric systems costing $121,000, a library costing $238,000, and a men's dormitory for $197,000. Some of the state projects are:

Point of Pines bridge, $1,400,000; Boston State Hospital, $2,421,000; male employees' building, $334,000; new officers' quarters building, $177,000; laboratory and mortuary building, $60,000; three dormitories at Norfolk state prison colony, $160,000; storage barn, $10,000, and installation of boilers, $47,000; North Andover state hospital, $240,000; ward building, $240,000; building and service building, $106,000; Westboro State Hospital, development of dining hall and kitchen, $237,000; nurses' home, $272,000; laundry building, $30,000; and vegetable storage building, $17,000; wines, medical and surgical buildings at Metropolitan State Hospital, Waltham, $842,000; Tewksbury State Ins. mat., $135,000; boiler plant alterations Grafton State Hospital, $132,000; Monson State Hospital, storehouse and cold storage, $112,000; sewer beds, $35,000; state highway, Arlington-Belmont-Lexington-Lincoln, $1,100,000; Metropolitan State Hospital, Waltham, electrical distribution cables $12,000; wines medical and surgical building, $642,000; storage for artillery transportation, at Natick, $114,000; storehouse Gardner state colony, $129,000; widening state highway North Andover-Lawrence, $45,000; kitchen, State Teachers' College, Framingham, $34,000; fire protection Massachusetts reformatory, West Concord, $33,000; sand filter beds at Lakeville state sanitarium, $9500; sand filter beds at West field state sanitarium, $10,500; sewer beds and drain, Rutland state sanitarium, $6000.

Among the municipal projects are: Marlboro sewerage treating plant, $25,000; Salem, street construction, $100,000; Newburyport, water filtration plant, grant only $24,300, total cost to be $81,000; Paxton water supply system, $85,000; Worcester street improvements, $478,607; Springfield sewer construction, $423,000; North Adams sewer improvements, $373,320; Brookline surface water drains, grant only $4230, total cost to be $14,350; North Andover water main extension, grant only $4500, total cost to be $15,000; Belmont municipal light building, grant only $6845, total cost to be $63,450.

WOMEN STORM WORK OFFICES MORE THAN 400 REGISTER

With 80 municipal projects before it, awaiting sanction, the Civil Works Board divided itself into three parts of equal authority today to speed up the program of creating 97,000 new jobs in Massachusetts by Dec. 15.

Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett gave State Treasurer Huxley and Engineer John J. Fitzgerald equal power with himself, each to authorize projects without consulting other members of the board.

Bartlett said some complaints had been received that on projects already under way there was "soldiering" on the job by the new employees. Where such complaints were heard he advised municipal authorities to discharge the worker just as in any other case.

In the event of such discharges affecting men put into jobs from welfare lists it was not made clear whether they would be restored to welfare, but presumably they will not be.

LONG EMPLOYEES 250

With 3362 jobs provided for in the Boston program partially sanctioned yesterday, actual jobs were passed out to about 250 men by Park Commissioner William P. Long today. Acting in accordance with the new ruling that jobs be equally divided between men on the welfare and men not on the welfare, Long drew 125 workers from the dole list and 125 from the registration list of the federal reemployment officer.

The board's new order was received with enthusiasm by new thousands registering at the South Armory as unemployed who have come through the depression so far without falling upon charity. Previously they had been disheartened.

A total of 2700 were registered there yesterday and today there was another huge throng extending for blocks from the Armory doors. To speed up registration, the number of clerks was doubled to 46.

400 WOMEN REGISTER

The first registration office exclusively for women was opened today on the ninth floor of the public works building in Nassau st. By 1 p. m. between 400 and 500 women had appeared to register with the dozen clerks on duty.

Most of these were young women, in the thirties, who have done office work. Many were well dressed, but admittedly without funds, and one girl, who gave the appearance of having stepped from a limousine, told of walking from her Roxbury home because she did not have carefare.

WOMEN PLACED

Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, director of the woman's division, announced today that several hundred women already had been placed in jobs. She has appointed prominent women to work with the municipal boards looking after women's interests. Among the first to accept was Mrs. Frederick Smith, Gov. Ely's sister, for Westfield; Mrs. Cornelia J. McMahon for Boston, Mrs. Carroll Chase for Cambridge, Mrs. William C. Atwater for Springfield and Mrs. Donald Richman for Williamstown.

Organized labor's criticism of the state board continued when Robert J. Watt, secretary of the Massachusetts Federation of Labor, complained to Bartlett that the "50-50 order" was "the bunk" because men outside Boston didn't even have a chance of registering before Dec. 1, let alone getting placed in jobs. Bartlett again replied that re-employment registrations would be set up everywhere.

National CWA Administrator Harry L. Hopkins notified Bartlett that all civil works employees injured at work shall receive free medical attention and two-thirds pay during disability, providing the disability lasts more than three days.

Mayor Curley, told yesterday by Bartlett that he was expected to provide work for 10,000, was studying the rest of his program today and figuring how he could do it on Boston's grant of $2,533,000 with which he had planned to provide about 6000 jobs.

Chairman Bartlett suggested double shifts, which Mayor Curley agreed could be used on some jobs, but not on others. Eventually however, the mayor promised that 10,000 will be employed, half from the welfare lists.

"I sincerely trust," he said today, "that the emergency finance board will approve the Huntington ave. subway project as that will make it possible to absorb 2000 on necessary work."

C.W.A. Cash Withheld, Lynn Crowd Rebels

100 Workers Spurn Grocery Orders, Demand Cash, Storm City Hall

One hundred men who on Tuesday were given work with five hundred others under the civil works administration plan in Lynn and who were today temporarily laid off, stormed Lynn City Hall this noon when cash payment for their two-days' work was not forthcoming. Miss Theresa Mannin, secretary and sister of Mayor Fred Manning, becoming alarmed, called police, who cleared city hall of the men.

The six hundred men were put to work on Tuesday morning and were promised payment of $15 a week in cash. Today the men were told that work would have to stop until the funds became available. They were also told that they could have orders on Lynn grocery stores, such as the welfare department has used in the past.

Angered because they were not given the money they felt they should be given, a crowd of between seventy-five and one hundred marched in a body to city hall. They demanded to see Mayor Manning. He was in conference with department heads at the time and refused to see the men or their spokesmen.

The crowd shouted and jeered. Twelve officers rushed to the hall and drove the men out, threatening them with arrest if they refused to go. The crowd left and a guard was placed at city hall for the remainder of the day.

10,000 JOBS DUE UNDER CWA

Curley Promises Two Shifts to Give All Work

While municipal officials were puzzling over changes in interpretations of the civil works board, the beat of marching feet rose to a crescendo today as thousands more men returned to work.

Increasing the previous fast pace, the board, in a sitting lasting until midnight, approved applications of more than a score of cities and towns calling for expenditure of $1,700,000 and providing employment for upwards of 7000 men.

EQUAL CHANCE FOR ALL

The most important of the changes in the rules was the announcement that unemployed whose names are not on welfare lists, shall have immediate equal opportunities with others.

Until receipt of instructions by telephone from Washington, local officials had proceeded on the theory that workers on emergency projects must be taken from the welfare and soldiers relief rolls until Dec. 1.

After the new interpretation was received, the board sent telegrams to all local civil works administrators, which read:

"On all projects approved to date and hereafter to be approved 50 per cent of the employable number of men shall be taken from welfare and soldiers' relief rolls; the other 50 from United States employment agencies as soon as the agencies can furnish the persons."

The interpretation was taken to mean that the government is determined to take care of thousands of unemployed whose pride has forbidden them to accept welfare aid.

WORK FOR 10,000 HERE

It was understood that no changes would have to be made where men are already at work, but that starting today jobs be evenly distributed.

The other ruling, that it will be necessary to refigure the federal allotment on the basis not of money, but of jobs, caused Mayor Curley to throw up his hands when it was called to his attention by Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the board.

The mayor, assuming the city was to be given $2,533,000, had estimated about 6000 jobs. He was told that he must provide for 10,000 and declared it could not be done, as it was more than the entire number of city employees.

Chairman Bartlett suggested double shifts, which Mayor Curley agreed could be used on some jobs, but not on others. Eventually however, the mayor promised that 10,000 will be employed, half from the welfare lists.

BOARD CUTS CITY SUM

He had previously received a disappointment when the board approved only $949,168 of the city of Boston projects, even after the mayor had spent the entire afternoon explaining the others. This cut down the immediate jobs provided for Boston to an estimate of 3362.

However the other projects are to come up again for consideration tomorrow, when the city officials have had an opportunity to be more specific about details that run into big money.

ELY ORDERS SPEED

Chairman Bartlett warned the mayor that if the price for materials contained in the applications are above prevailing market prices the money will be withheld by the government.

"Our purchasing department is a competent organization," the mayor replied, "and you need have no apprehension."

The revelation that municipalities must create work for all its unemployed, was a shock to city and town officials, presenting a hitherto unthought of problem.

It was learned that the Commonwealth will take a larger proportion of the estimated $12,000,000 civil works fund than first expected. Through the department of agriculture and the state reclamation board, it has been allotted in excess of $420,000. Chairman Bartlett conftrted with Gov. Ely and it was determined the Commonwealth would take a large part in speeding the process of getting men to work.

The chief executive of the state was apparently moved to this decision by the fact that some cities and towns are in a sense wasting money in their haste to put men to work. The state department projects will emphasize the element of permanency so that the state will derive lasting benefit.

15,000 AT WORK

The task of putting more men to work as rapidly as possible was speeded by the announcement of Federal Emergency Relief Administrator Robert W. Kelso that if Massachusetts does not fill the jobs by Dec. 15, the money will go to States that can. Already it was stated Pennsylvania has created 53,000 jobs.

Kelso praised the activity of the state civil works board, which was expected to push its job allotments even more swiftly through the remainder of the week. The board appeared to have passed the 15,000 mark, although no official figures were available.

FIRST MEN GET JOBS IN BOSTON

Boston Herald 11-23-33

Sent From Public Welfare to Park Department

The first of Boston's complement of men for work in the Civil Works program went on the payroll this morning. They were assigned from the Public Welfare to the Park Department in line with the Park Department program which was approved yesterday.

The golf course at Hyde Park drew 50 men, the Airport 65, and Franklin Field 12, and a group also went to Franklin Park.

The Civil Works administrator for Boston, Walter V. McCarthy, said that every effort was being made to draw the most deserving and most competent men from the welfare lists. Preference is being given to men with dependents. At the present time there does not appear to be much chance for the single man without dependents who is on the welfare rolls.

Mayor Curley is seriously considering the ultimatum of Commissioner Joseph Bartlett of the State Civil Works program that Boston supply work for 10,000 men. Mayor Curley's original plan called for 3000 men, which he planned to stretch to 6000.

Regarding the matter of work for 10,000 men, the Mayor today said that if the State Finance Board will approve his plans for a Huntington-av subway at a cost of $5,000,000 it will be possible to put 2000 men at work at once. The Mayor also said that the subway was necessary.

Unemployed to Be Registered Locally

Registration of residents outside Boston for employment on civil works projects will be conducted in their own communities shortly, it was announced yesterday by M. J. McCartin, director of the Massachusetts state employment service.
 This local registration makes it unnecessary to appear at the state employment office at 169 Congress street.
 Registration of Boston residents will continue at the South armory, Irvington street, Back Bay, where 40 registrars are registering applicants as fast as possible. Residents must bring proof of residence and citizenship. Ex-servicemen must bring their discharge papers.

MORE GRANTS TO BAY STATE

Newton and Other Places Benefit by Federal Allotments

BULLETIN (Latest)
 WASHINGTON, Nov. 24 (AP)—Mayor Charles A. Ross and City Auditor George H. Bonsall of Quincy, Mass., today urged public works officials to speed action on municipal public works projects involving $850,000.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 24 (AP)—The public works administration today allotted $5,082,200 for 38 non-federal projects in all parts of the country which officials said would provide 30,145 man months of quick direct employment.
 Twenty-six of the projects received grants of 30 per cent. of the cost of labor and materials, representing a gift of the federal government and the remainder as a loan to be repaid with interest at 4 per cent.
 Eleven of the allotments were for 30 per cent. of the cost of labor and material with the balance to be raised locally.

One allotment was a loan to a private corporation which was not eligible for a grant.

The allotments include:
 Massachusetts — Newton, loan and grant, school building, $148,800; Foxboro, loan and grant, buildings, $294,000; Belchertown, loan and grant, buildings, $98,000; Monson, loan and grant, steam lines, $100,000; Norfolk, loans and grants, building $146,000, boiler equipment $35,000; state of Massachusetts, loan and grant, dormitories at the Canton school for crippled children, $115,000.

Burlington, Vt.—Water system, $3200.
 Bridgeport, Ct.—Grant, sewers, $33,600.

Gains Also in District

On the projects approved for the Metropolitan District Commission men will be employed from the cities and towns in the district, Bartlett announced last night. The work will be assigned on the basis of the welfare loads and not on contributions to the expenses of the district. By this ruling Boston unemployed and welfare recipients will receive more jobs than under a contribution apportionment.

The Commissioner of Agriculture, Dr. Arthur W. Gilbert, who had already secured approval of more than $400,000 for cutting down old and diseased apple trees, yesterday obtained $300,000 more for the State Department of Agriculture to conduct an intensive program of improving rural conditions in behalf of public health.
 His program calls for placing 1064 men to work for 12 weeks. They will go into such varied work as fighting the white pine blister rust, whitewashing and repairing dairy farms and control of the corn borer.

Question of Payrolls

Officials of the Civil Works Board were not sure last night whether or not men already employed on projects would be able to receive pay at the end of this week. The State Board is prepared to approve payrolls, but members thought it unlikely that municipalities having projects underway would be able to submit them before the end of the week. Unless payrolls are so submitted, payments will be delayed until next week.

In regard to conversion of pay checks into cash, the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston yesterday announced that a telegram from President Roosevelt had been received, requesting all banks cooperate in the cashing of Government pay checks issued to workers by the Civil Works Administration at the end of this week.

"The Nation-wide civil works program which the Government launched in order to give men and women employment in place of relief, is now underway," the telegram read.

Calls Banks to Cash Promptly

"More than 1,000,000 employees of the Civil Works Administration will receive their first week's pay on Saturday, Nov. 25. They will be paid by checks drawn upon the Treasurer of the United States. To prevent delays in the payment of this initial week's wage, it is essential that our banks throughout the country cooperate to the fullest extent, cashing these checks as far upon proper identification."

"This identification will, in most cases, be an identification card given to the payee by the local Civil Works Administration."

"I urge bankers to communicate with the local C. W. A. to make certain that checks will be cashed promptly and in full."

Chairman Bartlett yesterday received permission from Washington to treat purchases of supplies and materials for civil works projects as emergency purchases. This authority will allow all municipalities to cut red tape still further and promote speedy awarding of bids.

Curley to Offer More Today

Under the emergency purchase plans local civil works heads can accept telephone bids from three reputable contractors and award the contract by telephone message. Letters, however, confirming the bids, would have to be submitted.

Mayor Curley and other Boston authorities will appear before the commission again this morning. Boston projects totaling an expenditure of approximately $750,000 have already been approved and the balance of its program amounts roughly to $1,000,000.
 "We will take up any and all projects offered," Chairman Bartlett declared.

Mayor Curley and Bartlett Plan Jobs For Unemployed PROSPECTS IN BOSTON DOUBLE

Federal Airport and Work on Strandway Included

A few moments of dramatic action doubled the job prospects for Boston's unemployed this morning.
 Mayor James M. Curley and State Civil Works Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett agreed upon extraordinary steps to assure more than 5000 additional jobs under the works program that the Government offers to finance.

State and Federal cooperation offered the Civil Works Administration and the city indicated that other thousands of men would be put to work on projects which will call for sidewalks along State highways and tremendous new aviation developments in the city of Boston.

Mayor's Assignment

It becomes Mayor Curley's assignment, by the compact entered into with Bartlett, to get authority from the City Council Monday to borrow $300,000 to contribute to the employment of 1500 men on the vast Strandway project, and then to go to Washington to confer with Commerce Department officials on a new Government airport for Boston.

The airport was suggested in wire offering cooperation in civil works by the aeronautics division of the Commerce Department this morning. Curley told Bartlett he had planned all ready for developing Governors Island as a Federal airport to use 5000 men.

To Washington Monday

"Can you go to Washington or tonight?" Bartlett asked.

The Mayor wanted a day or two to get his materials together and wanted to sit with the Council Monday personally to steer through the authorization to borrow $200,000 to materials on the Strandway.

They agreed the Mayor should go to Washington Monday night to take up the Government's aviation field offer. Bartlett made an appointment to have his own representative meet Curley in Washington.

"Ten o'clock Tuesday morning," Curley said.

Full Cooperation

Stretching his authority to a limit, Bartlett went along with Mayor in giving tentative approval to vast expenditures that he has previously been unwilling to accept. The Mayor on his part volunteered to borrow money to make a contribution, something which on Wednesday he had said he did not feel the city should be required to do.
 At the close of the swift, energetic hearing, Bartlett congratulated Mayor on the projects presented.
 "They are well thought out," he said.

Curley, who once this Fall left hearing before Bartlett, declaring he could get no justice there, this time patted the chairman on the shoulder when he left the State House to gather up his plans on the huge Governors Island project which has long been a Curley dream, but never till today held a promise of Federal cooperation.

For 2345 More Jobs

In a few minutes, Chairman Bartlett had definitely approved new projects brought in by the Mayor for 2345 more jobs, at a cost of $1,167,614.
 This, with the 2341 jobs approved Wednesday, brought Boston's accepted program to $2,116,780 for 5586 jobs.

Then Mayor Curley made an eloquent plea for reconsideration of his Strandway project. He realized it included large items for materials, but it was hard to find sound projects for thousands of men in a great city without running into materials costs.

"It is the largest single project the city could make," he urged. "It would put 1500 men to work. It is something the city will eventually have to do."

"I recognize you have got to have big projects to put 19,000 men to work here," Bartlett said.

Telegram On Airport

"We have got to approve some of these projects in some way to let you hire your quota of men," Bartlett said. "I have $1,600,000 left in my appropriation power," Curley said. "The Council has been on my neck to use it for three new municipal buildings in Dorchester and Charlestown, but I should have the right of way. I think I can get $300,000 to pay for the two miles of granite edges on this project."

"Can we know definitely if you can get it before we pass on it?" Bartlett asked.

"I'll get it. I'll be there myself," Curley assured him.

"I'm in sympathy with this. I think it's the sort of thing we've got to come to get these men to work," Bartlett said.

"We'll take it up Tuesday morning as soon as the Council acts on the loan. I don't pledge me to something I haven't seen."

Then out of a clear sky, Bartlett brought up the Federal Government's airport development.
 "Let me read you a telegram," he said.

It was to the Governor from the director of aeronautics of the Department of Commerce, E. L. Vidal. It read:

"Aeronautics branch of Department of Commerce is prepared to construct a national network of airports in cooperation with civil works administration. Sites must be owned or leased by State or municipality. Plan also includes improving existing inadequate fields. Civil Works Administration work must be under way in two weeks."

"Your cooperation by urging municipalities in your State to acquire and submit sites to aeronautics branch of Department of Commerce immediately is requested. Further request that you send a representative to Washington immediately to discuss program for your State."

Needed Day or Two

Curley immediately explained that the Boston airport had been filled out to within 100 feet of Governors Island and that he had several times urged the Federal Government to develop Governors Island as a national airport and complete the connection with the city airport.

"The Government could put 5000 men to work there under direct Government supervision," he said.

Bartlett asked: "Could you go to Washington on this tonight?"

Curley thought he needed a day or two to prepare. He suggested Monday night.

"This is a big thing," said the chairman. "Could you go yourself?"

"Yes, and take my department heads who have the details."

"You'll have time to give me an outline of it so I can send a representative who is familiar with it?"

"Yes, we'll give him everything."

"Say, get Joe Murray," Bartlett swung around to one of his clerical staff. "Tell him about this program."

Presently Bartlett's emergency assistant, Joe Murray, appeared and the Mayor and chairman and Murray got their heads together on the project.

Sidewalks on Highways

Early in the hearing, Mayor Curley suggested that if the Governor would have the Public Works Department build sidewalks along the State highways that would be a great protection to pedestrians and would create a huge number of jobs for city unemployed. "It's a devil of a job finding projects you can honestly propose to set thousands of men immediately to work in a city," the Mayor urged.

Bartlett thereupon revealed that he expects a project for sidewalks on the State highways to be presented.

"I have discussed it with the Governor and I believe he is in favor of it in large measure. I understand he is having it presented by the proper department."

"That will make one of the largest projects for employing men that could be undertaken," Curley said, "and it should be of an immense safety value to cut down deaths on the highways."

Curley described the Strandway as a two-mile boulevard with a plaza and granite steps leading down to the sea, at Wollaston Beach. He recognized that it called for more expense for materials than was desired in the civil works projects. But he felt that the city could take care of the bulk of the materials cost.

He revealed that he proposes later to submit under the larger public works program a $750,000 project to construct a solarium and bathing beach in connection with the Strandway that will give Boston a health reservoir such as no other city has at the present time."

Boston Figures

The new Boston projects which received final approval from the State board this morning were:

Item	Amount	Men
Public buildings repairs...	$336,000	450
Hospital improvements...	$28,450	338
Street work...	$75,000	900
Fire station improvements...	$5,370	75
Health department projects...	$16,800	42
Retirement board projects...	$475	10
Total today...	$1,167,614	2,345
Previously approved...	$949,166	2,241
Total...	$2,116,780	5,586

To these the Mayor tentatively adds:
 Item Amount Men
 For the Strandway...

Governors Island development... $1,000,000 5,000
 Retirement work will employ all women, checking their card system.

Fire Department projects call for painting the interiors of 22 firehouses. Public buildings work calls for repairs on 43 city and county buildings.

Nothing was said about the Strandway.
 The Mayor promised more projects by Tuesday. He declared he was up till midnight last night trying to develop works that would make jobs.

Curley to Ask $300,000 Loan for Strandway

Mayor Curley announced today that he will submit to the city council next Monday an order for a loan of $300,000 to be used for the development of the Strandway in South Boston. The mayor made the announcement during a hearing before Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State civil works board on the program submitted by the city for projects to be undertaken with funds provided by the Federal Government under the civil works administration.

Although all of the projects presented today were approved by Chairman Bartlett, no action was taken on the Strandway proposal. Mayor Curley said it would provide employment for about 1500 men in Boston.

The first project approved by Chairman Bartlett today was that covering repairs in forty-three city and county buildings involving an expenditure of $128,000 and providing employment for 224 men. Mayor Curley said this project would get underway as soon as the men and materials are obtained. He thought the repair work could be carried on for ten or fifteen per cent less than the regular contract price.

Upon receiving assurance that women would be employed on the project, Chairman Bartlett approved the expenditure of $2475 in checking the contents of cards in the Boston retirement system. The next project approved called for the expenditure of $35,218 in painting the interior of twenty-two fire stations, providing work for seventy-six men.

Chairman Bartlett approved a project of involving an expenditure of $327,339.75 for hospital repairs. It is proposed to put 553 men to work on this undertaking. Urging this project, Mayor Curley said building repairs of all kinds have been neglected in all municipalities "in order to conserve funds for welfare use." If funds were not supplied under the Civil Works Administration, the mayor said, the repairs would have to be neglected further.

For the repair of schoolhouses, Chairman Bartlett approved an expenditure of $315,000 in order to furnish work for 450 men. The next project approved was that calling for an expenditure of $270,537 in repainting and constructing streets and public alleys to provide work for 900 men.

At this point the mayor suggested the construction of sidewalks along all State highways as an advisable civil works undertaking for the Commonwealth. "Such a proposal," Mayor Curley declared, "would be in the interests of public safety and would furnish employment to hundreds of men." Chairman Bartlett informed the mayor that he has discussed the matter with Governor Ely and that the chief executive hopes to have some State department take up the matter.

For repairs to buildings controlled by the city health department the board approved the expenditure of $14,400 to furnish work for forty-three men.

A proposal of the police commissioner that $37,224 be spent to employ eighty-four men in making repairs on the headquarters building and a number of station houses, was also approved by Chairman Bartlett. Before passing on this project the chairman inquired if the mayor and the police commissioner were in accord with the project. "We are," Mayor Curley replied, "and I guess it is the only thing we are in accord on."

The only other projects submitted by the mayor and approved by Chairman Bartlett today were those calling for the expenditure of $682,249 for repairs on ferry piers to employ 100 men, and $36,307 for the cleaning of brook channels. This latter work would provide employment for 20 men.

JOBS FOR BOSTON MEN NOT ON WELFARE LIST; $201,902 FOR DAIRIES

GILBERT TO HIRE 1063 TO CLEAN BARN IN STATE

Metropolitan Board Will Get $215,000 to Hire
1080 of City's Idle

AWARDS TO DATE TO EMPLOY 13,175

Large Share of $12,000,000 Grant to Be Sought for

A major share of jobs on civil works projects undertaken by the metropolitan district commission will be given to unemployed residents of Boston not on the welfare list, it was announced last night by Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts civil works board. The announcement came after a conference between Chairman Bartlett and Davis B. Keniston chairman of the metropolitan district commission, during which the commission was allotted $215,000 to hire 1080 men for work in Greater Boston.

The pressing problem of how to take care of Boston's unemployed was thus partly solved by Bartlett, who ruled that if Keniston wanted to allot more than the usual share of jobs to Boston residents he would not object. Also, it indicated that the state itself will seek a large share of the estimated $12,000,000 fund. Gov. Ely feels that the state should take at least $2,000,000, the chairman said.

An important project which will affect every dairy farmer in the state and result in better quality milk for the Massachusetts consumer, was approved by Chairman Bartlett. He awarded the state department of agriculture $201,902 to hire 1063 men to spray, clean and whitewash dairy barns throughout the state.

HARD PRESSED FARMERS
Commissioner Arthur W. Gilbert of the agriculture department said that hard-pressed farmers could not comply with health regulations and were being barred from the Massachusetts market.

With the barns cleaned, the regulations would be complied with and the farmer, with better milk, would be allowed to sell in Massachusetts markets. A check of the figures yesterday revealed that the state civil works board, which has been in existence just a week, has awarded in three days a total of $4,088,137 to provide work for 13,175 men throughout the state.

Yesterday, Chairman Bartlett deputized Robert F. Bradford, assistant secretary to Gov. Ely, and John J. Fitzgerald, engineer to the board, to assist him and State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley in passing on applications. Working at top speed, the four men passed on a large number of projects, among which were:

WELLESLEY—60 men—$10,000 to drain South swamp.
ATLEBORO—122 men—$20,381 for highways and rail removal.
BELMONT—160 men—$27,784 for sewer work.

NEEDHAM—95 men—$18,076 for ditches and ditches.
WINCHESTER—94 men—$32,600 for mosquito control work.

BROOKTON—112 men—$17,704 for drainage and park work.

This speed has been matched by William B. Coy, a member of the civil works board, who has been assigned to handle the accounting end of the civil works administration. From nothing he has created an organization which, he announced yesterday, will be able to put out pay checks tomorrow if necessary.

Today at 11 A. M. the additional projects to be submitted by Boston will be presented to Mr. Bartlett. To date Boston has had projects totalling $951,000 approved to provide employment for 3241 men. The city has been allotted $2,500,000 tentatively, and it is expected that Mayor Curley will present the new projects to use up the rest of the money.

A question of considerable importance to the cities and towns was settled yesterday by the chairman, when he ruled that purchases of supplies for civil works projects will be considered "emergency purchases." He added that city and town purchasing agents must obtain three bids on any one commodity from reputable firms, and one can be accepted orally over the telephone.

When bills for payment are presented, the telephoned bids must also go in the records. Only the lowest bid will be accepted, and even there the special disbursing agent will check the price paid against the "fair market price" and if the materials cost more the civil works board will refuse to pay.

What some considered a "drive to oust dose grafters," but which Chairman Bartlett termed a "statement on what the law means," was presented yesterday when the chairman told applicants for civil works funds to insist that able-bodied welfare recipients be forced to work. Those who refuse to work will automatically, under a state law, be dropped from the welfare list. In Boston Walter V. McCarthy, executive director of the welfare department, said he would take legal action against such men. Mayor Mahoney of Worcester has said that he will charge such men with non-support of their families.

Mayor Mahoney had a long conference yesterday with Chairman Bartlett. He was told he would be given money to put 4000 men to work in his city, 2000 from the welfare and 2000 unemployed not on the welfare. While Bartlett approved all of the $710,000 program brought in by the mayor as absolutely worthy he felt that Worcester should be restricted to its allotment of $448,000. Ralph G. Lacey, Worcester engineer, will sit down with the chairman today to eliminate some of the projects. Within a week 2000 men will be at work in Worcester, mostly on street projects.

Late in the afternoon Chairman Bartlett announced that the board can pay one-half the cost of materials. Previously the board had tried to get the cities and towns to bear this expense as a fair contribution to the success of the civil works program, but this could not be done in every case. The cost of the materials, however, will be closely checked by the board.

UNION QUESTION

The highly controversial union question was thrust into the foreground during a conference between Chairman Bartlett and James T. Moriarty, president of the Massachusetts branch of the American Federation of Labor and Alfred Ellis, Jr., president of the Boston Building Trades Council.

Moriarty wanted Bartlett to issue an order giving union men preference on civil works projects. He held that the act which created the public works fund—from which the civil works fund of $400,000,000 was drawn by President Roosevelt as an emergency move to create employment—provided that contractors were to obtain union workers from the unions, and, upon failure of the unions to assign men within 24 hours, then get the men elsewhere.

"The act provided that union men were to be given the preference," said Moriarty. "We have told our men not to register for civil works jobs, because we felt the act safeguarded them. We feel that the city or town engaged in a project is a 'contractor' within the terms of the law, and union men should be given preference."

Chairman Bartlett replied that he had nothing to do with the assigning of men, and that the federal re-employment service would have to decide the question. He referred the union leaders to Col. W. S. Quinby, who is head of the service in Boston. Moriarty and Ellis intend to see Quinby and if they cannot obtain his approval for a union preference will endeavor to bring the matter to the attention of authorities at Washington. Atty.-Gen. Homer Cummings has ruled in favor of union men, they contended, and as the money comes from the same fund the ruling should apply.

Yesterday, Mr. Coy completed his organization to handle the financial end of the civil works program. He designated city and town treasurers as assistant disbursing officers who will be limited to making payments for payrolls and for non-personal services. There are 1,000,000 blank checks ready for distribution, so that there will be no delay in paying out the money.

All expenditures in cities and towns will be certified by the civil works certifying agent, who will be the chairman of the welfare board for the community. This will be true generally but changes will be made in certain cases.

The disbursing officers will be bonded and the state board has arranged to bond the men for $5000 each, lowest sum obtainable, with one company. This will expedite matters considerably, it was said. Checks will be made out in triplicate, one for the payee, one for the state civil works board, and the third for the office of H. H. Barraclough, special disbursing agent of the board. Mr. Barraclough is the disbursing officer of the Boston office of the veterans' administration.

While Chairman Bartlett and the other men passing on civil works projects were urging the community leaders to set aside sums for "white collar" workers, particularly women, Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, who was appointed head of the women's division of the CWA for this state, made her first appointment.

She named Mrs. Cornelia G. McMahon of Brighton as director of the Boston unit of her organization. Mrs. McMahon is a member of the board of welfare commissioners of Boston, and recently was a candidate for the Boston school committee. Later, Mrs. Carol L. Chase of Cambridge was named to a similar post in that city.

Boston department heads conferred to a late hour last night working on civil works projects cheered by the thought that the first batch of men engaged on civil projects in the city had begun working earlier in the day at the Hyde Park golf course, Franklin Park, Franklin field, and the East Boston airport.

Mayor Curley, who was asked to plan on 5,000 jobs in Boston to be divided among welfare recipients and those unemployed not on welfare rolls, said yesterday he thought it could be done, but felt that the money allotted to Boston, $2,500,000, was not sufficient. Events yesterday led observers to believe that all the $890,000 which the federal relief administration will give Boston for welfare expenditures would be tagged for the Boston contribution to the civil works program. Mayor Curley holds that half the sum is a sufficient contribution for the city.

TO DO WORK FOR DAIRY FARMERS

Civil Works Board Grants $201,902 to Clean Up Barns---Other Big Projects Pass Muster

MORE APPLICANTS AND MORE JOBS!
Here they are, pouring into the South Armory by the thousands, filling out applications for jobs in the new emergency public works plan. The scene above shows the men at a long table, making out the blanks.

BY JOHN GRIFFIN
Dairy farmers throughout the State will be greatly benefited by a civil works grant to the State department of agriculture yesterday, calling for the expenditure of $201,902 for the cleansing and spraying of dairy barns in every city and town. This, together with a grant of more than $200,000 to the Metropolitan District Commission, which will provide jobs for many Boston men, was the outstanding development of the day in connection with the civil works programme.

At the close of the day, a total of $4,088,127 had been allotted to the cities and towns of the State, calling for the employment of 13,175 men and women. Since the civil works board only started to function Monday, the progress made was considered remarkable, and constituted more than one-third of the total possible allotment to this State. At least $2,000,000 of the remainder will go for State projects, it was decided.

Arms Work

Applications, the board split up into sections. State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley conducted one, Chairman Bartlett another. The board engineer, John J. Fitzgerald, and Robert F. Bradford, assistant secretary to Governor Ely, assisted in the work of examining applications.

Chairman Bartlett announced that at 1 o'clock this morning he will continue the hearing which was given Mayor Curley Wednesday. The board has approved applications of Boston to the amount of $775,000, and there is more than $1,000,000 in projects yet to be discussed.

Compensation Order

Assurance that employees under the Civil Works administration will be protected by the workmen's compensation laws was given in a telegram from Harry L. Hopkins, federal relief administrator. "All employees of the Civil Works administration who suffer injuries while in the performance of duty will be paid compensation during disability," Hopkins telegraphed, and provided with medical attention under the conditions prescribed in the federal compensation law of Sept. 7, 1918, and in accordance with the rules and regulations of the United States Employees Compensation Commission.

"You are hereby authorized to instruct all Civil Works administrations to pay Civil Works employees during periods of disability resulting from accidental injury in the performance of duty at a rate not to exceed 66-2/3 per cent of their regular weekly wage. No payment shall be made, however, for the first three days of disability."

Several appointments were announced by Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, director of the women's division of the Civil Works Board. Mrs. Cornelia McMahon was made director of the Boston unit for the women's organization, and Mrs. Carol L. Chase was named to a similar post in Cambridge. A third appointment was that of Mrs. Frederick Smith, sister of Governor Ely, to serve in Westfield.

WARNS OF POLITICS

Administrator Hears Reports of Interference in Youngstown—Starts Probe and Says City Will Not Get Relief Funds if That Is So

WASHINGTON, Nov. 23 (AP)—A charge that politics had intermingled with activities of the Civil Works Administration in Youngstown, Ohio, today caused Harry L. Hopkins, administrator, to warn in incisive language that the city would get none of the works relief fund if the reports were true.

Hopkins was told that John J. Farrell, the Youngstown Democratic boss, had advised Democrats wanting jobs under civil works to register at the City Employment Bureau and then report to the deputy of the elections board.

Farrell was quoted as having said: "I cannot promise any jobs but I will try to see that the men are placed."

Hopkins Acts

His explanation was that he asked the unemployed to register so he would know the men in question were getting work and would not have to worry about their requests for other jobs.

The Civil Works Administration, a branch of the Federal Relief Administration headed by Hopkins, was set up early in November to transfer approximately 2,000,000 men on work relief from charity rolls and provide employment for 2,000,000 others. Secretary Ickes made $400,000,000 available to it from the public works fund.

Hopkins today telegraphed F. D. Henderson of Columbus, chairman of the Ohio Civil Works Administration, to call a meeting of the Youngstown Administration to see whether through a political interference some persons were getting an advantage in obtaining jobs.

"No civil works funds will be expended in Youngstown if these conditions are true," he said. "The Civil Works Administration will not tolerate political interference."

It was said, however, at the Relief Administration that Hopkins did not wish to penalize Youngstown unemployed for political interference and that his statement was to be interpreted literally only if a complete divorce could not be obtained between relief and politics.

Farrell is not a member of the Youngstown Civil Works Administration, officials said, and Mayor Moore was reported to have denied that his administration was interfering with job assignments.

First Such Case Reported

In announcing the Civil Works Administration, President Roosevelt said: "We would like to have a rule that everyone associated with relief work will never ask whether persons needing assistance are Democrats, Republicans, Socialists or anything else."

Hopkins emphasized the non-partisan character of relief even more. His subordinates said the Youngstown case was the first and only report of political interference and that through it he intended to make it plain that he would not brook such meddling.

Over 500,000 Men Placed

The administration said today it had no accurate figures on how many persons had been transferred from relief rolls to civil works projects. The number was placed at well above 500,000 men and Hopkins has said that arrangements have been made to meet a payment of 1,000,000 or over tomorrow or Saturday.

The administrator ruled today that employees injured on civil works projects would receive two-thirds of their pay until recovered.

He and his assistants went ahead with plans for carrying approximately 1,000,000 families on relief rolls over the winter. These probably will remain in need if the civil works accomplishes its purpose of putting 4,000,000 persons on pay rolls.

JOBS FOR BOSTON MEN NOT ON WELFARE LIST; $201,902 FOR DAIRIES

GILBERT TO HIRE 1063 TO CLEAN BARN IN STATE

Metropolitan Board Will
Get $215,000 to Hire
1080 of City's Idle

AWARDS TO DATE
TO EMPLOY 13,175

Large Share of $12,000,000
Grant to Be Sought for

A major share of jobs on civil works projects undertaken by the metropolitan district commission will be given to unemployed residents of Boston not on the welfare list, it was announced last night by Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts civil works board. The announcement came after a conference between Chairman Bartlett and Davis B. Keniston, chairman of the metropolitan district commission, during which the commission was allotted $215,000 to hire 1080 men for work in Greater Boston.

The pressing problem of how to take care of Boston's unemployed was thus partly solved by Bartlett, who ruled that if Keniston wanted to allot more than the usual share of jobs to Boston residents he would not object. Also, it indicated that the state itself will seek a large share of the estimated $12,000,000 fund. Gov. Ely feels that the state should take at least $2,000,000, the chairman said.

An important project which will affect every dairy farmer in the state and result in better quality milk for the Massachusetts consumer, was approved by Chairman Bartlett. He awarded the state department of agriculture $201,902 to hire 1063 men to spray, clean and whitewash dairy barns throughout the state.

HARD PRESSED FARMERS
Commissioner Arthur W. Gilbert of the agriculture department said that hard-pressed farmers could not comply with health regulations and were being barred from the Massachusetts market.

With the barns cleaned, the regulations would be complied with and the farmer, with better milk, would be allowed to sell in Massachusetts markets.

A check of the figures yesterday revealed that the state civil works board, which has been in existence just a week, has awarded in three days a total of $4,088,137 to provide work for 13,175 men throughout the state.

Yesterday, Chairman Bartlett deputized Robert F. Bradford, assistant secretary to Gov. Ely, and John J. Fitzgerald, engineer to the board, to assist him and State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley in passing, on applications. Working at top speed, the four men passed on a large number of projects, among which were:

WELLESLEY—60 men—$10,000 to drain South swamp.
ATTLEBORO—122 men—$20,381 for highways and rail removal.
BELMONT—180 men—$27,784 for sewer work.

NEEDHAM—95 men—$18,076 for sewers and ditches.
WINCHESTER—94 men—$32,600 for mosquito control work.
DANVERS—70 men—$13,332 for gravel roads.

BROCKTON—112 men—$17,704 for drainage and park work.
This speed has been matched by William B. Coy, a member of the civil works board, who has been assigned to handle the accounting end of the civil works administration. The grant to the department of agriculture for the dairy barns was only one item allowed that department. Another of $28,892 was approved for the use of the department in the white pine blister rust control, and approval was given for a campaign of corn borer control to cost $23,850, bringing the total allotment to the department to $33,734. It is expected that approximately 1700 men will be employed.

Of that number 563 will be engaged in the dairy barn project. Some 150 groups of six men each will be sent out into the towns to assist dairy farmers who have been hard hit financially, because of the small returns for their products. Barns will be cleaned, sprayed and whitewashed. Supervisors in control of the project will contact dairy farmers in each town, offering to do the work at no cost to the farmer.

To Accomplish Three Things
The department hopes, by this project, to accomplish three things. Essentially it will provide work for the needy. It will assist dairy farmers who have been laboring under financial burdens for years and have been unable to do all the cleaning work they would like to do, and finally, it will provide protection to the consumer of milk, who will be assured that the product is prepared and delivered under the most sanitary conditions.

An important ruling of the board was made yesterday in an effort to speed up projects. It had to do with the purchase of materials, and the cities and towns were notified that materials for the civil works projects are to be treated as emergency purchases. Bids will be accepted by telephone, and purchases may be made with the understanding that when the bills are presented they must be accompanied by bids of three reputable firms.

First Pays Next Week
The Metropolitan District Commission will employ on their projects men from cities which contribute to the commission. Permission was given by the board to the commission to employ the men from cities and towns on the basis of the welfare load, and on that basis Boston's welfare recipients and other unemployed will be put to work in larger numbers than if the usual contribution apportionment were used.

The question of payrolls lies with the cities and towns. The board has a set-up which will allow for payrolls this week, but it is unlikely that money will be paid until next week, for the city of the welfare lists have municipalities which have projects already under way will probably not be able to submit their payrolls on the formal blanks this week.

All Able Must Work

Although the board made no ruling on the question, Chairman Bartlett stated last night that his understanding of the law is that any welfare recipient who is able, but unwilling to work, may be removed from the welfare rolls, so that if a municipality finds some of its able-bodied welfare recipients refuse to take the employment offered under the Civil Works programme, their names may be stricken from the rolls.

Thousands Seek Work
A problem giving the board some thought is that of inducing municipalities to add some of their own appropriations to the allotment of the board. Of the approximately 60 municipalities which have obtained approvals of projects, only a small percentage have agreed to add some of their own funds to the projects. Springfield is the only one thus far which has made any sizable contribution.

Thousands of men and women thronged the registration places again yesterday to get their names down on the lists from which the new employees will be taken. Many hundreds of women applied at the State office in the new Public Works building in Nassau street, and thousands of men appeared at municipal buildings and the State registration place at the South Armory in Irvington street.

Misunderstanding in Lynn
In Lynn, confusion arose when city officials got the impression that half of the men already at work under the programme had to be replaced by men who were not on the welfare lists but who had registered with the State and federal employment service. An order withdrawing the men was issued, and 100 of the workers appeared at the Lynn City Hall to protest.

Mrs. Theresa Manning, sister of the Mayor of Lynn, called for police, and the group was finally dispersed, after the situation had been explained. Mayor Manning later announced that 800 men will be put to work this morning, and additional workers will be given employment Monday. It is expected that about 1000 men in that city will be employed until Feb. 15 under the civil works grant. The entire grant will go to the payroll, the city paying out of its own treasury for supervision, materials and equipment.

Westboro, $7560, for 35 men.
Southwick, $3716 for 30 men.
Millis, $1356, for 40 men.
Lexington, $20,430, for 97 men.
Duxbury, $3020, for 40 men.

Applications, the board split up into sections. State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley conducted one, Chairman Bartlett another. The board engineer, John J. Fitzgerald, and Robert F. Bradford, assistant secretary to Governor Ely, assisted in the work of examining applications.

Chairman Bartlett announced that at 11 o'clock this morning he will continue the hearing which was given Mayor Curley Wednesday. The board has approved applications of Boston to the amount of $775,000, and there is more than $1,000,000 in projects yet to be discussed.

Compensation Order
Assurance that employees under the Civil Works administration will be protected by the workmen's compensation laws was given in a telegram from Harry L. Hopkins, federal relief administrator. "All employees of the Civil Works administration who suffer from injuries while in the performance of duty will be paid compensation during disability," Hopkins telegraphed, "and provided with medical attention under the conditions prescribed in the federal compensation law of Sept. 7, 1916, and in accordance with the rules and regulations of the United States Employees Compensation Commission."

You are hereby authorized to instruct all Civil Works administrators to pay Civil Works employees during periods of disability resulting from accidental injury in the performance of duty at a rate not to exceed 66 2/3 percent of their regular weekly wage. No payment shall be made, however, for the first three days of disability."

Several appointments were announced by Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, director of the women's division of the Civil Works Board. Mrs. Cornelia McMahon was made director of the Boston unit for the women's organization, and Mrs. Carol L. Chase was named to a similar post in Cambridge. A third appointment was that of Mrs. Frederick Smith, sister of Governor Ely, to serve in Westfield.

WARNS OF POLITICS
Administrator Hears Reports of Interference in Youngstown—Starts Probe and Says City Will Not Get Relief Funds if That Is So

WASHINGTON, Nov. 23 (AP)—A charge that politics had intermingled with activities of the Civil Works Administration in Youngstown, Ohio, today caused Harry L. Hopkins, administrator, to warn in incisive language that the city would get none of the works relief fund if the reports were true.

Hopkins was told that John J. Farrell, the Youngstown Democratic boss, had advised Democrats wanting jobs under civil works to register at the City Employment Bureau and then report to the deputy of the elections board.

Farrell was quoted as having said: "I cannot promise any jobs but I will try to see that the men are placed."

Speed Up Hearings

Hopkins Acts

This explanation was that he asked the unemployed to register so he would know the men in question were getting work and would not have to worry about their requests for other jobs.

The Civil Works Administration, a branch of the Federal Relief Administration headed by Hopkins, was set up early in November to transfer approximately 2,000,000 men on work relief from charity rolls and provide employment for 2,000,000 others. Secretary Ickes made $400,000,000 available to it from the public works fund.

Hopkins today telegraphed F. D. Henderson of Columbus, chairman of the Ohio Civil Works Administration, to call a meeting of the Youngstown Administration to see whether through a political interference some persons were getting an advantage in obtaining jobs.

"No civil works funds will be expended in Youngstown if these conditions are true," he said. "The Civil Works Administration will not tolerate political interference."

It was said, however, at the Relief Administration that Hopkins did not wish to penalize Youngstown unemployed for political interference and that his statement was to be interpreted literally only if a complete divorce could not be obtained between relief and politics.

Farrell is not a member of the Youngstown Civil Works Administration, officials said, and Mayor Moore was reported to have denied that his administration was interfering with job assignments.

First Such Case Reported

In announcing the Civil Works Administration, President Roosevelt said: "We would like to have a rule that everyone associated with relief work will never ask whether persons needing assistance are Democrats, Republicans, Socialists or anything else."

Hopkins emphasized the non-partisan character of relief even more. His subordinates said the Youngstown case was the first and only report of political interference and that through it he intended to make it plain that he would not brook such meddling.

Over 500,000 Men Placed

The administrator said today it had no accurate figures on how many persons had been transferred from relief rolls to civil works projects. The number was placed at well above 500,000 men and Hopkins has said that arrangements have been made to meet a payment of 1,000,000 or over tomorrow or Saturday.

The administrator ruled today that employees injured on civil works projects would receive two-thirds of their pay until recovered.

He and his assistants went ahead with plans for carrying approximately 1,000,000 families on relief rolls over the winter. These probably will remain in need if the civil works accomplishes its purpose of putting 4,000,000 persons on pay rolls.

$294,000 ALLOTTED
FOR FOXBORO WORK

WASHINGTON, Nov. 24 (AP)—The public works administration today allotted $5,082,200 for 38 non-federal projects in all parts of the country which officials said would provide 30,145 man months of quick direct employment.

Twenty-six of the projects received grants of 30 per cent. of the cost of labor and materials, representing a gift of the federal government and the remainder as a loan to be repaid with interest at 4 per cent.

Eleven of the allotments were for 30 per cent. of the cost of labor and material with the balance to be raised locally.

One allotment was a loan to a private corporation which was not eligible for a grant.

The allotments include:
Massachusetts — Newton, loan and grant, school building, $148,800; Foxboro, loan and grant, buildings, $294,000; Belchertown, loan and grant, buildings, $98,000; Monson, loan and grant, steam lines, $100,000; Norfolk, loans and grants, building $146,000, boiler equipment $35,000; state of Massachusetts, loan and grant, dormitories at the Canton school for crippled children, $115,000.

Burlington, Vt.—Water system, $3200.

Bridgeport, Ct.—Grant, sewers, $33,600.

The loan and grant of $148,800 to Newton is for construction of an addition and alterations to the existing school building at Park street, Newton Corner. Thirty per cent. of the labor and material cost, approximately $115,000, is a grant, the balance a loan secured by 4 per cent. general obligation bonds. Work can start in 30 days and the PWA estimated at would give 64 men employment for eight months.

The $217,000 loan and grant to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is for construction of a two-story and basement ward building with accommodations for 54 patients at the Foxboro state hospital.

For additional work at Foxboro, Massachusetts received a loan and grant of $77,000 for construction of a one-story laundry building and laundry equipment.

A $98,000 loan and grant to Massachusetts was for construction of an addition to the dining room and kitchen service building and construction of a building to house the cannery at Belchertown state school, department of mental diseases, at Belchertown.

A loan and grant of $100,000 to Massachusetts is for the running of steam lines and returns from the boilerhouse to various isolated building units at the state hospital at Monson.

Two allotments totalling $181,000 were made to Massachusetts for work at the state prison colony at Norfolk.

A loan and grant of $14,000 is for construction of a two-story building to serve as a school and library for prisoners.

A loan and grant of $35,000 is for use in the removal of fire tube boilers and settings from the Norfolk prison colony and installing them on suspension type support at the Rutland State Sanatorium.

A $115,000 loan and grant to Massachusetts is for construction of two dormitory buildings, one for girls and the other for boys, at the Massachusetts hospital school for crippled and deformed children at Canton.

CWA Airport Work Ready for Bay State, Ely Told

The Aeronautics Branch of the Department of Commerce informed Gov. Ely today that it was ready to begin immediately with the construction of new airports and the modernization of existing ones in all parts of the state.

This is to be its contribution to the Civil Works program and is to be carried out in co-operation with the state and municipalities, it was pointed out to the governor in a telegram today from G. L. Vidal, director of aeronautics of the department.

Construction activity in this state is to be part of a nation-wide undertaking, complete details of which are to be worked out in Washington at once, Gov. Ely was requested to send a representative to the capital at once to discuss Massachusetts' share in the project.

He turned over the wire to Joseph Bartlett, head of the emergency finance board, which has supervision of the commonwealth's participation in the civil works program. The wire follows:

"Aeronautics branch, Department of Commerce, prepared to construct national network of airports in co-operation with CWA, states and municipalities. Sites must be owned or leased by state or municipality.

"Plan also includes improving existing inadequate fields. CWA must be under way in two weeks. Your co-operation by urging municipalities to acquire and subdivide sites to aeronautics branch, Department of Commerce, immediately is requested. Further request that you send a representative to Washington immediately to discuss program for your state."

The message is signed by G. L.

Vidal, director of aeronautics, who only a few days ago announced the completion of an elaborate survey of the nation's flying facilities and flying needs. He is a brother of the West Point football hero.

Bartlett, on receiving the message from the Governor, at once conferred with Adj. Gen. George Agnew, requesting him to submit the name of a qualified man who can be sent to Washington today to get further information about the proposal.

Definite plans for Massachusetts' part in the project will be formulated just as soon as this representative sends his first report from the capital.

USE OF ENTIRE $2,500,000 IS PROPOSED

2d Day Begun by 250
Drawn From the Dole and Non-Dole Lists

BULLETIN

The CWA board today approved additional Boston projects aggregating $1,157,614, bringing the total already sanctioned to $2,116,780 and the total jobs created to 5586. In addition, Mayor Curley obtained the board's tacit approval of his $1,500,000 Strandway project to employ 1500 men providing he gets a city order for $300,000 for materials.

Another project for employing 5000 more men in development of the airport to include Governor's Island is a probability.

Additional Boston projects will be submitted to the State Civil Works board today as the city's first group of men to be put to work under the program start their second day of employment here.

A total of 250 men, drawn equally from the welfare rolls and the lists of those who have not been receiving aid, went to work on Boston projects yesterday at the same time that thousands of unemployed men throughout the State started working on approved projects in various communities.

A grant of $2,500,000 has been tentatively allotted to Boston and already the Civil Works Board has approved projects totalling about $950,000 for the city. Mayor Curley will present additional projects for using the remainder of the allotment today.

The civil works board has also taken another step to fill up the quota allotted to Massachusetts by grants to state departments. This will take care of funds, which local communities feel they cannot handle, even though the grant is given to them by the government.

It was announced the State Department of Agriculture had been allotted $213,734 to provide jobs for 1699 men and that a grant of $221,408 to give work to 1080 men had been assigned to the Metropolitan District Commission. A total of $2,000,000 will probably go to the state.

INSTRUCTIONS CAUSE HITCH IN HIRING

Required "United States Employment Agencies" Not Yet Established

The challenging question that faced a hundred Massachusetts municipalities this morning was whether the tremendous energy that the State Civil Works Board has used to cut red tape in making jobs is to be largely nullified by new rolls of red tape in the National Reemployment Service, which has the responsibility for filling a full half of all these new jobs.

Local officials woke up this morning to find telegraphic instructions from Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State board that half of all the jobs on projects approved this week must be given to unemployed men not on welfare lists.

Most officials welcomed that news, though some were disappointed that they could not entirely clear their welfare lists upon the new Federal works payrolls.

But the hitch in the new instructions came in that part of Mr. Bartlett's telegram which stated: "The other 50 per cent shall be taken from United States employment agencies as soon as the agencies can furnish the persons."

cities, the National Reemployment Service, which has this vast task of filling half of 97,000 immediate jobs, had up to today established no local agency for registering these unemployed men. Local officials, except in a few instances, had not even had any communication from the National Reemployment Service headquarters in Boston.

Thousands of jobs are waiting for unemployed men. Thousands of men are waiting for jobs. But in scores of towns, with these approved works projects ready to start, nobody has any idea how the men are to be connected with the jobs.

Local officials with his offer to finance jobs for 4,000,000 men. The Massachusetts State Civil Works Board has been staying up till midnight passing the local projects as swiftly as they could be prepared by local officials who have given their exclusive attention to this vital project for all the week.

But their projects are held up at the start for lack of ways and means to get the men for the work.

Stoneham a Typical Instance

A typical instance is Stoneham. A Stoneham project was approved Tuesday. Welfare men were put to work yesterday. This morning the local officials learned from Bartlett that half the jobs on the project should be given to nonwelfare men. But Stoneham had heard no word about enrolling unemployed men by the National Reemployment Service. They didn't know what to do about their instructions.

They telephoned to Dr. Robert S. Quinby, director of the National Reemployment Service at the Federal Building in Boston. He said he was working as fast as possible to establish local registration of unemployed. Pressed to speed up action on Stoneham's project, he instructed the Stoneham Selectmen to pick out a competent unemployed man and send him in to Dr. Quinby this afternoon. If he proves a satisfactory man, Dr. Quinby will authorize him to handle the enrollment of unemployed in Stoneham.

Reading Engineer Turned Down

Reading had projects approved last night calling for the employment of 80 men. This was only the first half of the projects they planned to submit. They intended to take this first half of welfare. Learning yesterday of the necessity to count half the jobs for nonwelfare men, the Reading Selectmen, hearing nothing from the National Reemployment Service, placed an unemployed engineer in the Town Hall in charge of registering local unemployed. Fifty-three had registered by this morning.

When Chairman Albert N. Leman reached Dr. Quinby by telephone this morning to tell him the steps taken in Reading, Dr. Quinby declared that these 53 men were not properly registered, and that the registration would have to be repeated when the National Reemployment Service should set up its agency in Reading. It might take a little time to get registration started.

These two local situations multiplied by 100 present the picture of the inundation facing the National Reemployment Service as it stands between the jobs that have been provided and the men who have been told that the jobs are for them as soon as they can find a place to enroll for the work.

SENT OUT 39,000 BLANK CHECKS

Disbursing Officer of Civil Workers Busy

Herbert Barracough, disbursing officer at the regional office of the United States Veterans' Administration, in the Postoffice Building, this morning described the method of payment of the civil workers wherewith the Veterans' Administration is associated.

"In every community throughout the State," he said, "there is appointed a certifying officer. He prepares a payroll dealing with the work in that community of each civil works man for the week extending from Friday to Thursday."

"That payroll is handed to the treasurer of the community, who has become a sort of deputy to me. It is his job then to fill out, in accordance with the payroll, the blank checks which I have sent to him for that purpose."

"When does such payment begin?" Mr. Barracough asked.

"It probably has begun," he replied, "for last night I sent out 39,000 such blank checks to the treasurers of 21 towns and communities in this State. The partial week from Tuesday to Thursday was thus accounted for."

"Shall you go through similar procedure each week?"

"Not necessarily. Shall send out such blank checks only when they are asked for by the community treasurers needing them in accordance with the method described."

C. W. A. Secretary Keeps Smiling as Work Piles up

Traveler 11-27-33

LUBERTA MARIE CLAUSS

Luberta M. Clauss, Efficient Aide to Bartlett, Rushed to the Limit as Thousands Are Given Jobs

By THOMAS TOMLINSON

Miss Massachusetts Civil Works Administration! She has had the title but seven days. And in that short space of time has had the head men from most of the 355 Massachusetts cities and towns trying to catch her eye.

Mayors, city managers, aldermen, and selectmen, all have vied with one another to gain audience with her.

AIDE TO BARTLETT

She is, to State House and Cambridge folk—Miss Luberta Marie Clauss, daughter of Mrs. Julia Clauss of 34 Essex street, in the university city.

To Joseph W. Bartlett, our many-millions-a-minute man, she is the amanuensis of the administration.

That "amanuensis" business belongs to Chairman Bartlett. We think he got it from Noah Webster for the low dollar.

At any rate, it means that Miss Clauss is a secretary extraordinary and recorder of the wants and needs of our cities and towns, suddenly revived by the civil works program.

She is smiling 23-year-old brown haired girl. She has hazel eyes and only once did a punster tell her they were witching. He was discouraged.

BORN IN CAMBRIDGE

Born in Cambridge, her earlier education was received at the Harvard grammar school. Later she entered Cambridge High and Latin school. Graduating from there, she took several special courses at Harvard College business school.

Then, with the feeling that she had absorbed sufficient book-lore, she joined the Houghton-Mifflin Company, where she worked for a time, and acquitted herself creditably.

State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley happened to be in need of an assistant secretary. Luberta was recommended and hired. She joined the state treasurer's staff and there remained until Joseph W. Bartlett became commissioner of this, that and several other big money jobs.

When Mr. Bartlett was made director of the state emergency finance board, Miss Clauss transferred to that board and found herself a most busy person.

stormed the doors with projects in hand.

MEN QUICKLY PLACED

However, by 4:30 P. M. of the first day, the city of Worcester had had a project approved and the first batch of men were placed at work the following morning. The first of 100,000 men and women to be placed in the security of a job for the winter months at least.

By Tuesday afternoon our amanuensis was about ready to ask the first person she met to tell her who she was exactly. She was that rushed.

Of course, Miss Clauss is only the secretary to the administration and the full responsibility for handling the more than $12,000,000 worth of C. W. A. money rests with Chairman Bartlett, Charles F. Hurley and William B. Coy.

But, in the midst of an important conference, whether with the genial mayor of our own Boston or the chairman of selectmen from the smallest village in the state, Chairman Bartlett may suddenly turn a knotty problem by saying, "Oh, take that down, Miss Clauss and fix it up." Just like that, Miss Clauss takes it down, grins and keeps on compiling data and more data.

In the short week, the board has put more than 25,000 to work and has authorized the expenditure of approximately $6,000,000. In fact the Messrs. Bartlett, Hurley and Coy, who comprise the board, plus Miss Clauss and the others, have received high compliment from official Washington for the speed and orderly manner in which the Massachusetts C. W. A. has been set in motion.

TEAM WORK DISPLAYED

Speaking of the others, Miss Clauss proved her unselfishness and openly declared that every other employee had made the high speed possible. Chairman Bartlett agreed with her and has already declared his appreciation of the team work displayed by the stenographers and typists who are:

Agnes Harrington, Agatha Schmitz, Sarah Finnegan, Grace Brosnahan and Brenda Barbour. All of them have worked every bit as hard as the board themselves during one of the most trying weeks in their recollection.

Not one of them could find a place to hide from the insistent questioning of some town father, himself anxious that his town get going on an unemployment project. None of them lost their smiles though the opportunity for doing so presented itself ever other 10 minutes. And today they started on another week that promises a repetition.

Miss Clauss also pointed out the Trojan-like work by Charles S. Ramsey, the personnel manager; John J. Fitzgerald, engineer to the board; John Morris, counsel; Commodore Distributor Joseph O'Connell, J. Ostle Sears, accountant, and W. S. Broughey, office manager, all five equally busy aiding the 300-odd community managers to straighten out their puzzles and complexities as the C. W. A.

While all this goes on, Luberta doesn't get much time for her pet at home, a blooded Irish terrier named "Skeezix." And her two brothers, Louis and Edward, and sister Helen, see little of the busy Luberta.

Work, and more work, what with the federal government dumping another 10 to 12 million dollar project, the airport network, into her office the chances are that Miss Luberta won't realize an eight hour day for at least another fortnight.

Nevertheless, our Miss M. C. W. A. is still smiling.

BURIED IN WORK

But it did, and within an hour after the meeting broke up, she was buried in piles of "programs," proposals and projects. In seven, fast travelling days, she jotted down and added up more men, money and materials than most Wall street brokers played with at the height of the boom.

First of all, every town and city, from Abington to Yarmouth, alphabetically, had to fill in a series of forms that would make a Philadelphia lawyer wince, before they could receive the all-powerful permission of the board to put men to work.

Chairman Bartlett wanted the entire office pitched to a "Fast, not faster," speed. A complete clerical set-up was needed. The three members of the board, Miss Clauss and a few other workers strove to meet the task, as waves of selectmen and others

Goal For State Is 97,000 With 27,646 Jobs Already Assured; 1300 Fight Moths Today

Mayor's Reply

Mayor Curley gave out the following statement:

"My attention has been directed by the representatives of the press that Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State Civil Works Board is contemplating having the State do certain work in Boston, and basing his position upon the failure of the city to provide work for 19,000 persons.

"Upon Saturday last I sent a communication to all department heads, including county officials, a copy of which reads as follows:

"To all department heads: The Massachusetts State Public Works Administrator is desirous that the number of persons employed on the civil works program be increased to 19,000.

"The total that I have been able to provide work for to the present time is 7000.

"I am desirous that you carefully examine at once the requirements of your department that would come under this head and submit a list to me not later than 12 o'clock, noon, Monday, Nov. 27, 1933.

"Very truly yours, James M. Curley."

1000 Additional Jobs

"I have arranged in addition to submit a loan order to the City Council on Monday, making provision for a loan of $300,000 to cover the cost of materials required upon the Strandway work, and which project will provide employment for 1000 additional men. The contribution by the city upon this particular project is nearly 50 percent of the total cost of the work, and this is being done with a view to meeting her wishes of the State Public Works Administrator.

"If there are any suggestions that he has to make, or that any other citizen has to make, I shall be most pleased to receive them and provided they are sound and do not represent a waste of public money, I shall be most pleased to act upon them.

While the Civil Works Board shelled for the time being the application of Commissioner York for an expenditure of $542,000 in various forest fire prevention undertakings, Chairman Bartlett suggested that the commissioner get in touch with Atty Gen Joseph E. Warner and ascertain if the expenditure would be legal.

Nothing would afford me greater pleasure than to convey to Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes, the pleasing information that this long delayed project has finally received the approval of the State Public Works Administration Board.

"My relations with Mr. Bartlett have been most harmonious during the consideration of the relief program at Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State Civil Works Board practically served notice on Mayor Curley yesterday afternoon that if 19,000 jobless men are not given employment in the city by Dec 15, the State Board will step in and endeavor to find a sufficient number of jobs in Boston to complete the city's quota of 19,000 men.

"It might be possible for State work to be done in Boston," Mr. Bartlett volunteered.

His remarks were made in a conversation with newspapermen at the State House about the quotas of workers for each of the municipalities of the State. At a recent hearing before the board, Mayor Curley said he would endeavor to provide work for 10,000 men, but he threw up his hands when told that Boston, under the quota arrangement, is called upon to provide jobs for 19,000 men. Originally Mayor Curley had planned to employ only 6000 men.

During the afternoon, projects calling for the expenditure of $385,320 and the employment of 3449 were approved.

Worcester Asks $546,600

Worcester this afternoon asked for an allotment of $546,600. A total of $359,000, providing employment for 2900 men, was allowed for the time being. Mayor Mahoney wants 4000 men at labor by Dec 15, mostly in unskilled labor.

Among the projects on the Worcester program are: Repairs to local rifle range; retaining walls around numerous schools, grading, painting, wooden fences, painting of firehouses, etc.; completion of a cow barn and dairy garage at the Home Farm, construction of a clearance of 60 acres of land for tilable purposes, repairs to the infirm-ary; forestation and grading at sewage filtration plant, a trunk sewer in Maplewood and the grading of 34 streets.

Bartlett Reviews Work

Chairman Bartlett discussed what the State Civil Works Board has done in the past week, whether the results will be satisfactory, whether the work is on the level, and what leadership municipal officials must furnish in order to have the national undertaking successful, in a speech over Station WBZ yesterday afternoon.

"As soon as the program of civil works was announced," he said, "municipal officers grasped its significance because they have intimate knowledge of the welfare and unemployment situations.

"What must have been the astonishment of those of you who are in contact when you saw and read of the thousands of men and women who need our streets seeking employment through the established agencies? These men had been fighting against public welfare. We knew of conditions that many of you did not know of. We knew more when we saw this push for employment. We, too, cut a degree red tape and said, 'You are going to get a chance at work, and so we are endeavoring to get a equitable in employment through this program. We are not thinking of the taxes, but we are thinking also of the man who is in dire straits.

"Is this work on the level? You may wonder whether this is another effort job. You may wonder whether it is well administered and you may wonder whether, as a whole, it is on the level?

"First, it is being done in the open. Newspapers and others have had full opportunity to see what we are doing; to hear what we are saying. The work to be done will be done in the open; will be reported upon; will be observed and watched by all of the citizens of Massachusetts. The man who is able to work; and is unwilling, will be found out and classified. The man in charge of these projects will be under observation by the public and if unwilling to do right will be justified in the public mind.

"You, in leadership in the community, in public positions, have not yet begun to go. Studies of social and economic problems can be made; traffic conditions in our cities can be studied and constructively reported upon; health and sanitation can have more attention. Conditions as to crime and the administration of justice can be studied and constructively reported upon. All classes of people are in distress, brains and brawn, we want to include them all. Let us all work together on this. Ninety-seven thousand real men and women of Massachusetts on an earning basis by Dec 15. This is not a welfare problem. This is a problem in encouragement to our people."

"BOLONEY DOLLAR" IS CHEERED BY MEN

and the despondent since the advent of the new deal.

The men went to work Wednesday, being among the first to be given employment in this State. Their work has consisted of laying a water main along Franklin st from Melrose High-lands to Pine st, a distance of about a half-mile.

They work a six-hour day, starting early in the morning, so that they usually drop their work about 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Shortly before that hour today there was a conference between Simeon C. Fuller, town treasurer, and Arthur D. Kenney, local civil works administrator.

Mr Kenney wished to have the men paid off today. Mr Fuller, objecting, said that he had received no order from the State House and was therefore in doubt as to whether he should pay the men, at that moment busily at work in the vicinity of "Dreary Dog Town."

"Not Ornaments"—Kenney

Kenney insisted that the checks for the men had been received, and that they were not intended as ornaments. He assumed full authority for disbursing the checks, as civil works administrator for Stoneham, and ordered that they be given out at once.

Kenney and Fuller, together with a number of other town officials, then proceeded to "Dreary Dog Town" where the men quit work for the day at 2:30.

As regular municipal employees looked on, the men filed to the paying booth of Mr Fuller and were issued their checks, which they received with various emotions, some with faces glowing, others with moist eyes. In the crowd looking on Mr Kenney recognized ex-Selectman Leander V. Colahan.

Mr Colahan was called forward, and asked for a speech.

He is a popular local figure. For the past quarter-century he has been chairman of the Democratic Town Committee. He was the original Roosevelt man in town, gaining local fame by sending grass seed to the Republican Town Committee when it was said Roosevelt's election would mean that grass would grow in the streets.

"Plenty of Hot Dogs"

Ascending a pile of sand, Mr Colahan raised his lapel against the wind, and addressed the men. He asked them to be sure to give a fair day's work and to back the President in his recovery program.

And then, amid the waving of hats and the rounds of cheers, he declared that although the checks might represent "boloney dollars they'll certainly buy plenty of eats, plenty of hot dogs!" The men, as he ended his address, gave three spontaneous cheers for the "boloney dollar."

And finally, with three tigers for the President, they faced into the wind, and started home.

ALL CONCORD UNEMPLOYED TO HAVE JOBS FOR WINTER

CONCORD, Mass. Nov. 26.—The first group of men of the nearly 100 who are to be employed during the next 10 weeks by the local Selectmen on the five public works projects mapped out by the board will commence actual work tomorrow, and the rest will be put on the job as soon as possible, so that by the end of the week the entire force will be working. Concord has been allotted $18,700 by the Federal Government for these projects. This work will take care of all the unemployed in the town through the greater part of the winter. War veterans are being given preference, next citizens now on the welfare list and lastly other unemployed residents.

STONEHAM, Nov. 27.—"Three cheers for the boloney dollar! Rah, rah, rah; Three tigers for Franklin D. Roosevelt! Tiger, tiger, tiger!" Mingling with the cutting blast of the north wind as it raced over "Dreary Dog Town," these cheers of unbounded joy and profound sincerity came from the lips of 59 civil workers this afternoon when they were given the first pay they had received in months—in some cases, in years.

Fathers, wrapped only in the thin, frayed coats they had worn as they trudged hopeless, disheartening miles in search of work; men whom the depression had prematurely aged; men whose savings had disappeared and whose American homes had known hunger, joined in the cheering and the applause.

347 CWA JOBS FOR TEACHERS HERE APPROVED

Program First Offered by a City Department to Be Accepted

BARTLETT ASKS NEW SCHOOL PROJECTS

900 Cambridge Workers Get $5000—59 in Stoneham Receive $176

Civil works projects which will employ 347 teachers and 131 clerical assistants in Boston schools were approved yesterday by the Massachusetts civil works administration. It was the first time approval was granted for projects submitted by a division of a city government.

Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the state civil works board, urged William Arthur Reilly, chairman of the Boston school committee, and Patrick T. Campbell, superintendent of schools, to present additional projects which will employ "white collar" and professional persons.

The approval was particularly pleasing to State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, member of the state board and a member of the Cambridge school committee for 12 years. Intimately familiar with school problems, he sent a telegram to Washington asking whether the state board has authority to allocate money for repairing and cleaning school books, and buying new ones.

$5000 IN CAMBRIDGE

Yesterday the board had a "breathing spell" during which it held an executive session. William B. Coy, third member of the board, reported that payroll blanks had been distributed throughout the state to those communities about to pay. Later it was learned that $5000 had been distributed to 900 Cambridge workers, and $176 to 59 in Stoneham workers.

Dr. Arthur W. Gilbert, state commissioner of agriculture, announced that 200 women will be hired by Friday in Suffolk county to knit sweaters, suits and similar things. Only experienced knitters will be taken. It was said by C. W. Buckler, of the agriculture department, who has been placed in charge of the work in which 1000 women will be engaged all over the state.

Gilbert reported that 1280 men are now working on apple pest eradication work, about 400 on dairy barn sanitation and approximately 600 more will begin on European corn borer and white pine blister rust eradication projects.

SOMERVILLE STRUGGLE

For hours Chairman Bartlett struggled with the Somerville civil works program. This was in striking contrast to the few minutes spent on the program submitted by Mayor George Bates of Salem, which took about eight minutes to approve. The Salem program includes work for 1000 men, working in two shifts, at a cost of $73,111.

The Somerville program as presented by Mayor John J. Murphy and his department heads was not so simple. The costs of materials were too high, in the chairman's opinion. He insisted that Somerville contribute a certain percentage of this cost and Mayor Murphy agreed to present loan orders to the ple reports which the state department of education has been asking for during the last six weeks, but which a small clerical force did not have time to compile.

Chairman Reilly issued the following statement after approval had been granted:

Boston is the first city to have such a plan approved. It has been judged educationally and economically sound. It helps the pupil and the long list of teachers who were becoming discouraged in their quest for work. The credit for speedy approval goes to State Treasurer Hurley, Chairman Bartlett and Mr. Coy. Mr. Hurley received my request at 10 A. M., met with me at 4 P. M. and at 5 o'clock the state board gave its approval.

Regarding the possibility of buying books and repairing old books, Mr. Hurley said: Many cities and towns have cut their book purchasing appropriations to the bone. The result is that in every school in the commonwealth there are books being used by children which should be replaced. They are worn and dilapidated and to some extent constitute a health menace. Their replacement not only will benefit the children but will provide employment for hundreds of men and women in the printing, bookbinding and allied industries.

Large numbers of men claiming skill in carpentry and painting and similar lines to obtain the skilled labor wage of $1.20 are faking, said James T. Moriarty, president of the Massachusetts Federation of Labor. He urged that the state board give union men, of known skill, preference in these jobs, but Chairman Bartlett ruled that such matters had to be handled by Robert S. Quimby, director of the federal re-employment service, to whom cities and towns apply for non-welfare workers.

WORKS PROGRAM PASSES COUNCIL

Individuals Snipe Vainly at Curley Proposals

Norton Assails Young's Lease;

Realty Owners to Fight It

The supplementary public works program under the Public Works Administration, submitted to the City Council by Mayor James M. Curley yesterday for approval, occasioned much talk and discussion, but the Council finally passed the items, which totalled $6,075,000, for the first reading. The second reading will be in two weeks.

A Boston contribution of $300,000 to the Strandway project was opposed by Councilors Cox and Norton. The item of $1,000,000 for reconstruction of streets rode through unopposed. Councilor Kelly alone voted against $700,000 for new water main from Roxbury to Dorchester and $1,000,000 for sewers; Councilor Cox opposed the expenditure of $450,000 for a new Wayfarers' Lodge; Cox, Kelly and Norton were recorded as against the item of $1,075,000 for Fire Department improvements; Cox, Fish and Kelly opposed $800,000 for new buildings at Deer Island, and Cox, Kelly and Norton voted against $750,000 for police stations to consolidate Stations 9 and 10 in Roxbury and Station 13 in Jamaica Plain and Station 17 in West Roxbury.

Dowd Opposes Delay

Councilor Kelly of the Committee on Finance wanted the orders referred to that committee, which would hold the matter over for a week before the first reading. Chairman Dowd of the committee announced that he would be placed in the position of doing anything to delay the measures and said there was nothing in the orders with which the Council was not familiar.

Mayor Curley had planned to appear in person before the Council in executive session concerning the supplementary program, but there was so much lengthy debate and argument that the Mayor chose to take a train to Washington to present his plan for enlarging the airport rather than miss it and address the Council.

A crowded gallery of unemployed found considerable of an amusing nature in the arguments. Councilor Norton started the lengthy session with a request that the Law Department answer several questions concerning the lease of Young's Hotel, negotiated by Mayor Curley Saturday.

Councilor Norton characterized it as order, a "bold, brazen affair," and said that it was "wrong and unnecessary" and "the unfairness ever made by the city." Incidentally he complained that the lease cramped Mayor-Elect Frederick W. Mansfield, in that it tied the latter's hands for a year. The outburst by the Hyde Park representative did not develop supporters and the order went to the graveyard of the Council, the Committee on Rules.

Conference Is Proposed

A request from Councilor Norton that Mayor Curley confer with Mayor-Elect Mansfield, who is in Bermuda, regarding the Federal civil works program for the city of Boston, in order to put men to work, started lengthy remarks that occupied considerable time and played a part in the Mayor's failure to appear before the Executive Committee.

The Council went on record, in an order offered by Councilor Barker of East Boston, that it approves the decision of the House regarding legislation to permit taverns.

Mrs. Hannah M. Connors, secretary of the Massachusetts Real Estate Owners' Association, announced last night that her organization is going to make an effort to have Mayor Curley's $45,000 lease of Young's Hotel property cancelled.

"If necessary, we will go to court with a petition signed by 10 taxpayers," Mrs. Connors said. "It seems a shame that the Mayor should have at the last minute added at least another $100,000 to the burden of the taxpayers. The city does not need Young's Hotel. Room for Joe Conry and his gold-headed cane could doubtless have been found elsewhere."

The form of the petition to be brought, Mrs. Connors said, is now being prepared by lawyers.

AT WORK SOON

Before End of This Week, Says U. S. Official

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 (AP)—Out of the big broad-fronted endeavor to put men to work and boost buying power came a prediction today from Harry L. Hopkins, director of the Civil Works Administration, that 2,000,000 men who were receiving relief Nov. 16 would be at work before the end of this week.

He said 1,000,000 men and women had been transferred from relief rolls to pay rolls during the last 10 days.

"The objective of the Civil Works Administration," he said, "is the employment of 4,000,000 persons by Dec. 15."

If the city gives $45,000 for materials. Mayor Murphy was urged to consult with Mayor-elect James Hagan of Somerville on projects to be submitted by the city under the civil works and the public works programs. Asked whether he would suggest such a move to Mayor Curley so that Mayor-elect Frederick W. Mansfield will "know what is going on," Chairman Bartlett laughed and said: "Mr. Mansfield is having a rest and I'm not going to disturb him." The mayor-elect of Boston is vacationing at Bermuda.

Last night Mayor Curley left for Washington where he is to present his plan to expand the East Boston airport by razing the hill on Governor's Island in Boston and using the fill to connect the island with the mainland. The project, the mayor claims, will need 5000 men. The mayor will meet Lt. Francis P. Kendall of the 101st observation squadron, 26th division, who is the representative of the civil works board at a conference to be held with E. L. Vidal, director of the federal aeronautics service of the department of commerce.

The Boston projects necessary to complete the Boston allotment of $2,500,000 under the civil works plan will be presented to Chairman Bartlett today at 11 A. M. Whether the Strandway project in South Boston, which Mayor Curley strongly advocates, will be approved seemed doubtful. Yesterday the city council approved a $300,000 loan order to be added to a civil works grant of $300,000 to begin the project.

The Boston school projects were given swift approval by Bartlett and Hurley.

Keenly aware of school problems, Hurley questioned Supt. Campbell and Chairman Reilly as to the number of persons to be employed. The following list was made out:

One hundred elementary teachers, one to each school district, at $5 a day. One hundred so-called "cadets" or unpaid girls receiving school experience by assisting teachers with extra large classes.

Thirty teachers in evening schools, 20 men and 10 women, $3 an evening, for trade classes.

Thirty-five teachers in day practical arts schools, $3 a session, two days a week. Eighty high school and intermediate school teachers, $6 a day for women and $7 for men.

Two teachers to visit crippled children at home, $6 a day. One hundred and twenty-five girls at $15 a week to do clerical work throughout the system.

Six cataloguers at $25 a week. Supt. Campbell said that the civil works projects will permit the use of all those on the waiting list in Boston, leaving only a small number available for substitute and temporary work. What will happen Feb. 15, when the employment ends, he could not say but he was hopeful the general situation would improve to permit steady employment. He pointed out that the girls will compile reports which the state department of education has been asking for during the last six weeks, but which a small clerical force did not have time to compile.

Chairman Reilly issued the following statement after approval had been granted:

Boston is the first city to have such a plan approved. It has been judged educationally and economically sound. One hundred and eleven men, 17 from the welfare roll and 94 from the ranks of the unemployed of the town, went to work in Belmont yesterday morning on a civil works project. Tomorrow morning there will be 80 more taken from the unemployed and given jobs on another project.

The first project, costing $20,760, is construction of sewers and the second, amounting to $24,256, is the construction of storm drains. The men who went to work yesterday will have their first pay day after tomorrow's work, in order to have money for Thanksgiving, and the regular pay-day will be Saturday.

$850,000 PROJECTS APPROVED

Post-11-29-32
Cities and Towns Are Urged to Find More and More Jobs

BY JOHN GRIFFIN

The Civil Works Board yesterday approved city and town projects amounting to more than $850,000 and designed to put more than 4500 men and women to work in the next few days.

At the same time the board expressed disapproval of the attitude of many towns which have not yet come forward with projects, and declared that the unemployed men and women in those towns will probably soon demand an accounting from their officials.

The board also asserted that some cities which have received approvals have not yet put enough men to work, and must think up other projects that will reduce the ranks of the unemployed. Appeals were issued to county commissions to initiate projects to put men to work, and the appointments of the sheriffs as civil works administrators in the counties was announced.

To add to the general improvement in employment, the Public Works Board, the membership of which is also the membership of the Civil Works Board, approved projects totalling $5,550,000 for the city of Boston. These projects now only await the approval of the administration at Washington. They constitute more than half of the Boston maximum, and are to be carried out on a basis of a 70 per cent loan from the federal government and a 30 per cent grant.

Boston Projects

The projects include: $1,000,000 for reconstruction of streets, $2,000,000 for a new high school in West Roxbury and a new intermediate school in South Boston, $1,500,000 for a new hospital building and repairs to present hospital buildings, $1,000,000 for the replacement of sewers and $350,000 for a new water main in Brookline avenue.

The session was enlivened by three protests, two of which charged that administrators in Grafton and Randolph were using unjustified methods. The Randolph charge was dismissed after an investigation by State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, and the Grafton investigation will be completed today.

The first protest against the putting through of a civil works project came from George F. Willett of Norwood, who opposed a plan, already tentatively approved, for the extension of Pleasant street, Norwood to the new State highway. The views of the town planning board will be sought before final approval is given.

Problem in Psychology

A strange problem in psychology is facing the board and seems difficult of solution. That is the difficulty in trying to convince Mayors and Selectmen that they should spend all the money they can. Most of the municipal officials are striving to spend as little as possible, and when the members of the board direct them to find more projects and put more people to work and ask for more money from the board, they stand amazed.

Yet, that is just what the board is aiming at, and Mayor Curley has been told that $5,000 must be put to work in Boston, the board asserting him that the government will provide the money. The same situation arose yesterday when Mayor Charles S. Ashley of New Bedford presented projects and obtained approval for the expenditure of $140,000 to employ 1000 men.

He was told that he would have to find projects to put 2000 men to work. "You have got to get 2000 to work pretty soon," Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett said, "regardless of the cost, except of course, on the question of materials." Mayor Ashley said he would act immediately, though he appeared nonplussed at the order. Chairman Bartlett directed him to have more applications in by next Monday.

"New Bedford will meet your requirements," Mayor Ashley declared as he left. Boston received approvals for civil works projects calling for an expenditure of $103,000 and for the employment of 254 men. These included $53,897 for repairing buildings at the Long Island Hospital, for 150 men; $6373 for administration of civil works projects, 25 employees; $9720 for repairs to voting booths, 22 employees; $7200 for checking tax accounts, 44 employees; $19,000.25 for courthouse repairs, 35 employees, and $2800 for consolidation of vital statistics, 18 employees.

An effort to obtain a change in regulations so that men and women can be hired for short-time jobs was made when the board sent a telegram to Washington asking for advice. The present regulations state that those employed must be assured work until Feb. 15.

Projects Not Approved

One of the Boston projects which the board declined to approve called for the employment of 68 persons in the statistics department for a check-up system on all persons having official contacts with the city. This would include persons receiving tax abatements, those on the welfare list and others. Chairman Bartlett declared that the inclusion of names of those receiving tax abatements would not be approved, and he said that the recording of names of welfare recipients for public inspection was against the law.

A planning board housing project was not approved, because the chairman felt that the problem was being handled by the State Housing Commission. There will be a later conference on the question. A third project which failed of approval was for a disbursing programme, which the board held was not necessary.

Sheriffs will be notified today to get in touch with the board for instructions on the positions as county administrators, and they will be asked to give some thought to possible projects under county auspices. Charles F. Howard, chairman of the State Commission on Administration and Finance, was named co-ordinator for State projects. All projects advanced by State departments will be referred to him before approval is given.

Plans for Teachers

State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley consulted with school officials in connection with the effort he is making to extend plans for the employment of school teachers. He suggested that local school organizations get together and draw up programmes for presentation to school committees, with complete roll call votes in those bodies on all projects submitted. The board feels, it was explained, that there is plenty of opportunity for the employment of teachers in almost every section of the State.

A batch of projects was presented by the Metropolitan District Commission calling for the employment of 450 men. These included construction of a road in the Blue Hills from Administration road to Granite avenue, improving the shore of the Mystic River from the Somerville bath house to the Wellington bridge, grading the overpass on the Revere Beach boulevard at Broadway, Revere, and grading the westerly and southerly slopes of Bunker Hill.

State Public Works Projects

Twenty-five projects submitted by the State department of public works, calling for the expenditure of $150,000 and the employment of 850 men, were approved.

The following projects were included: Lynnfield, catch basin outlets, 20 men. Rutland, removing dead trees and widening slopes, 15 men.

Lakeville, loaming State road slopes, 13 men.

Holden, widening State road, 18 men.

Worcester, eliminating blind curve 7 men.

Lynn, drainage from State road, 40 men.

Bourne, loaming, 20 men.

Chatham, repairs to shore front, 23 men.

Boston, removing hulks in Boston Harbor, 104 men.

Middleton, grading, 11 men.

Concord, drainage, 12 men.
Tewksbury, drainage, 24 men.
Milbury, road widening and removing rails, 65 men.
Canton, widening ditches, 15 men.
Billerica, drainage, 15 men.
Somerset, road work, 48 men.
Bridgewater, road work, 13 men.
Plymouth, road work, 15 men.
Yarmouth, drainage, 18 men.
Kingston, loaming, 13 men.
Berkeley, road beautification, 26 men.
Williamstown, water drains, 20 men.
Weymouth, ditch work, 20 men.
South Hadley, curve widening, 20 men.

North Andover, drainage, 65 men.
Montague, drainage, 40 men.
Hamilton, excavation and graveling, 40 men.

Paxton, removing dead trees, three men.

The men employed in the projects will be hired in the various cities and towns where the work is to be done.

CHARGES UNFOUNDED

Complaints That Illegal Methods Were Used in Randolph and Grafton in Handling Applicants for Jobs Investigated

Complaints that civil works supervisors in Randolph and Grafton were using unfair and illegal methods in handling applicants for jobs under the civil works programme, created a stir at a meeting of the Civil Works Board yesterday. An immediate investigation was ordered, and before nightfall, one of the officials had been cleared, and the other had strongly denied the charges.

The complaint against Charles R. Powers of Randolph, supervisor of a department of agriculture project under the civil works, had employed his own son and used some of the men working in his own dairy on the civil works job, was dismissed after Charles Cleary, a State investigator, had reported to State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, who was in charge of the investigation for the board.

Today Cleary will go to Grafton, where Wilfred E. Prue, civil works administrator, is charged with influencing applicants for jobs to trade in a certain store. Prue yesterday confronted the board and denied the accusation, saying that it was brought about by local jealousies.

Powers, who comes from a prominent Randolph family, and who holds the post of town animal inspector, admitted without hesitation that he had put his 19-year-old son at work on the project, explaining that since he was unemployed, county and town officials had told him it was all right.

Jealousy was given as the reason for the complaints. Powers said that a certain man had gone to the county authorities who are handling the apple maggot eradication under the State Department of Agriculture and had tried to get his job from him.

Others who know nothing of the art of swinging an axe had also looked for jobs. Powers said, explaining that since he could only hire three men, it was not possible to hire everyone that wanted work.

TWO SHIFTS BECAUSE OF TOOL SHORTAGE

Inability to get a sufficient amount of tools and equipment to carry on CWA projects has caused them to adopt a plan under which two shifts of men, each working five hours a day, six days a week, carry on the work, according to Medford officials.

The plan was put into operation yesterday. More than 500 men, now at work on projects, were divided into two shifts, one working from 7 o'clock in the morning until noon, and the other working from noon until 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

Present New Evidence to Reopen Bearse Case

BARNSTABLE, Nov. 28.—State police officials will go before Judge Thomas Otis in the local District Court tomorrow and present new evidence which is expected to result in the reopening of the slaying by run runners a year ago of Franklin Bearse, Osterville baseball player and father of three children.

2,000,000 NEEDY IN JOBS THIS WEEK

Civil Works Fund Will Last Until Mid-February; Look to Congress

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28 (A. P.)—Out of the broad-fronted endeavor to put men to work and boost buying power came a prediction today from Harry L. Hopkins, director of the Civil Works Administration, that 2,000,000 men who were receiving relief on Nov. 16 would be at work before the end of this week. He said 1,000,000 men and women had been transferred from relief rolls to pay rolls during the last 10 days.

"The objective of the Civil Works Administration," he said, "is the employment of 4,000,000 persons by Dec. 15."

Hopkins said the $400,000,000 allotted to the civil works organization by the Public Works Administration would last until about the middle of next February and that "whether the jobs go on after that time will depend upon the action of Congress."

During the day the Administration assigned 6562 men to seal 21,400 abandoned coal mines in the Ohio river basin to protect public water supplies.

In the meantime, public works officials indicated this administration might need more money in the next few months.

Congress voted $3,300,000,000 for public works and only about $438,000,000 remains unallotted. About $600,000,000 is actually under contract on Federal projects and $200,000,000 under contract advertisement.

$26,543,053 FOR NEW WORK

71 Non-Federal Projects to Provide 161,249 Man Months

WASHINGTON, Dec. 1 (AP)—The public works administration today allotted $26,543,053 for 71 non-federal projects in 25 states and Hawaii, which officials said would provide 161,249 man-months of employment.

The largest allocation was $11,900,000 to the Delaware river joint commission of Pennsylvania and New Jersey for construction and equipment of a rapid transit shuttle line across the Delaware river bridge between Philadelphia and Camden.

Other large allocations included $2,100,000 to Westchester county, New York, for sewers; $1,650,000 to Onondaga, N. Y., for sewers; $1,326,000 to Chicago for schools and $1,500,000 to Jefferson City, Mo., for roads.

Rhode Island—Providence, loaned and grants, streets, $522,333, sewage, $475,000.
Connecticut—State of Connecticut, grants, roads, $67,400; Enfield, grant, road, $42,000.

Massachusetts—Worcester, loan and grant, water supply, $135,000; Lexington, grant, water supply, $11,000.

The loan and grant of $139,000 to Worcester, Mass., is for construction of a 24-inch high pressure water main approximately 8000 feet long on Park avenue from Pleasant street to Pratt street. Thirty per cent. of the labor and material costs, totalling approximately $109,000, is a grant, the balance a loan secured by 4 per cent. general obligation bonds. Work can start in one month and the PWA said it would give 150 men employment for six months.

The grant of $11,000 to Lexington, Mass., is to aid in the erection of a 1,000,000-gallon elevated steel tank and installation of 3000 feet of 10-inch and 12-inch water mains. No loan was requested, and the allotment represents 30 per cent. of the labor and material cost on the project which cost a total of $41,810. The town will provide the necessary balance. Work can start in one month and the PWA estimated it would give 45 men employment for four months.

Library Aids Get First CWA Salaries

Today was Boston's first CWA pay day, the Public Library having issued $487.50 worth of checks to 47 women who spent the first three days of the week in repacking the library catalog cards. This was the first CWA payroll in the city.

There are now 60 CWA workers in the library department, and it is hoped to increase this number to 319 by next Friday. Of these, 235 will be "white collar" workers.

The department is having some difficulty in putting people to work as fast as is desired because the work to be done requires certain training or experience, it was explained.

The first Boston CWA payroll, $487.50, to be paid 47 women, was made up at the Public Library today and forwarded to Walter McCarthy, civil works administrator. The cash will be paid at 2 P. M. tomorrow at 581 Boylston street. It is believed to be the first "white collar" payroll in the state under the CWA.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 1 (AP)—The civil works administration announced today that "approximately 1,250,000" were put on the civil works payroll during the first week of operation.

44 STATES REPORT

Reports to Harry L. Hopkins from 44 states and the District of Columbia were that 1,183,267 were employed as of November 25.

New Mexico, North Dakota, Massachusetts and Minnesota have not reported and Hopkins said their reports probably will bring the total to 1,250,000.

Oklahoma during the first week completed its entire quota under the program designed to give jobs to 4,000,000 persons throughout the country.

That state put 101,000 persons on civil works jobs, and Hopkins said today there are no more jobs for Oklahoma.

FIGURES BY STATES

The states reporting and the number of men placed on jobs follows:

Alabama, 37,170; Arizona, 6279; Arkansas, 17,180; California, 20,500; Colorado, 19,331; Connecticut, 4711; Delaware, 794; District of Columbia, 90.

Florida, 45,865; Georgia, 71,483; Idaho, 1000; Illinois, 47,920; Indiana, 23,804;

Iowa, 14,689; Kansas, 32,084; Kentucky, 1113; Louisiana, 37,940; Maine, 691;

Maryland, 7839; Michigan, 42,000; Mississippi, 19,814; Missouri, 5121; Montana, 6343; Nebraska, 8000; Nevada, 250; New Hampshire, 3179; New Jersey, 17,750; New York, 163,083; North Carolina, 5686; Ohio, 58,047; Oklahoma, 101,000;

Oregon, 5067; Pennsylvania, 37,441; Rhode Island, 8060; South Carolina, 38,178; South Dakota, 7661; Tennessee, 30,190; Texas, 133,889; Utah, 2801;

Vermont, 3060; Virginia, 5642; Washington, 19,849; West Virginia, 22,535;

Wisconsin, 40,000; and Wyoming, 700.

Total, 1,183,267.

RAILROADS CO-OPERATE

Relief rolls in October increased 2 per cent. over September. Preliminary figures showed that 2,851,804 families on relief rolls at the end of October as compared with 2,794,640 at the end of the previous month.

The railroads have agreed to haul merchandise designed for relief distribution at reduced rates beginning today. The eastern roads are granting a reduction of 25 per cent. from the regular commercial rates on all merchandise except coal and coke. On coal and coke the reduction is 20 per cent.

However, a minimum charge of $15 per car to pay for road haul service is to be made.

The western and southeastern railroads already were subject to reduction of from 35 to 40 per cent. on federal government shipments under the federal land grant and bond aid clause and because of this no further reductions are being asked.

Bartlett Ready to Turn Them Over to State Unless Municipalities Hasten Plans

Giving away millions of dollars in Massachusetts is not such a simple task as one might expect. With a great supply of Federal funds to draw from, the State Civil Works Board is experiencing much difficulty in granting outright to the cities and towns of the Commonwealth funds to create 97,000 jobs before the 15th of this month.

So far only a little more than one-third of the quota of jobs for the Bay State have been created, and the first rush of applications for funds seems to be over.

"Jobs are what we want to see," Chairman Bartlett emphatically tells each Mayor and town official who comes before him with proposed projects. "You make the jobs, we

Local Plan Best for Town

The creation of jobs in communities all over the State seems to be lagging, and members of the Civil Works Board are afraid that measures will have to be taken if cities the State and counties, which will use the money and hire the men. In this case, however, the benefit of the work, instead of accruing to the town, will go wherever the State or county officials decide it will do the most good.

Already tentative nomination of Chairman Charles P. Howard, of the State Commission of Administration and Finance, has been made by Chairman Bartlett, to coordinate State projects. Mr. Howard has been working with State department heads in this capacity for some time. The County Commissioners of each county have been notified that they are county administrators for the Civil Works, and are to take immediate steps in preparation of county civil works projects in an attempt to fill the 97,000 job quota.

Others Besides Manual Labor

Chairman Bartlett told a Globe reporter last night that the fine work the newspapers have been doing in covering the Civil Works Administration has helped him immeasurably in putting the program across as far as it has gone.

He agreed that publication in concise form of suggestions which he and Federal Administrator Hopkins as well as members of his board have made would serve possibly to clear up problems in the minds of the city and town officials throughout the State.

"In the first place," he says, "the smaller towns are not adequately creating jobs for the white collar worker and the skilled worker. Only in the larger cities throughout the State, and in a few towns have projects calling for other than manual labor been proposed."

"Almost Limitless" Chances

A tentative outline of types of work, which was made by Federal Administrator Harvey L. Hopkins recently, and recommended by Bartlett, include the following: clerical and professional, pest control, parks and playground improvement, sanitation, highways, protection of water supply, general public improvements, repair and rehabilitation of public utilities, handling of relief supplies.

Hopkins said: "The variety of researches that can be made is almost limitless. Committees can be set up to make scientific studies of almost every important problem facing communities today. Politics, economics, agriculture, engineering, traffic, sanitation, health, water supply and utilities are all excellent."

Chairman Bartlett adds to this list by naming adult and vocational education, such as Boston has already taken advantage of; white-collar workers to augment regular staffs in playgrounds and in cultural centers; painting, cleaning and rehabilitation of public buildings. Chairman Bartlett also pointed out that in many cities and towns novel projects which will prove of great worth have already been put into operation. A plan still awaiting final approval from Washington, suggested by State Treasurer Charles Hurley for the Boston school men, involves buying new books to bring school libraries up to date, give printers and allied tradesmen work and protect the health of the children.

Reading has advanced plans to eradicate poison ivy in the town; Marlboro is clearing fields of stones; Lexington is improving playgrounds; the State Department of Agriculture is fighting blaster rust. Supt. of Schools Patrick T. Campbell of this city has received approval of a project calling for extra school teachers.

Other towns will consolidate marriage and death records, make lists of people who have connections with the town, start researches into all types of town problems, and create other jobs for both the laborer and the white-collar man.

The State Board will resume hearings at 11 o'clock this morning.

Total Jobs Offered, 129,000

Massachusetts should feel that she is being well taken care of by the civil works program, said Mr. Bartlett last night. Besides the 97,000 jobs which it is the duty of the municipalities to make and the board to approve, there will be from 30,000 to 35,000 additional jobs made by Federal projects, to be carried out on Government property.

"This is true all over the country," he explained. "The number of persons to be employed by the State Civil Works Boards is 75 percent of the total. In Massachusetts this figure is out to 97,000 to be recruited for our jobs, and about 32,000 more for Federal jobs, bringing the entire total up to 129,000."

With the first of December here, the perplexing problem of the 50-50 division on civil works jobs, half from the "welfare lists and half from the registered unemployed, is over. "It will be a strict 50-50 division as far as is possible from now on," Chairman Bartlett stated.

SALEM WILL START 500 ON CIVILIAN WORK JOBS TODAY

SALEM, Nov. 30.—When the local Civil Works program gets under way here tomorrow morning 500 men will go to work on playground improvement, sewer repair, drainage and waterworks. Before the end of the week the number will be increased to 800, according to Mayor George J. Bates.

Additional work will include building of a municipal garage and remodeling of the old Town Hall. The workmen will be divided equally, half from welfare lists and half from registered unemployed.

For general welfare purposes the city will continue to raise funds by contributions of 10 percent of the salaries of city employees.

BOARD TO HEAR MAYOR-ELECT

Boston Herald 12-1-33
Mansfield Will Attend as Curley Presents $6,000,000
Program

Refreshed by his post-election vacation in Bermuda, Mayor-elect Frederick W. Mansfield arrived in Boston last night and announced his intention of being present when Mayor Curley presents a $6,000,000 public works program to the state emergency finance board today.

The mayor-elect will have no official standing before the board, but Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the board, has indicated that he will give serious consideration of any opinion voiced by him as the future chief executive of the city. Mansfield is reported to hold strong views on certain projects, particularly as Boston must raise 70 percent of the money to obtain a federal State free grant of 30 percent.

The emergency finance board has approved projects totalling $5,850,000 out of major projects reviewed, Bartlett going so far as to ask that the number of persons to be employed on one project be tripled or quadrupled if possible. Projects costing $84,112 to provide employment for 274 men were approved.

Figures released by the board late last night showed that, as of Sunday last, projects furnishing employment for 63,983 persons had been approved, the federal government contracting to pay a labor bill of $10,777,287.90 and a material bill of $1,785,048.28. Cities and towns presenting the projects agreed to contribute $2,259,945.45. This brings the total CWA money available to $14,822,281.60.

Sharp warning was given Mayor O'Neill of Everett to get busy assigning welfare recipients to work. Because of political differences, it was said, there has been a delay in getting men to work, although several projects presented by the city officials have been approved. Because of complaints, Chairman Bartlett telephoned the mayor and demanded action. He was told that political differences would be swept aside and men put to work today or tomorrow.

Bartlett was in touch by telephone with CWA officials in Washington. He could not obtain a ruling on the project submitted by the Boston school committee to employ 400 teachers, but did learn that Col. Harry Hopkin, federal civil works administrator, is sympathetic.

Those who represented Boston at the hearing were Mayor Curley, Dr. Charles F. Willinsky, deputy health commissioner; Patrick T. Campbell, superintendent of schools; Alexander M. Sullivan, business manager of the school committee; Miss Elizabeth Herlihy, secretary of the city planning board; Mark E. Mulvey, schoolhouse custodian; Charles J. Fox, budget commissioner; Walter V. McCarthy, executive director of the welfare department and civil works administrator for the city.

Willinsky's project to have 677 men make an unemployment census of Boston with relation to health and incidence of disease was taken up with Washington by Bartlett, who reported that the federal officials "do not want people disturbed by visitors from several divisions of government, because either the state or the national government plans to make such a survey."

Bartlett seized on the deputy health commissioner's plan to increase by eight the number of dental hygienists now teaching care of the teeth, and flipped the papers back and suggested that the number of hygienists be augmented so that all the 65,000 children without such care be handled before Feb. 15. Chairs in the Tufts Dental School, Harvard Dental School and Forsythe Infirmary will be utilized to widen the scope of the project.

To Supt. Campbell the chairman explained that despite his earnest request for speedy action on teacher projects, he had not been advised of his authority in the matter by headquarters at Washington. He pointed out that he personally favored the teacher employment projects, and understood Col. Hopkins was sympathetic. He has sent a strong letter urging the projects and hopes for action. Meanwhile, 400 teachers in Boston will remain until Friday.

Just before leaving Mayor Curley explained that a survey by Dr. Victor Safford had disclosed that certain neighborhoods in the city will always have "sore spots" until private alleys are cleaned. The mayor asked permission to employ men to "scrape and clean the eight inches of mud and spread gravel and a little tar" so that the health of citizens may be safe-guarded. Bartlett indicated he would approve when the project was brought before him tomorrow.

In a few quick sentences the chairman and Park Commissioner Long buried the South Boston strandway project, which was to cost $950,000. When the chairman showed a desire to tackle that unless the project could be completed as a whole its value would be lost. The project was killed.

Led by Maj. Paul H. Hines, who suggested the highway safety survey, experts from Massachusetts Institute of Technology appeared before the chairman to place the institution on record as willing to undertake the job if Gov. Ely makes such a request. Those present were Maj. Hines, Dr. Vannevar Bush, vice-president of the institute; Col. R. C. Eddy and Prof. Erwin Shell of the faculty, and Edward A. Ekdahl.

Dr. Bush said Technology would go into the scheme only because the school officials felt it would be a public benefit, that Technology in such cases feels it a public obligation to undertake such work when requested. He emphasized that Technology would not become involved in a squabble with organizations now doing such work in part, but would co-operate and correlate the efforts of all.

Impressed with the arguments of Maj. Hines, who stressed that the survey would not be a traffic survey but a scientific attempt to find the causes of accidents, Chairman Bartlett agreed to see Gov. Ely after he had been told that Prof. Miller McCintock, who directed the famous traffic survey in Boston, had vigorously endorsed the plan when questioned by the Technology officials.

State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, a member of the civil works board, questioning Maj. Hines about the injuries to 60,000 school children between 1927 and 1932, stated that additional police at busy intersections would reduce accidents involving children.

Congresswoman Edith Nourse Rogers visited Chairman Bartlett with Mrs. Joseph W. Green of Lowell, who spoke of a sewing project for women in Lowell. Mrs. Green said that 800 unemployed women had registered in Lowell. Even as she spoke, the sewing project and others were being presented to a deputy board of the civil works administration by Mayor Charles Slowe of Lowell, and were approved.

Advices from Washington received yesterday informed Chairman Bartlett that his board will authorize federal CWA projects in this state, and will approve the disposition of men and money. William B. Coy, Boston banker and third member of the civil works board, will be in charge of the financial end of the projects in this state.

Dr. Vannevar Bush, vice-president of Technology, promised that the institution would accept the offer if it is made.

The dove of peace fluttered about the state treasurer's office in the State House yesterday as Bartlett considered the supplementary civil works projects submitted by Mayor Curley. Cities and towns presenting the projects agreed to contribute $2,258,945.45. This brings the total CWA money available to $14,822,281.60.

Sharp warning was given Mayor O'Neill of Everett to get busy assigning welfare recipients to work. Because of political differences, it was said, there has been a delay in getting men to work, although several projects presented by the city officials have been approved. Because of complaints, Chairman Bartlett telephoned the mayor and demanded action. He was told that political differences would be swept aside and men put to work today or tomorrow.

Bartlett was in touch by telephone with CWA officials in Washington. He could not obtain a ruling on the project submitted by the Boston school committee to employ 400 teachers, but did learn that Col. Harry Hopkin, federal civil works administrator, is sympathetic.

Those who represented Boston at the hearing were Mayor Curley, Dr. Charles F. Willinsky, deputy health commissioner; Patrick T. Campbell, superintendent of schools; Alexander M. Sullivan, business manager of the school committee; Miss Elizabeth Herlihy, secretary of the city planning board; Mark B. Mulvey, schoolhouse custodian; Charles J. Fox, budget commissioner; Walter V. McCarthy, executive director of the welfare department and civil works administrator for the city.

Willinsky's project to have 677 men make an unemployment census of Boston with relation to health and incidence of disease was taken up with Washington by Bartlett, who reported that the federal officials "do not want people disturbed by visitors from several divisions of government, because either the state or the national government plans to make such a survey."

Bartlett seized on the deputy health commissioner's plan to increase by now teaching care of the teeth, and cleaning teeth of school children. He pointed out that the number of hygienists be augmented so that all the 65,000 children without such care be handled before Feb. 15. Chairs in the Tufts Dental School, Harvard Dental School and Forsythe Infirmary will be utilized to widen the scope of the project.

To Supt. Campbell the chairman explained that despite his earnest request for speedy action on teacher projects, he had not been advised of his authority in the matter by headquarters at Washington. He pointed out that he personally favored the teacher employment projects, and understood Col. Hopkins letter urging the projects and hopes for action. Meanwhile, 400 teachers in Boston will remain until Friday.

Just before leaving Mayor Curley explained that a survey by Dr. Victor Safford had disclosed that certain neighborhoods in the city will always have "sore spots" until private alleys are cleaned. The mayor asked permission to employ men to "scrape and clean the eight inches of mud and spread gravel and a little tar" so that the health of citizens may be safeguarded. Bartlett indicated he would approve when the project was brought before him tomorrow.

In a few quick sentences the chairman and Park Commissioner Long buried the South Boston strandway project, which was to cost $950,000. When the chairman showed a desire to tackle it piecemeal to give work, Long declared that unless the project could be completed as a whole its value would be lost. The project was killed.

Led by Maj. Paul H. Hines, who suggested the highway safety survey, experts from Massachusetts Institute of Technology appeared before the chairman to place the institution on record as willing to undertake the job if Gov. Ely makes such a request. Those present were Maj. Hines, Dr. Vannevar Bush, vice-president of the institute; Col. R. C. Eddy and Prof. Erwin Shell of the faculty, and Edward A. Ekdahl.

Dr. Bush said Technology would go into the scheme only because the school officials felt it would be a public benefit, that Technology in such cases feels it a public obligation to undertake such work when requested. He emphasized that Technology would not become involved in a squabble with organizations now doing such work in part, but would co-operate and correlate the efforts of all.

Impressed with the arguments of Maj. Hines, who stressed that the survey would not be a traffic survey but a scientific attempt to find the causes of accidents, Chairman Bartlett agreed to see Gov. Ely after he had been told that Prof. Miller McClintock, who directed the famous traffic survey in Boston, had vigorously endorsed the plan when questioned by the Technology officials.

State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, a member of the civil works board, questioning Maj. Hines about the injuries to 60,000 school children between 1927 and 1932, stated that additional police at busy intersections would reduce accidents involving children.

Congresswoman Edith Nourse Rogers visited Chairman Bartlett with Mrs. Joseph W. Green of Lowell, who spoke of a sewing project for women in Lowell. Mrs. Green said that 800 unemployed women had registered in Lowell. Even as she spoke, the sewing project and others were being presented to a deputy board of the civil works administration by Mayor Charles Slowey of Lowell, and were approved.

Advices from Washington received yesterday informed Chairman Bartlett that his board will authorize federal CWA projects in this state, and will approve the disposition of men and money. William B. Coy, Boston banker and third member of the civil works board, will be in charge of the financial end of the projects in this state.

$1,255,733 TO NEW ENGLAND

Worcester and Lexington to Lay Water Mains
Providence Allotments From Federal Funds for Streets

By CHARLES S. GROVES
WASHINGTON, Dec. 1.—Allotments totaling $26,543,053 for 71 non-Federal projects were announced today by the Public Works Administration. Today's allotments provide 161,249 more months of direct employment scattered through 25 States and Hawaii. The New England allotments, totaling $1,255,733, include three distinct projects, totaling $996,333, for Providence and are as follows:
Providence—Loan and grant for $158,700, for use in resurfacing with asphalt of three city streets. Thirty percent of the cost of labor and material, which totals approximately $138,000, is a grant. The balance is a loan secured by 4 percent general obligation bonds. Work can start in one month and be completed in six months, giving 180 men employment during construction.

To Improve 24 Streets

Also loan and grant for $362,633 to the city for construction of 10 city streets with penetration macadam, one new street with sheet asphalt on concrete base, rebuilding four streets with penetration macadam, seven streets with sheet asphalt on concrete base and two streets with sheet asphalt on present concrete base. Thirty percent of the cost of labor and material, which totals approximately $307,700, is a grant. The balance is a loan secured by 4 percent general obligation bonds. Work can start in one month and be completed in six months, giving 380 men employment during construction. Also loan and grant for $475,000 to the city for the construction of an addition to the present sewage disposal plant of a compressor room, settling tank and 20 aeration tanks. Thirty percent of the cost of labor and material, which totals approximately $371,000, is a grant. The balance is a loan secured by 4 percent general obligation bonds. Work can start in 10 days and be completed in nine months, giving 100 men employment during construction.

Lexington Tank and Mains

Worcester—Loan and grant for $139,000 for the construction of a 24-inch high pressure water main, approximately 5000 lineal feet, along Park av from Pleasant st to Pratt st. Thirty percent of the cost of labor and material, which totals approximately $109,000, is a grant. The balance is a loan secured by 4 percent general obligation bonds. Work can start in one month and be completed in six months, giving 150 men employment during construction.

Lexington—Grant of $11,000 to Lexington, to aid in the erection of a 1,600,000 gallon elevated steel tank and installation of approximately 3000 lineal feet of 10-inch and 12-inch water mains. No loan was requested. The allotment represents 30 percent of the cost of labor and material on the project, of which the total cost is $41,810. The balance will be furnished by the applicant from other revenues. Work can start in one month and be completed in four months, giving 45 men employment during construction.

BARTLETT ASKS CITIES, TOWNS FOR PROJECTS

Total of $20,000,000
May Be Had if the Jobs Are Speeded

Refreshed by their first day of test since the State Civil Works Board was organized, its members today resumed their efforts to provide jobs with a new impetus which is expected to have every city and town in Massachusetts putting men and women to work.

The holiday provided the members of the board, who have been working day and night, Sundays included, with their first day of rest. As a result no additional allotments have been made but the board will plunge into this work again today, determined to make up for the lost time.

WORK FOR THOUSANDS

Chairman Joseph E. Bartlett said the state's allotment for the federal civil work fund might reach $20,000,000. The amount was tentatively set at $12,000,000 but no definite sum has been announced as the limit for Massachusetts.

Should this increase in the allotment be correct, thousands of additional unemployed men will be put to work under the civil works program, it is understood. This will naturally save various communities large amounts which would ordinarily be used in welfare disbursements.

Chairman Bartlett pointed out that the attitude of the cities and towns would have a great deal to do with the amount of money which the State will be allotted. He said that if less than $20,000,000 comes to the State it will be because an insufficient number of projects have been developed. He declared that any city or town presenting a worthwhile project for approval, could be assured it would be accepted and the funds furnished if the project was presented before Dec. 15.

ONE-THIRD WORKING

Chairman Bartlett and his board have repeatedly emphasized the fact that the main idea of the program, as far as Massachusetts is concerned, is to get 97,000 persons to work. More than one-third of that number have already been put to work in various communities.

No estimate has yet been made of the net savings to various welfare departments as a result of the civil works program. It is understood that much of the gross saving has been used to furnish the city or town's share of the costs of materials. As a result the net savings will be small.

$150,000 Allotted to Lexington, Worcester

The Public Works Administration today allotted $11,000 to Lexington for use in connection with its water supply and $139,000 to Worcester for work from Washington. These are two of 71 allotments totalling $26,543,053 made today.

Today was pay day for CWA workers in Lynn, too. City Treasurer Frank A. Turnbull announced he would pay out approximately $20,000 to 1000 workers by noon tomorrow. The first of them received checks this afternoon.

He also announced that all CWA jobs in the city have been exhausted. There is now a waiting list of 2700 men and 1000 women.

Projects involving employment of 51,290 persons in Massachusetts had been approved when the State Civil Works Board adjourned late last evening after one of its longest and busiest sessions.

Increased activity on the part of town and city officials, appropriation of State department projects, further large grants to the city of Boston and announcement of extensive Federal projects to be carried out in Government property, helped to swell the totals at the State House yesterday.

Approval was given to Mayor Curly for a list of projects calling for an expenditure of more than $500,000 and for the employment of 2600 more persons, including many white collar workers.

Fort Devens Project

Announcement was made by Civil Works Board member William B. Coy that more than $450,000 had been allotted by the Federal Civil Works Board for employment of more than 1000 men in improving Fort Devens, Fort Banks, the Springfield Army and the seacoast defense units of Boston and New Bedford. It was also announced that Washington looked favorably on a project for the 1st Corps Area and other Federal property projects located in Massachusetts, calling for additional thousands of dollars and creating thousands of jobs.

The State Division of Fisheries and Game yesterday received appropriate

PWA Broken Down, Says Smith; Nursing Grudge, Ickes Replies

Ex-Governor Charges CWA Merely Smoke-Screen to Hide Failure of Bigger Works Program

NEW YORK, Nov. 30 (AP)—Alfred E. Smith said today the public works administration has broken down and that the civil works program was set up to hide its failure, to which Secretary Ickes, public works administrator, promptly replied from Washington:

"It is impossible to satisfy any man who is nourishing a grudge as the result of disappointed ambitions."

"Instead of acknowledging the failure of the public works administration," said the former Governor, "this crazy, top-heavy structure, choked with red tape and bureaucracy is being left as it is, and out of it is being created the civil works administration to raise relief wages and get more people to work during the winter."

"Half way between a lemon and an orange is a grapefruit; half way between a public work and a relief work is a civil work. Up to now the federal establishments only recently scheduled for consolidation, have been increased to include an AAA, an FCA, a PWA, an FERA, an NRA, a CCC, a TVA, an HOLC, an RFC—and now we have a CWA."

"It looks as though one of the absent minded professors had played anagrams with the alphabet soup. The soup got cold while he was unconsciously inventing a new game for the nation, a game which beats the crossword puzzle—the game of identifying new departments by their initials."

Smith's attack was made in an editorial in the New Outlook, the same issue of which contained his demand for "sound money" and a return to the gold standard, made public last week.

To effect the civil works program, the editorial said, Harry Hopkins "has been given a new title and $400,000,000 of Mr. Ickes's money, and has been instructed to take 2,000,000 men from relief work and put them on civil works and to put 2,000,000 more men on new civil works projects to be devised overnight."

"No one has as yet described just what a civil works project is, except that it is some sort of minor construction or repair work which does not require the service of a contractor, which can be finished before Feb. 15 when the money gives out, and which does not involve a great deal of supervision or material."

"One thing is obvious, and that is that without a complete reorganization of the public works administration there will be no more public works under way on Feb. 15 to absorb the civil workers than there are today to absorb the relief workers. The more we string out the public works program, the less men are employed at any one time, and the surer we are not to put enough priming in the industrial pump to get it working by itself."

"I have the greatest possible sympathy with increasing the wages of present underpaid relief workers. I enthusiastically endorse the idea of putting more men to work. I am for a five day week rather than a three day week, and for paying skilled laborers the prevailing rate rather than paying them as ditch diggers, but I cannot for the life of me see how worthwhile projects, midway between public works and made work, can be devised overnight, or how this hastily conceived civil works program can lead ultimately to anything but confusion."

"This program cannot benefit the heavy industries. It cannot produce much that is valuable between now and Feb. 15. It will certainly lead the localities more and more to dump their entire relief program on the central government. It will certainly discourage the private building industry."

TO 'DISLOCATE' WAGES

"It will certainly dislocate wages in thousands of communities and further discourage private initiative. It will certainly cause men who are now loafing on made work with nothing to work with or at, to loaf more hours. If the rule giving an absolute preference to veterans with dependents is carried out, there are whole regions where no man below 35 years of age will even be eligible for appointment."

"The civil works program will certainly afford an alibi for the incompetents in the public works administration, and will perpetuate the delay and red tape which are holding back and bedeviling the real public works program. The public works crew can now take a long winter's nap, undisturbed by the necessity of issuing statements as to how many hundreds of millions of new projects have been approved, and as to why more men are not at work."

Asking why others have not raised these objections, Smith said:

"The answer is very simple. No sane local official who has hung up an empty stocking over the municipal fireplace is going to shoot Santa Claus just before a hard Christmas."

As long as the gifts are going to be distributed anyway, who will be fool enough not to take his share? Some day we shall find out how much it cost to install Santa Claus in the civil works administration.

"The public works administration has functioned efficiently to date in spite of Mr. Smith and will survive this latest outburst. The civil works administration was a logical development of the public works program. Its conception denoted real statesmanship."

"It was designed to and in fact is taking up the slack in employment that in the nature of things the public works administration could not hope to reach. The people understand thoroughly what is the matter with Mr. Smith. Even those who love him have delighted to follow him in the past feel too deep a pity for him to want to engage in any personal controversy."

RASKOB EXPLAINS

NEW YORK, Nov. 30 (AP)—John J. Raskob, former Democratic national chairman and one of the financiers of the Empire State Building, tonight said arrangements for financing the building were made before former Gov. Alfred E. Smith became connected with the building.

His statement was issued in connection with the recent utterances of the Rev. Charles E. Coughlin of Detroit, who last night repeated that Smith rode "with a bishop and another clergyman to the House of Morgan to arrange for a loan for the Empire State Building." Father Coughlin emphasized, however, that he "did not say that the ex-governor obtained the loan or that he personally saw Mr. Morgan." Coughlin's original statement was made during an address broadcast last Sunday night over an independent hook-up and amplified during an address in New York defending the monetary policies of President Roosevelt, which Smith had criticized.

"My purpose for making it," Fr. Coughlin said last night, "is simply to show that Alfred E. Smith is banking minded."

Raskob's statement, sent here from his home at Princess Anne, Md., said:

The character and reputation of the Hon. Alfred E. Smith and of Mr. J. P. Morgan and his partners need no defence. But the public deserves to have the record straight, as, by reason of the lie given to former Gov. Smith's statement by the Rev. Charles E. Coughlin of Detroit, it becomes by duty to issue this simple statement of fact.

Arrangements for financing the erection of the Empire State Building were made before ex-Gov. Smith became connected with the building company and he had no part whatever in these financial negotiations.

I personally negotiated the first mortgage loan with Mr. Frederick Ecker, president of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company of New York. The balance of the money required to erect the building was supplied by the owners. No securities of any kind were ever offered or sold to the public, and except for the first mortgage all Empire State securities are still held by the owners of the building. At no time were the partners of J. P. Morgan & Co., or any other bank, bankers or brokers

WASHINGTON, Dec. 1 (AP)—The civil works administration announced today that "approximately 1,250,000" were put on the civil works payroll during the first week of operation.

44 STATES REPORT

Reports to Harry L. Hopkins from 44 states and the District of Columbia were that 1,183,267 were employed as of November 25.

New Mexico, North Dakota, Massachusetts and Minnesota have not reported and Hopkins said their reports probably will bring the total to 1,250,000.

Oklahoma during the first week completed its entire quota under the program designed to give jobs to 4,000,000 persons throughout the country.

That state put 101,000 persons on civil works jobs, and Hopkins said today there are no more jobs for Oklahoma.

WORK FOR 2550 MORE IN BOSTON

Bartlett to Take up Curley's Strandway Plan to Employ 1500

Herold 12-2-33
After approving civil works projects yesterday totalling $562,487 to provide work for 2550 Boston men, Joseph M. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts civil works administration, announced he would inspect the strandway project submitted by Mayor Curley which would give work to nearly 1500 men at a cost of $980,000.

Bartlett will meet William P. Long, park commissioner, at 9 A. M. today to make a thorough inspection of what he called the largest civil works project submitted. The city has agreed to raise $300,000 on a loan to pay for materials, and asks the civil works board to pay the labor bill of $680,000 on the beautification and roads project.

Beginning the second half of the civil works program yesterday, the board was cheered by the realization that it was ahead of schedule, having created 51,000 jobs thus far out of the 97,000 goal set for this state. The board's intention to "put men to work and never mind the money" was emphasized by State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, a member, in an address.

Thousands of men will be paid for work on civil works projects today, William B. Coy, Boston banker, and third member, announced yesterday. He has formed an organization which will function in six-sevenths of the state to pay men who have worked as long as a week on certain projects, and only a few days on others.

The first federal civil works projects in this state were announced yesterday after receipt of word from Washington. A total of 828 men will be put to work at a cost in excess of $429,000, as follows:

At Ft. Banks, Winthrop, 38 men will erect a reservation fence and improve the drainage, to cost $90,000; at Boston quartermaster depot, 446 will be engaged at a cost of $254,000 in renewing water mains, repairing certain buildings and building roads; at Ft. Devens in Ayer, 203 men will paint the interior of buildings, grade and drain roads and grade firebreaks, at a cost of $97,735; at New Bedford the sea coast defenses will be improved by 33 men at a cost of $31,000, and at Springfield roads will be repaved by 56 men at a cost of $29,000.

Also, the state board was notified, under allocation from funds of the public works administration, 375 men will be engaged by the geodetic survey—10 engineers, 105 second engineers, and 260 others—and 14 persons will be engaged in special meteorological work at the Boston weather bureau. After a long telephone conversation with Washington officials, Coy was able to obtain authority to centralize the disbursement of funds for the federal projects. He named Clifford L. Elliott, certifying officer, and Stanley C. Lary, assistant disbursing officer for such projects. Both are attached to the federal re-employment service which will assign all workers to federal projects.

COUNTY PROJECTS

The first county chairman appeared before the board yesterday when Clarence E. Hodgkins, chairman of Hampshire county commission, presented a project to hire 18 men at a cost of $4207.50 to paint the county sanatorium at Leeds; build a filter bed there, and also cut brush. All were approved.

An interesting project was presented by David Chapman, former head of the smoke abatement division, which the Legislature abolished. After waiting 11 hours to see Chairman Bartlett he unfolded a plan to employ 1250 engineers to make a smoke nuisance survey of the state, which would be useful from health and fuel-saving angles. He was told to get the backing of Dr. Henry Chadwick, health commissioner, and the project would then be given consideration by the board.

Mayor Curley presented the Boston projects with Park Commissioner Long, Budget Commissioner Charles Fox, Neal Holland, a principal assessor, and Building Commissioner Edward W. Roemer. The plan to check the assessing department records, and those of the department records, would be helpful to the city and mean saving "much time." He declared that tax abatement is "a racket greater than liquor," and said $600,000,000 in real estate value—this plan to cut 2,000,000 granite blocks into the size now used by Boston, thus providing the city with 4,000,000 blocks, was approved when the mayor explained that in this city granite blocks were used as a base for heavy traffic streets, and with cement joints in downtown streets where heavy trucking is done.

Of the bridge surveys, the mayor said that a survey would be made and plans drawn for a future bridge where the Warren street bridge was now, except that traffic would be sent around the Y. M. C. A. building at City square, Charlestown, to relieve traffic in the square. The next bridge to be built is the Summer street bridge.

An alphabetical listing of city employees, "which proved of benefit mostly to loan companies and the finance commission in the past," will be revived and brought up to day after a lapse of four years.

Building Commissioner Reemer said that there were at least 33 buildings in the city which were dangerous and had been abandoned. The city will take over and demolish these buildings and try to get the money from the owner under a project approved by the chairman.

Mayor Curley referred to his recent visit to Washington where he tried to get the war department to give or lease Governor's island to the city, so that the East Boston airport could be enlarged by razing the island hill and using the fill to connect the island with the airport. The project was favorably received but he found that the war department was eager to have its own airport in Boston.

HYDROAIRPLANE LANDING

He suggested that the department raise the hill on CWA money and use Boston men. The city could then build a hydroairplane landing at the airport and Boston would have a municipal and federal airport for commercial and military purposes second to none in the world. Such an airport would put the city 10 years ahead in its air program, he explained.

Lt. Francis M. Kendall of the 26th division, who went to Washington as the representative of the civil works board, to find out about the CWA funds for airports, returned yesterday and reported to Chairman Bartlett. He could not learn the amount that Boston's airport project had been allotted, but Mayor Curley heard $150,000 had been.

The Curley program called for $1,500,000 and the employment of 5000 men. Chairman Bartlett approved the employment of 411 men at a cost of $194,714 for the elimination of starfish along the coast, a project submitted by the conservation department.

MILTON TO GIVE OUT CWA PAY CHECKS TODAY

100 Men Working on Several Projects

The first pay checks under the federal allotment to the town of Milton for civil works projects will be given out today to 100 Milton men who have been working on these projects since Monday. Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the state civil works board, allotted $36,000 last week to the town. The projects on which the 100 who will be paid today have been working were approved by Chairman Bartlett only yesterday. The approval was made retroactive to last Monday.

These projects consist of drainage work on three parcels of land on School street, Canton avenue and Milton street; work on the high school playground at Milton Centre, and building of a retaining wall and a new roadway in Milton cemetery.

Chairman Bartlett took under advisement seven other projects that Frederick A. Gaskins, chairman of the Milton selectmen, had filed with him. These include new sidewalk construction on Centre street and Brook road; enlarging of the assessors' quarters in the town hall; enlarging of the vault for the engineering department of the town; a new sewer system for the town hall and an adjoining lot, and employment of women clerical assistants in the offices of the board of assessors, tax collector and town accountant.

Projects Approved

CARPENTERS TO FIGHT FOR $1.20 C. W. A. PAY

Set Up Board to Receive Complaints in Boston

Special Dispatch to the Globe
WORCESTER, Dec 2—A special two-day conference of the general executive board of the Massachusetts State Council of Carpenters was opened today at the Labor Temple, with Edward Thompson of Beverly presiding and 80 delegates present.

Today's meeting was devoted entirely to discussion and reports by delegates from various sections as to progress and administration under C. W. A. and P. W. A. projects. It was reported by several that the $1.20 an hour which it had been understood, was to be paid to skilled carpenters, was being "ducked" in some places, where the highest pay for all workers was only 50 cents an hour.

Delegates were instructed to take steps to remedy violations of C. W. A. and P. W. A. agreements in their own localities.

It was also decided to form a special council in Boston to handle all complaints uncovered by the delegates. It was pointed out that a single committee of this nature would be better fitted to take speedy action on difficulties which might arise. Tomorrow resolutions relative to the building construction code will be acted upon.

A committee is called upon the Mayor of Quincy Monday relative to P. W. A. projects there.

John J. Power of Worcester, vice chairman of the Massachusetts Recovery Board and chairman of the Public Works Commission of that board, reported to the meeting that plans have been made for starting the public works program when Government money, expected to be about $30,000,000 for this State, is received. He said one of the projects is the construction of a new $1,400,000 bridge at Lynn to replace a wooden structure there.

100 GET FIRST PAY CHECKS UNDER MILTON CIVIL WORKS

MILTON, Dec 2—The first pay checks under the Federal allotment to this town for civil works projects was given out this afternoon at the Town Hall to 100 men, who have been working since Monday.

The projects on which the men have been employed included work on a new drainage at Canton av and Elliot st, grading and leveling of the Brook road playground in rear of the High School and miscellaneous work around the parks.

Other projects under consideration include building of a new retaining wall and new roadway in Milton Cemetery, new sidewalk construction on Centre st at Brook road, enlarging of assessors' quarters in the Town Hall, enlarging of the vault in the engineering department of the town, new sewer system for the Town Hall and Junior High School for East Milton.

The town accepted $30,000 of the $36,000 allotment and the Selectmen expect to employ 500 men.

George F. Moulton of Plymouth av, East Milton, former School Committeeman in the town, has been appointed in charge of employment. Up to today 300 men have registered.

METROPOLITAN PROJECTS WIN APPROVAL OF BOARD

The State Civil Works Board approved yesterday projects submitted by the Metropolitan District Commission costing $140,000 and giving work to 973 men.

The projects included work in the Blue Hills, upper Charles River district, Middlesex Fells, Revere Beach and Old Colony Parkway. One of the undertakings will be removing the mud from Fellsmead Pond, Malden.

The board also approved the hiring of approximately 700 men by the State Department of Public Works on small jobs along State highways throughout the State. The expenditures will total $180,000.

Culminating its second week of daily hearings, the State Civil Works Board yesterday postponed further consideration of projects until Monday.

The new work to be done under the Metropolitan District Commission will be carried out in the Blue Hills, the upper Charles River district, the Middlesex Fells, Revere Beach and the Old Colony Parkway. A feature of the works approved is the project calling for the cleaning out of the mud in Fellsmead Pond, Malden.

The State Board yesterday also approved the hiring of approximately 700 men by the State Department of Public Works, at a cost of $180,000. The men will be employed on small jobs along the State highways in all sections of the Commonwealth.

Worcester Filling Quota

Approval was given to the State Department of Agriculture to employ 194 additional men in the eradication of the apple pests throughout the State. The expenditure authorized is $35,000. The board had already approved the employment of 1500 men with an appropriation of $207,000 for this work. The city of Worcester received the other large appropriation yesterday with approbation of projects calling for the expenditure of $300,000 and employment of 1600 additional men. The board had already allowed $650,000 for employment of 2200 men, and the additional projects yesterday practically filled Worcester's jobs quota.

The town of Grafton was allowed $700 for employment of 16 men on sidewalk and drain repair work. The town was also allotted $700 for employment of three people to compile the Civil Works Administration force.

Waterholes in Country

Dr Arthur W. Gilbert, commissioner of agriculture, appeared before the board yesterday requesting allotment of funds for additional projects under his department. Chairman Bartlett took under advisement a plan calling for appropriation of $235,000 and employment of 1500 men in digging waterholes outside of the hydrant area of the towns in the State to provide further facilities for fighting fires.

Mayor George J. Bates of Salem requested authority to make improvements to Salem's Town Hall at an expenditure of $45,000 and to construct a small sea wall and marine pond on its waterfront at an expenditure of $80,000. Both applications were held in abeyance as Salem's jobs quota has been filled.

The board will hold an executive session this afternoon to check up on what has been done during the past two weeks, and to make out a report to be sent to the Federal Civil Works administrator in Washington.

Must Help Municipalities Find Funds and Jobs for Idle—Board Now Up to Schedule on Work

By LOUIS M. LYONS

The real test of the Civil Works Administration in Massachusetts is just now beginning. Its task in the next 10 days is to find ways to relieve many municipalities of the difficulties that have so far prevented them from making fullest use of the opportunity presented by the Government to put their unemployed people to work.

These difficulties are for the most part real and call for every bit of resourcefulness and cooperation that the State board can apply to their solution.

Since Thanksgiving Day, Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State board has been giving intensive attention to the nature of the problems that are keeping back employment projects in many places.

Time and Money Problems

The local problems chiefly revolve themselves into time and money. Many places cannot see how to raise the required contribution for civil works projects between now and the beginning of their fiscal year.

The Bartlett board, which has had a year's experience with the financial problems of the municipalities, in its capacity of Emergency Finance Board, now realizes that in many cases contributions must be reduced, or met by arrangements for emergency loans, or postponed until the first of the year.

It can be said on the best authority that the board is prepared to do any or all of these things to find a way out for any community with a sound work program.

Chairman Bartlett himself has been spending much of his time the last two days, and must probably spend most of his time the next two weeks, in hewing through these individual municipal tangles with the local Mayors or Selectmen.

Half of Jobs Filled

So far the civil works program for Massachusetts has kept up to schedule. With just half the time to Dec. 15 elapsed more than half the 97,000 jobs quota for the Commonwealth have been filled.

Projects approved represent about 53,000 jobs. Other projects already planned and ready to be presented would run the number up to 70,000. Perhaps 30,000 men have been at work the past week on these new works, as many as 40,000 should be working tomorrow.

The hard end of the task is going to be the filling of the final 30,000 jobs. The first projects were the largest, and most readily presentable to the Civil Works Board, the quickest and easiest to undertake for winter work under such supervision as local boards have available. Those yet to be developed will require the most thought and many cases the most argument to have their worth as a board which is not close to the local problem, no matter how sympathetic that board intends to be.

Payroll Near $750,000

The coming week's payroll on civil works in Massachusetts will be close to $750,000. This must mean a good deal in local trade and in such manufacturing as finds a market in tools and equipment for these projects. It promises a tremendous boon to all Christmas trade. If the full 97,000 Bay State jobs quota can be filled as intended by Dec. 15 there will then be a weekly payroll of well over $1,500,000. For a good many of these jobs are going to skilled workers at professional rates of pay and to supervisory and semi-skilled people at more than the basic 50 cents rate for unskilled labor.

The full benefits of this entire employment opportunity for Massachusetts are going to be realized here if hard work and long hours and a broad tolerance in the treatment of local difficulties can work it out. There have been neither Sundays nor holidays for the staff working under Civil Works Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett since the President presented this program Nov. 15.

In full fairness, it should be added that very many local officials, mayors, selectmen, city engineers, town planning boards and welfare chairmen have been spending their holidays and evenings, too, in trying to find ways and means to get every possible chance for their local unemployed.

Wrong Time of Year

This opportunity was presented with great suddenness at the most difficult time of year. The season for much outdoor work is nearly at an end, except as the ingenious ways which have been developed in the last two winters to keep outside employment open can be applied on a greater scale than ever before.

Some works that would otherwise be presented cannot be done efficiently in winter.

Other works which would be offered now have already been submitted and approved as public works projects and are not available for this new and quicker program. It is presumed that the gigantic public works machine will get under good headway by Feb. 15, the end time limit for civil works projects now starting.

This limitation upon projects—that they must be such as can be done by Feb. 15—eliminates some things that would otherwise be suggested. The greatest municipal problem is finance. This is the end of the financial year when new appropriations always come hard. This year especially they come hard because almost every town and city made an heroic effort to cut its tax rate by cutting appropriations to the bone. As a consequence many a town that always makes the year with a surplus is coming out in the red this year, or without any balance. The fact is they counted their expected surplus in last spring and eliminated it in advance. This close cutting to make a good showing with the taxpayers is perhaps the chief cause of the embarrassment of many communities now when they are asked to contribute some part of a works project for their local welfare recipients and unemployed.

Town Meetings Necessary

In the towns the situation is more difficult because a special town meeting is necessary to authorize officials to apply for emergency loans, which in most cases are available. The calling of such meeting takes time, and the local unemployed are losing their chances of a week's wages for every week so taken out.

In the case of cities with a gap now ensuing between an old and a new administration, there are in some cases political and personal in addition to financial difficulties about granting a large fund for the launching of big new civic projects. In the case of some existing municipal administrations, there is an evident lack of energy in planning these large and difficult projects which will be largely carried out under the new Mayors. In other cases the difficulty may be the reluctance of the State board to turn over large funds to a city administration which may have been discredited at the polls.

Chairman Bartlett has had the greatest amount of time with the projects of cities that are now experiencing this political hangover. In some cases the situation is further blurred by failure to make provision for public works projects which had been earlier submitted.

Cantonment Plan Advanced

Yesterday Marjorie Warren, director for transient activities of the Government in this State, brought in a budget of $80,000 to register transient unemployed in this State and administer to their immediate needs.

She proposed as the first employment project, the development of the site selected between Sandwich and Hyannis for the National Guard cantonment of the 28th Division. This would provide needed work in a healthful site, and could get under way at once, she recommended.

Miss Warren's first project was in the nature of a report on the peculiar problems presented by her activity. She was frank in admitting that next to nothing is known of the number of transients needing such aid as the Government offers. This year some 10,400 such people, men, women and children, have been assisted in communities on the main highways of the State.

With that sketchy information, she planned five centers of application, to be at Pittsfield, Worcester, Boston and Lawrence besides the State headquarters at 15 Ashburton place.

Action on Plan Monday

Each such center, she proposed, should be "adequately staffed" not only for applications, but for actual aid in the form of food, clothing, transportation, medical care, shelter and the like.

Though she presented this project to Chairman Bartlett, it will be taken up Monday noon in a special conference on the subject by Robert W. Keiso, Federal Relief Administrator for the Northeast.

Most of the smaller towns, which had not presented works projects up to Thanksgiving Day, have responded to Bartlett's telegraphic request for prompt action. Most of them have projects ready to send in or promise them soon. In the case of the town of Colrain, it was reported that the farm projects undertaken under the State Department of Agriculture had cleared the entire welfare list. Otis reported six men at work on the State dairy sanitation project. It is probable that in the smallest rural places, the State farm and forest, moth and mosquito and roads projects will take a proportionally larger quota of workers than in the cities and larger towns.

For the present the State Board is estimating that State projects will take about 15 percent of the quotas of local communities and is adjusting the local projects to take only 85 percent.

It appears evident, however, that those communities with live projects that would take more than 85 percent of their quotas will have another opportunity to increase their local works if there continues to be less than the full quota of applications from other parts of the State.

One Case in Westhampton

Levi Burt, chairman of the Westhampton Welfare Department, wined Bartlett yesterday: "Only one welfare case in town. He is not able to work." Westhampton, however, is entitled to jobs for six unemployed persons, which would mean a local payroll of at least $90 if the local officials care to produce a civil works project to employ their quota.

Projects for women and for white collar men continue to be few among the nearly 1300 projects of all kinds so far passed by the board. Sewer and water drains, street and building repairs, forestry and park and playground work take the bulk of projects.

Teaching and clerical work in connection with schools makes the largest white collar projects. Planning boards and assessors are putting a good many people to work on surveys and improvements in mapping and listing.

In Boston 5000 people were cleared from the welfare list to the civil works projects up to Saturday when such transfers ended for the time being. Tomorrow the city will begin employing registered unemployed from the list of more than 22,000 who stood in line for a chance at these jobs.

Boston Jobs Provided

So far somewhat less than $500 jobs have been created for Boston civil works outside of the schools, which will use 1000 teachers, clerks and janitors. That offers about 2500 chances for the registered unemployed. The Strandway, with its potential employment of 1500 men, is not yet an approved project and there may be some difficulty about passing it as it stands. The Federal Government has not met Mayor James M. Curley's ambitious Governor's Island plans with any apparent cordiality. Something like 800 other Federal works jobs are already planned for Boston.

The Metropolitan District Commission yesterday added projects for 900 men to bring its total to above 2500. It has taken 400 men off the Boston unemployment list and will take perhaps 500 more in a day or two.

PRACTICALLY NO IDLE LEFT AMONG SWAMPSCOTT FOLK

SWAMPSCOTT, Dec. 2—With nearly 100 men to work on an approved project, officials in charge of this community's Civil Works program, today announced that the welfare list of recipients had been abolished entirely and that within the near future, some 200 men would be employed as C. W. A. workers.

The town's welfare list was reduced to about a score only a few weeks ago, when some of the townsfolk went back to work, others found part time employment and still others found other forms of relief. The balance of about 20 has been placed to work in the improvement of the wooded area surrounding the Swampscott Cemetery. By Monday noontime another 200 are expected to be put to work, leaving the town practically devoid of unemployed.

STATE BOARD TAKES STEPS TO END ABUSES of Boston Department Ordered

Will Hire 50 Trained Social Workers to Look up
Recipients

CITY PROJECTS
AWAIT MANSFIELD
Incoming Mayor to Be Consulted—Curley Program
Limited

A drastic reorganization of the Boston welfare department, in which hundreds of grafting welfare recipients and inefficient personnel will be dropped in an effort to curb the million-a-month spending record of the department, has been financed by the state emergency finance board.

Fifty trained social workers will be employed at a cost of $50,000 to make investigations of the recipients, while trained office experts will go over the entire disbursing system and endeavor to devise a more effective plan for handling the department's business.

The board, which will consider the $4,150,000 public works program sponsored by Mayor Curley at a special meeting Wednesday, is ready to postpone the meeting should Mayor-elect Mansfield, now on his way from Bermuda to Boston, make such a request to give him time to study the projects.

The board, fully aware of the financial problems confronting the mayor-elect, is determined he shall be consulted on public works and other projects involving expenditures by the city. The board's authorization of an investigation of the welfare department is also designed to aid Mansfield by reducing expenses there.

Mayor Curley has had $5,850,000 in public works projects tentatively approved by the board. He plans to submit further projects to cost $8,000,000, but Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the board, has ruled that Boston's public works limit is $10,000,000 and the mayor agreed to let the board decide which projects should be rejected.

RECORD OF TWO WEEKS

Yesterday, the three members of the emergency finance board who constitute the civil works administration—Chairman Bartlett, State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley and William B. Coy, a Boston banker—announced that in the two weeks the board has heard applications a total of 1624 civil works projects have been approved to cost $12,563,835.91 and furnish employment for 63,185 men and women throughout the state.

Chairman Bartlett pointed out that

One of the projects held over by Chairman Bartlett was one to hire 98 clerks at a cost of $17,240 to compile a list of citizens having financial dealings with the city.

One aspect of this file would be to check the welfare recipients. Chairman Bartlett was told that certain city commissioners were convinced that a large number of recipients were obtaining money from other city departments and by creating such an index their duplicity would be established at once. The following day the chairman, realizing that such an index would help to rid the welfare rolls of grafters, approved the project, on which work will begin today.

RESENTED DELAY

Indications were that the board members became incensed at McCarthy's delay, and convinced that he was delaying the investigation desired. Members of the board, realizing that the stake is millions of dollars of tax money, are ready to take further steps to enforce such an investigation, if McCarthy fails to co-operate.

Members of the board, realizing that Boston will have a new mayor on Jan. 1, were eager to have Mayor-elect Mansfield express his opinion on the Curley projects.

Should Mansfield indicate that he would need time to examine the projects in detail, it is understood that the board will gladly permit him to study them and appear before it in public session to record his views. If these views differ radically from those of Mayor Curley, the board will undoubtedly refuse to sanction the projects. Under ordinary circumstances, the board would merely postpone the hearings until after Jan. 1, but the time limit for public works projects is Dec. 31.

Projects approved yesterday were:

WESTMINSTER—23 men, $4130 to paint Enkline hall, drain schoolhouse area, and gravel public parking space, resurface Cameron road and eliminate two blind corners.

CHESHIRE—65 men, $6777.50 to reconstruct a street, paint interior of a school, and reconstruct a road.

CONWAY—33 men, $1855.50 to reconstruct Bradwell Ferry road, repair wooden bridge on North Poland road, and rebuild Jones Corner road.

HUNTINGTON—31 men, $1705.50 to reconstruct Pleasant and Green streets.

The town of Beckon, in bad straits since the flood several years ago and with much unemployment, was permitted to exceed its quota of money and men.

2,993,360 JOBS GIVEN BY PWA

Ickes Reports 86 Per Cent.
Of $3,300,000,000 Fund
Has Been Allotted

CWA ANNOUNCES 4 FEDERAL PROJECTS

WASHINGTON, Dec. 3 (AP)—Secretary Ickes, public works administrator, today announced that 2,993,360 men, including members of the civilian conservation corps, were employed under public works allotments on Nov. 25, that more than 86 per cent. of the original $3,300,000,000 fund had been allotted, and that employment was increasing steadily.

Although he did not refer specifically to criticism of his administration, Ickes said "The facts speak for themselves."

ATTACKED BY SMITH

"Nobody can intelligently appraise the public works program without studying these figures," he added.

In New York Thursday Alfred E. Smith called the administration's efforts to get men to work a failure.

Ickes's statement, giving figures on public works employment over a period of seven weeks, said that on Nov. 25 all the public works $3,300,000,000 fund had been allotted except $438,118,960. He did not specify actual withdrawals from the treasury.

At the same time, the civil works administration, operating under the public works administration, announced its approval of four projects designed to employ 19,015, in the navy, agriculture and interior departments and the veterans' administration, bringing the total employed in this type of relief work to 227,600.

PROGRAM ENDORSED

Endorsement of the public works program came today from Paul V. Bettens of Chicago, secretary of the United States Conference of Mayors. In a statement saying that mayors and city managers "almost uniformly are convinced it represents the greatest program yet adopted by the federal government."

Ickes's employment figures covered all phases of the government's efforts to put men to work. Of the 2,993,360 men, 347,623 were members of the civilian conservation corps and 1,183,267 were employed by the civil works administration under a $400,000,000 public works allotment.

The figures being most closely watched now are those indicating employment on strictly federal construction projects, which were shown to have increased each week from 6 to 13 per cent. over the preceding week, the cost of such projects has reached $579,395,689. In addition, projects totalling $138,085,061 have been advertised for award within from one to 30 days.

NEW FEDERAL PROJECTS

Ickes said some of the employment figures had been obtained from distant territories, such as Hawaii and Alaska and were a week or so old. Present work totals would be larger, he added.

The four new federal projects announced are:

Navy department—Repair work, painting, landscaping, and demolition of buildings in 20 states, Hawaii and the District of Columbia, 11,631 men.

Agriculture department—Gypsy-moth extermination in Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts and Vermont, 5000 men.

Veterans administration—Work of various types around hospitals and bureau institutions in all states except New Hampshire, Vermont, Delaware and Nevada, 1258 men.

Interior department—Architectural survey of historical buildings in all states and the District of Columbia, 1126 men.

The civil works administration's announced program is to put 4,000,000 men to work on various projects by Dec. 16.

CURLEY CANCELS LEASE ON YOUNG'S

Mayor Curley, who leased Young's Hotel for the housing of some city departments, yesterday changed his mind and ordered the agreement which called for $45,000 yearly rent cancelled after protest of 10 taxpayers had been filed in court.

Officials working under the Civil Works Act program which had already moved in when tax payers' criticism burst will remain at the hotel until the end of the year.

"This lease was in no respect different than other leases I have signed without being questioned or attacked," said the mayor yesterday.

Fall River Boosts CWA Wage Scale

Fall River, Dec. 8—Assignment of skilled workers to jobs for the first time here today will greatly increase the number of CWA employees in this city, it was revealed.

Both skilled workers and their foremen will be paid $1.20 an hour.

New projects on which work will be started include a club house on the high school field and work on the Watuppa Reservation.

$3,000,000 TO BAY STATE TO SPEED RELIEF

Washington, Dec. 7 (INS)—The federal government released over $4,000,000 today as relief grants to help three states care for their unemployed during the month and assure their needy food at Christmas time.

Georgia got a grant of $1,250,000; Massachusetts, $3,003,600, and West Virginia, $350,000.

36,000 MORE CWA JOBS

Two perplexing problems confronting the State Civil Works board neared solution today at the same time announcement was made that some 85,000 jobs have thus far been authorized for Massachusetts' unemployed.

The problems were the question of jobs for unemployed women under the civil works program and the teacher situation. The former is expected to be solved by its inclusion as a civil works service program with the money for the women being paid out of federal relief funds.

The teacher situation is still unclarified but is being studied by civil works officials at Washington. Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett pointed out that teachers do not come under the classification of civil works service because definite allocation of funds was made to each state to take care of jobless teachers.

Meanwhile, checkup of the work of the board reveals that 85,000 jobs on civil works projects had been approved already, at a cost of $15,000,000 in payrolls to be paid by the federal government.

CHARGES CITIES DELAYING CWA

Hopkins Says Local Officials Have Failed to Provide Projects

HAD HOPED TO HAVE
3,000,000 AT WORK NOW

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 (AP)—Reporting that the campaign to return 4,000,000 men to work by Dec. 15 apparently was behind schedule, Harry L. Hopkins, civil works administrator, today placed the blame on failure of local officials to provide projects and inability to obtain necessary equipment.

Hopkins said a telegraphic poll yesterday indicated 2,500,000 men were employed on civil works projects, a great majority of whom had been transferred from relief rolls. He explained the original program provided for 3,000,000 at the end of this week.

TO BUY 6050 HOGS

Acting in another capacity—as president of the federal surplus relief corporation—Hopkins also announced the government would purchase hogs on the principal markets to meet the needs of the direct relief program. Orders for 6050 were placed today and 14,069 had been purchased previously.

The civil works administrator told newspaper men that when he found the employment program was lagging he directed all state civil works administrators to act on all projects the day they were received, and to speed up sending it by mail.

He said he also sent engineers into a number of states to assist the state administrators.

Under present plans, the civil works program is to continue until Feb. 15.

$650,000,000 AVAILABLE

Hopkins said today that states, counties and cities generally were adding approximately 30 per cent. to the federal money, which would make $650,000,000 available.

The money supplied locally he explained, will be used generally to purchase materials while the federal money goes for wages.

Funds are available, Hopkins has said, only until Feb. 15, but it is understood the administration plans to ask Congress for an appropriation to continue the work if necessary.

Hopkins was described as feeling that some sort of a reservoir of work might well be established permanently by federal and state governments whereby men who found themselves out of jobs could be given work enough to maintain them on other than a charity basis.

SHORTAGE OF TOOLS

Secretary Perkins, however, recently said "I hope not" in reply to a question as to whether the program might continue indefinitely.

As to the status of the civil works program, Hopkins said it had been impossible to buy picks, shovels, wheelbarrows and other small tools needed to carry on the various jobs because there was not enough of them in the country to meet the situation.

Civil works employment figures reported by states as of Dec. 2 included: Connecticut, 10,103; Maine, 11,377; New Hampshire, 4250; New York, 140,788; Rhode Island, 9540; Vermont (no report) and Massachusetts, 13,121.

Drastic Clean-up of Boston Relief Department Ordered

In half the time allotted to approve projects, the Massachusetts board had reached two-thirds of its allotment of 97,000 jobs. He repeated yesterday that no limit had been set on civil works money for this state, and said those communities that were slow in submitting projects might find their allotment given to a more alert community.

For many months the emergency finance board, which includes Bartlett, Hurley, Coy and Daniel Doherty of Springfield and Theodore M. Waddell, director of accounts in the state taxation department, has felt that the Boston welfare department needed a thorough shaking up, and a complete reformation of its manner of handling welfare recipients.

Information that hundreds of welfare recipients, fully capable of caring for themselves, have been placed on the rolls and kept there with the connivance of politicians, and inefficient department employees who owe their jobs to the politicians, has convinced the board that a comparatively small sum spent in reorganizing the department would reduce the department expenditures by millions.

TO CUT OUT CHISELING

Several weeks ago Walter V. McCarthy, executive director of the department, was called before the board, which explained its desire to help Boston taxpayers by eliminating the chiseling recipients. McCarthy was bluntly told that the board would permit him to name the social welfare workers, who were to be drawn from the staffs of recognized Boston agencies, but that the reorganization would be supervised by the board.

McCarthy agreed and the board awaited his list. It never came, but the emergency finance board, or rather three members of it, suddenly found themselves engulfed in work as the civil works plan was developed in this state. The Boston welfare problem, pressing though it was, was relegated to a secondary position while the board went about creating jobs for welfare recipients and unemployed not on the welfare.

Since that time the board members have worked night and day, Sundays included, to speed the civil works program. When the Boston civil works program was presented by Mayor Curley one of the projects held over by Chairman Bartlett was one to hire 98 clerks at a cost of $17,240 to compile a list of citizens having financial dealings with the city.

One aspect of this file would be to check the welfare recipients. Chairman Bartlett was told that certain city councilmen were convinced that a large number of recipients were obtaining money from other city departments and by creating such an index their duplicity would be established at once. The following day the chairman, realizing that such an index would help to rid the welfare rolls of grafters, approved the project, on which work will begin today.

RESENTED DELAY

Indications were that the board members became incensed at McCarthy's delay, and convinced that he was delaying the investigation desired. Members of the board, realizing that the stake is millions of dollars of tax money, are ready to take further steps to enforce such an investigation, if McCarthy fails to co-operate.

Members of the board, realizing that Boston will have a new mayor on Jan. 1, were eager to have Mayor-elect Mansfield express his opinion on the Curley projects.

Should Mansfield indicate that he would need time to examine the projects in detail, it is understood that the board will gladly permit him to study them and appear before it in public session to record his views. If these views differ radically from those of Mayor Curley, the board will undoubtedly refuse to sanction the projects. Under ordinary circumstances, the board would merely postpone the hearings until after Jan. 1, but the time limit for public works projects is Dec. 31.

Projects approved yesterday were:

WESTMINSTER—23 men, $4430 to paint Enslie hall, drain schoolhouse area and gravel public parking space, resurface Cambridge road and eliminate two blind corners.

CHESHIRE—65 men, $6577.50 to reconstruct a street, paint interior of a school.

CONWAY—32 men, $1855.50 to reconstruct Bradley Ferry road, repair wooden bridge on North Poland road, and rebuild Jones Corner road.

HUNTINGTON—31 men, $4705.50 to reconstruct Pleasant and Crescent streets.

The town of Becket, in bad straits since the flood several years ago and with much unemployment, was permitted to exceed its quota of money and men.

2,993,360 JOBS GIVEN BY PWA

Ickes Reports 86 Per Cent. Of $3,300,000,000 Fund Has Been Allotted

CWA ANNOUNCES 4 FEDERAL PROJECTS

WASHINGTON, Dec. 3 (AP)—Secretary Ickes, public works administrator, today announced that 2,993,360 men, including members of the civilian conservation corps, were employed under public works allotments on Nov. 25, that more than 86 per cent. of the original $3,300,000,000 fund had been allotted, and that employment was increasing steadily.

Although he did not refer specifically to criticism of his administration, Ickes said "The facts speak for themselves."

ATTACKED BY SMITH

"Nobody can intelligently appraise the public works program without studying these figures," he added. In New York Thursday Alfred E. Smith called the administration's efforts to get men to work a failure.

Ickes's statement, giving figures on public works employment over a period of seven weeks, said that on Nov. 25 all the public works $3,300,000,000 fund had been allotted except $438,118,960. He did not specify actual withdrawals from the treasury.

At the same time, the civil works administration, operating under the public works administration, announced its approval of four projects designed to employ 19,015 in the navy, agriculture and interior departments and the veterans' administration, bringing the total employed in this type of relief work to 227,600.

PROGRAM ENDORSED

Endorsement of the public works program came today from Paul V. Bettens of Chicago, secretary of the United States Conference of Mayors, in a statement saying that mayors and city managers "almost uniformly are convinced it represents the greatest program yet adopted by the federal government."

Ickes's employment figures covered all phases of the government's efforts to put men to work. Of the 2,993,360 men, 347,623 were members of the civilian conservation corps and 1,183,267 were employed by the civil works administration under a $400,000,000 public works allotment.

The figures being most closely watched now are those indicating employment on strictly federal construction projects, which were shown to have increased each week from 6 to 13 per cent. over the preceding week, the cost of such projects has reached $579,395,689. In addition, projects totaling $138,085,061 have been advertised for award within from one to 30 days.

NEW FEDERAL PROJECTS

Ickes said some of the employment figures had been obtained from distant territories, such as Hawaii and Alaska and were a week or so old. Present work totals would be larger, he added.

The four new federal projects announced are:

Navy department—Repair work, painting, landscaping, and demolition of buildings in 20 states, Hawaii and the District of Columbia, 11,631 men.

Agriculture department—Gypsy-moth extermination in Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts and Vermont, 5000 men.

Veterans administration—Work of various types around hospitals and bureau institutions in all states except New Hampshire, Vermont, Delaware and Nevada, 1258 men.

Interior department—Architectural survey of historical buildings in all states and the District of Columbia, 1126 men.

The civil works administration's announced program is to put 4,000,000 men to work on various projects by Dec. 16.

CURLEY CANCELS LEASE ON YOUNG'S

Mayor Curley, who leased Young's Hotel for the housing of some city departments, yesterday changed his mind and ordered the agreement which called for $15,000 yearly rent cancelled after protest of 10 taxpayers had been filed in court.

Officials working under the Civil Works Act program which had already moved in when tax payers' criticism burst will remain at the hotel until the end of the year.

"This lease was in no respect different than other leases I have signed without being questioned or attacked," said the mayor yesterday.

Fall River Boosts CWA Wage Scale

Fall River, Dec. 3—Assignment of skilled workers to jobs for the first time here today will greatly increase the number of CWA employees in this city, it was revealed. Both skilled workers and their foremen will be paid $1.20 an hour. New projects on which work will be started include a club house on the high school field and work on the Watuppa Reservation.

$3,000,000 TO BAY STATE TO SPEED RELIEF

Washington, Dec. 7 (INS)—The federal government released over $4,000,000 today as relief grants to help three states care for their unemployed during the month and assure their needy food at Christmas time.

Georgia got a grant of $1,250,000; Massachusetts, $3,003,609, and West Virginia, $350,000.

36,000 MORE CWA JOBS

Two perplexing problems confronting the State Civil Works board neared solution today at the same time announcement was made that some 85,000 jobs have thus far been authorized for Massachusetts' unemployed.

The problems were the question of jobs for unemployed women under the civil works program and the teacher situation. The former is expected to be solved by its inclusion as a civil works service program with the money for the women being paid out of federal relief funds.

The teacher situation is still unclarified but is being studied by civil works officials at Washington. Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett pointed out that teachers do not come under the classification of civil works service because definite allocation of funds was made to each state to take care of jobless teachers.

Meanwhile, checkup of the work of the board reveals that 85,000 jobs on civil works projects had been approved already, at a cost of $15,000,000 in payrolls to be paid by the federal government.

CHARGES CITIES DELAYING CWA

Hopkins Says Local Officials Have Failed to Provide Projects

HAD HOPED TO HAVE 3,000,000 AT WORK NOW

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 (AP)—Reporting that the campaign to return 4,000,000 men to work by Dec. 15 apparently was behind schedule, Harry L. Hopkins, civil works administrator, today placed the blame on failure of local officials to provide projects and inability to obtain necessary equipment. Hopkins said a telegraphic poll yesterday indicated 2,500,000 men were employed on civil works projects, a great majority of whom had been transferred from relief rolls. He explained the original program provided for 3,000,000 at the end of this week.

TO BUY 6050 HOGS

Acting in another capacity—as president of the federal surplus relief corporation—Hopkins also announced the government would purchase hogs on the principal markets to meet the needs of the direct relief program. Orders for 6050 were placed today and 14,069 had been purchased previously.

The civil works administrator told newspaper men that when he found the employment program was lagging he directed all state civil works administrators to act on all projects the day they were received, and, if approved, to telegraph the verdict instead of sending it by mail.

He said he also sent engineers into a number of states to assist the state administrators.

Under present plans, the civil works program is to continue until Feb. 15.

$650,000,000 AVAILABLE

Hopkins said today that states, counties and cities generally were adding approximately 30 per cent. to the federal money, which would make $650,000,000 available.

The money supplied locally he explained, will be used generally to purchase materials while the federal money goes for wages.

Funds are available. Hopkins has said, only until Feb. 15, but it is understood the administration plans to ask Congress for an appropriation to continue the work if necessary.

Hopkins was described as feeling that some sort of a reservoir of work might well be established permanently by federal and state governments whereby men who found themselves out of jobs could be given work enough to maintain them on other than a charity basis.

SHORTAGE OF TOOLS

Secretary Perkins, however, recently said "I hope not" in reply to a question as to whether the program might continue indefinitely.

As to the status of the civil works program, Hopkins said it had been impossible to buy picks, shovels, wheelbarrows and other small tools needed to carry on the various jobs because there was not enough of them in the country to meet the situation.

Civil works employment figures reported by states as of Dec. 2 included: Connecticut, 10,103; Maine, 11,377; New Hampshire, 4250; New York, 140,788; Rhode Island, 9540; Vermont (no report) and Massachusetts, 13,121.

Rushing ahead at full speed in a determined effort to fill the 97,000-job quota by Saturday night so that Massachusetts may receive the benefit of the additional 15,000 jobs promised as a bonus, a record number of approved projects was turned out yesterday by the Civil Works Board.

Approval of extensive projects submitted by the city of Boston and the State Commission of Administration and Finance, as well as those of many cities and towns, helped to swell the lists.

Chairman Charles P. Howard of the State Commission on Administration and Finance proposed projects enough to furnish work for 2000 men and women. Chairman Bartlett approved sufficient of these to employ 883 men, and intimated that he would be glad to approve further projects as soon as necessary changes could be made in their details.

Boston's New Projects

The city of Boston, represented by Mayor Curley, Supt of Schools Campbell, Dr. Wilensky of the Health Department, Business Agent Sullivan of the School Committee, Secretary of the Welfare Commission McCarthy, Miss Herlihy of the City Planning Board, and Park Commissioner Long, received approval of projects calling for employment of 250 men and women.

Projects approved for Boston were as follows:

- Election department, bringing data on voters up to date, 108 men, $17,800.
- Westboro State Hospital, 89 men, $15,946.
- Monson State Hospital, 21 men, 10 women, $11,494. (The women will

Tech Offer of Research

Everett was the only city in the State that had no people working yesterday under the Civil Works program, according to Chairman Bartlett. Mayor O'Neill assured the board that he would have men at work this morning in his city.

Dr. Vannevar Bush, vice president of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, accompanied by Maj Paul Hines, Col R. C. Eddy, Prof Erwin Shell and Erwin Ekdahl, presented to the board yesterday afternoon a project calling for extensive research throughout the State in regard to automobile accidents.

The work would be supervised by program of the Institute of Technology. If the State officials requested that institution to do the work, Dr. Bush assured the board. The project would give employment to from 500 to 1000 men.

Chairman Bartlett will confer with the Gov Ely this morning to see if the plan interferes with work along that line.

ESSEX COUNTY WORKS PROJECTS APPROVED

SALEM, Dec. 8.—Essex county commissioners announced today that they have secured approval from the civil works administration board for county projects to cost $44,781.20, to provide work for 280 men, starting Monday. These will be the first county projects in Massachusetts to proceed under the CWA program. The work includes construction of the Legg Hill road in Marblehead and Salem, painting and repairing of the Salem court house, the Lawrence training school. It also includes clerical work in the Salem courthouse, work that may possibly be given to women.

QUINCY CWA PROJECTS NOW TOTAL $325,000

Quincy civil works projects amounting to $132,000 and assuring 10 more weeks for the 1500 men at present employed in the local civil work program, were approved yesterday by the state civil works board, Mayor Charles A. Ross announced.

Projects now total $325,000. Four hundred twenty-five women have registered for employment.

300 VACANCIES IN CCC

With about 300 vacancies in New England units of the CCC, Col. William J. Blake, regional manager of the United States veterans bureau yesterday was authorized by Washington to fill the places at once. Candidates will be selected from a waiting list at the bureau.

CWA TO PROBE ILLEGAL USE OF MEDFORD FUNDS

Mayor and Welfare Head
Charged with Ignoring Federal Service

BURKE PROMISES FULL CO-OPERATION

Mansfield to Present Opinions on Boston Projects
Next Week

An investigation to determine the amount of money distributed to several hundreds of Medford residents for work on civil works projects in violation of the regulations established by the federal civil works administration will be started today by the Massachusetts civil works board.

Charged with having deliberately "ignored the federal re-employment service in assigning unemployed people to work" and "refusing to co-operate with officials of the service," Mayor John H. Burke of Medford and Mrs. Teresa A. St. Denis, chairman of the public welfare board of Medford and civil works administrator for the city, appeared before the civil works board yesterday.

The mayor explained that he did not understand he was compelled to register for employees through the federal service, and promised full co-operation henceforth when Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the civil works board pointed out that "someone else may have to pay the money." Mrs. St. Denis declared she would pay the wages, if the CWA board refused, but the chairman later relented and said "the matter will be fixed up."

EXPERTS FOR SURVEY

Last night a special messenger was sent by Chairman Bartlett to Gov. Ely at Westfield to obtain his signature to a letter requesting experts from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology to confer with the chairman and others regarding the proposed highway safety survey.

Mayor-elect Frederick W. Mansfield, whose views Chairman Bartlett asked regarding the $6,750,000 public works program submitted by Mayor Curley to the state emergency finance board—three members of which constitute the civil works administration in this state—yesterday conferred with the chairman and said he will present his opinions regarding the various projects next week. Previously, Mansfield had promised to give his judgment on the items today.

State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, a member of the civil works board, yesterday telegraphed Col. Harry L. Hopkins, federal civil works administrator, for a ruling on projects which would include the employment of women as teachers, clerks, nurses, and for knitting, char work and other occupations in the interests of public service.

The resentment of many idle Bostonians at the slowness of city officials in placing men to work caused City Councilman Francis J. Kelley of Dorchester to write to Chairman Bartlett, and urge him to make good his promise to put people to work in cities and towns where officials are slow. Kelley called Bartlett "champion of the unemployed men and women of Massachusetts and Boston," and pleaded with him to intervene in Boston.

A comprehensive survey of Boston's waterfront to obtain data on waterfront property for future use in developing the port will be started by the Boston port authority, the civil works board having approved such a project yesterday. It is expected that information obtained will result in legislative action to restrict the waterfront buildings for marine purposes.

The Medford investigation was launched by William B. Coy, Medford resident, Boston banker and member of the civil works board, after he had heard many complaints that residents of the city were unable to get jobs because hand-picked favorites of Medford officials were being taken care of first. Coy sent two investigators to Medford and on the basis of their report Mayor Burke and Mrs. St. Denis were ordered to appear before the board.

RESENTMENT FADES

Slight resentment on the part of city officials at being called to task by the civil works board was swept aside by Chairman Bartlett, who emphasized that officials involved in the civil works program are federal officials. He impressed this fact on Mrs. St. Denis, whose holding of the public welfare position in Medford has been a cause of controversy in that city.

Stanley Lary, in charge of the local offices of the federal re-employment service, told Chairman Bartlett and Mr. Coy that Medford was the only city which failed to co-operate with the civil works plan. He added that the officials involved ignored the service, and Milton D. Riley, re-employment officer in Medford, but Mayor Burke objected to the work ignored.

The mayor explained that he had never been officially advised that the re-employment service was to establish an office in his city. Questioned by Bartlett, he admitted that he had attended the meeting at the State House, called by Chairman Bartlett and Gov. Ely, at which the civil works setup in this state was explained.

ASSIGNMENT OF MEN

While he vaguely remembered that assignment of men to work was to be on a basis of "50 per cent. from welfare rolls and 50 per cent. from unemployed not on welfare rolls," the mayor pointed out that he had endeavored to get unemployed men, who had stormed Medford city hall seeking work, to register at the re-employment service's office in Medford, but that many refused, and those who went there were told that they could not register.

Lary said he had telephoned Medford city hall, found that Mayor Burke was out of town and conversed with the mayor's secretary, who told him flatly that the city did not intend to recognize the re-employment service, and would assign its own employees. Since that time fully 1500 men, of whom only 350 were from the welfare department, have been put to work.

Mrs. St. Denis was asked by a representative of the federal re-employment service, Lary continued, to provide space for the local office, but the representative was refused. Medford is the only community to refuse such space, said Lary, and the federal people were convinced of a "deliberate desire" to ignore them.

VIOLATIONS OF REGULATIONS

Then Lary found that the city was assigning men to projects conducted by state departments, also a violation of regulations, said Lary. Mrs. St. Denis asserted that she had been called upon by metropolitan district police to send over men, and had sent 12.

When Mayor Burke tried to say that he did not know that one-half the men assigned to work had to be requisitioned through the federal service, Lary checked him and "insisted" he knew it. Chairman Bartlett broke in to inquire about the payrolls. There was a long description of the manner in which payrolls must be paid, but Bartlett cut it short. Lary then told Burke that he had to order Medford department heads to recognize the federal service, and added: "So far we haven't heard from them and they must have had information from some source not to go to our service."

Bartlett then swung to Mrs. St. Denis and said: "Mrs. St. Denis, you realize you are a federal official. You should be careful to observe all the regulations, and I suggest you do this. I advise you people to check those payrolls and find who is responsible—they may have to pay themselves."

CAN PAY MONEY

Asked what she would do if the board decided she, as the person who had certified the payrolls, was responsible for the payment of the money, Mrs. St. Denis said: "If they (the board) refuse to pay the payroll, I guess I can get the money. In fact, I'll check that right now."

Medford officials who attended the conference included Mayor Burke, Mrs. St. Denis, James Kellner, in charge of CWA administrative work in Medford; Wilton B. Fay, park commissioner; Harold J. Nicholson, city engineer; Henry Gaffney, superintendent of wires; Frank B. Blodgett, building commissioner; James C. Gillis, street commissioner; Sgt. Charles E. McCarthy, investigator of welfare recipients, and M. M. Dyer, an architect.

In asking Col. Hopkins for a ruling

on women projects, State Treasurer Hurley declared:

"Now that we have 24,000 additional jobs it seems that money should be used to re-employ available substitutes and applicants for teaching positions in our schools. No other group has suffered as much from the depression and the necessary cuts in expenditures as our teachers. No other group has felt as keenly the requirements of governmental economy. They have been the first to know payless pay-days, the first to take substantial cuts in salary, the first to make generous contributions to charity and welfare aid."

Teachers need the benefits of the CWA program. It would be difficult to find projects more socially desirable or more economically sound than the proposal to allocate CWA funds to local school departments to put teachers to work. The depression, with increased enrollment and reduced teaching staffs, had increased the burden on teachers and had led to inefficiency in our educational program. I hope this condition can be remedied through the use of CWA money."

Chairman Bartlett and Mr. Coy conferred last night with John T. Scully, federal relief administrator, and Dr. Payson Smith, state commissioner of education, on a plan for unemployed women. As the conference adjourned at 11 P. M., Chairman Bartlett announced that Administrator Scully and Mrs. Louis B. Rantoul, in charge of women's relief in the civil works program, will confer again this morning.

To Give Jobs to 10,000 Women

Jobs Will Be Provided on Civil Works Service Projects

12,500 MEN PLACED BY BOSTON PROGRAM

Massachusetts will get approximately $3,000,000 as a gift from the federal government to put 10,000 women to work this week, if possible, Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts civil works administration, announced last night.

Bartlett held a long telephone conversation with Col. Harry L. Hopkins, federal civil works administrator, who said the federal government would pay the labor bill for the women, who will be employed on civil works service projects.

Originally, the women, all of whom are to be employed on a relief basis, were to be paid from the $3,000,000 allocated to the commonwealth on the basis of $1 for each $3 spent by a city or town for welfare relief.

With the new arrangement, Massachusetts will preserve the so-called $3,000,000 welfare money for use by cities and towns for the purchase, in many instances, of materials contributed by the community to further civil works projects.

Mayor Curley led a group of department heads before Chairman Bartlett yesterday. In a few minutes the chairman approved nine projects to furnish work for 1871 men at a cost of $377,329.25. To date, it was reckoned, 12,500 jobs have been created in Boston. Tomorrow the mayor will present additional projects involving 2500 women, mostly clerical help, and 2000 men.

The mayor asked permission to revive the defunct Strandway project by submitting as separate projects those items calling for construction of steps from the road to the beach at South Boston, and a sea wall. The cost of material again disturbed the chairman, who asked the city officials to do their best to cut down on the cost.

That Moses V. Gaskill, town treasurer of Mendon, refuses to sign checks for about 20 CWA workers in the town unless he is paid for his labor, was reported by Roy A. Barrows, certifying agent of the town, to William B. Coy, Boston banker and member of the civil works board. A project calling for $180 to pay Gaskill for his labor was rejected by Coy.

Mrs. Louis McHenry Howe, wife of one of President Roosevelt's secretaries, will present women projects to Chairman Bartlett today with Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, in charge of women's activities for the CWA. Mrs. Howe visited the board yesterday with several projects for Fall River and agreed to assist Mrs. Rantoul in whipping the women's projects into shape for submission today.

After his conversation with Col. Hopkins related that among the women's projects which can be approved are knitting, sewing, canning, cataloguing in libraries and other types of labor for which women are fitted. The chairman was obviously pleased at the solution of a vexing problem and said that Mrs. Rantoul and Mrs. Howe felt that things were "very satisfactory." Observers declared that the co-operation shown by Col. Hopkins was a tribute to the work done by the Massachusetts board under the leadership of Chairman Bartlett.

TEACHER PROJECTS

Teacher projects have not as yet been decided upon, the chairman declared. Dr. Payson Smith, state commissioner of education, will present these projects, and is making every effort to have the national government officials change their view that $15,000 monthly for teachers in the commonwealth is enough.

About 2500 of the 10,000 women to be hired will be employed in a statewide census of the unemployed, to be supervised by the state department of labor and industries, under Commr. Edwin S. Smith. Other projects devised by Mrs. Rantoul and Mrs. Howe contemplate the employment of 5800 women.

While giving the state extra money not originally planned on, the federal gift will do more to preserve the civil works plan in this state, for much of the $1 in $3 welfare money had been tagged for use in buying materials as the contribution of the city or town. The civil works board has insisted that cities and towns donate a certain portion of the costs of materials, and many communities intended to use the welfare money from the federal government and the savings in local welfare departments to make up this money.

The confusion of many persons regarding those eligible for employment in CWA projects was brought to the attention of the board. It was alleged that an engineering bureau planned to hold examinations to determine those best qualified for jobs on the highway safety survey to be conducted for the CWA by Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

NO PICKS OR SHOVELS

The chairman pointed out that he had informed Col. R. C. Eddy to requisition for engineers and other technical men from the federal re-employment service and welfare departments in the state, but if he was unable to get qualified men he could then turn to the engineering and architectural bureaus where such men have been registered for lengthy periods.

On the other hand, fully 2000 persons have enrolled with the Boston welfare department in the belief that they cannot obtain work unless they are on the welfare rolls. Many of them have not registered at the federal re-employment service in Boston. Those who registered with the welfare department will not receive aid immediately, officials believing that absolute need cannot be proven.

Those communities which have had difficulty in obtaining equipment for CWA workers must "carry on" in some manner, the chairman indicated yesterday when Mayor Curley pointed out that the park department cannot buy picks or shovels anywhere in the city. The mayor suggested that the city be allowed to hire second-hand shovels from contractors, or buy them, but no definite answer was given by Bartlett, who pointed out that nationally there is a shortage of such tools because of the demands of the CWA buying agents.

The mayor also asked whether the city could use a double-shift system and thus put 7000 men to work at once, but Bartlett ruled that this could be done only in the case of clerical workers where the space available was so small that to complete the work by Feb. 15 two shifts of workers would be needed.

APPROVES PROJECTS

Bartlett quickly approved projects presented by Charles J. Fox, Boston budget commissioner, to add to the street working force, surveying parties, grading and grubbing at Marine park and Castle Island. The chairman balked when projects were presented to make a survey of fire escapes in the city or to survey tenement houses having refrigeration.

"Charlie is certainly ingenious," the mayor observed with a smile, as Bartlett checked the projects with a fiat, "Out, out."

The CWA head then suggested to Mayor Curley that cobble stones in certain streets be removed so that a smooth surface would result. He cited a ride he had over Albany street between Broadway and Dover streets, which could be made less rough if the depressions and ridges were smoothed. The mayor promised to have a list of streets where such work could be done in cold weather ready tomorrow.

As the Boston conference ended Bartlett asked the mayor to bring in additional projects for 4500 persons, which Curley felt was the limit in Boston. The mayor pointed out that the regular city force of 18,000 employees included 3500 in supervisory capacity, while the CWA force of 17,000 will have, under present plans only 300. He asked a larger supervisory force so that the city will obtain real results from the projects.

State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, a member of the civil works board, and Mr. Coy, who handles the financial end of the CWA for this state, were amazed when Roy Barrows, head of the public welfare department of the town of Mendon, said that Town Treasurer Gaskill had refused to sign CWA checks.

Gaskill, a part-time worker, has resigned his position as assistant disbursing officer for the town, the board members were told. The reason he gave was that he wanted to be paid for his work of signing 20 checks. Not knowing that the CWA board is unpaid, Barrows brought in a project to give $180 to Gaskill for his check-signing labor.

"Offer him the payroll this week and if he refuses to sign the checks let me know," Coy said, ominously. Barrows left to return to Mendon and tell Gaskill either he could resign as town treasurer or refuse to sign the checks.

Mayor Curley yesterday informed Chairman Bartlett that he intends to

10,000 JOBS FOR WOMEN APPROVED

Additional Grant of $3,000,000 Made to This State

BY JOHN GRIFFIN

An extra grant of approximately $3,000,000 was assured to Massachusetts last night for the employment of 10,000 women on Civil Works service projects throughout the State, and one of the most difficult problems before the Civil Works Board was thereby solved.

Colonel Harry L. Hopkins, federal relief administrator, in a telephone conversation with Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the board late last night agreed to give the money, which is in addition to the $3,000,000 allotted last week to federal relief work here.

have to be done away with, but the board bombarded Washington with demands and requests for means of taking care of the women, and the assurance of Colonel Hopkins finally settled the question.

Although the board members, including Chairman Bartlett, State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, and William B. Coy, declined to confirm the report, it was said that the splendid showing of this State under the Civil Works programme was largely responsible for the decision in Washington.

Another important point in the ruling was that the women under the new projects may be hired on the basis of need. That is, they need not be on welfare relief, but can be taken from the re-employment service lists.

$202,000 for Tech Survey

One of the large general projects approved yesterday was that of a highway safety survey to be conducted under the direction of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. It will cost $202,000 and give employment to 768 trained men, mostly engineers. These will be taken from welfare and unemployment lists, but if those agencies are not able to supply qualified men, they may be selected from the outside and approved by the federal re-employment service.

Approximately 2500 women will be put to work on a State census of the unemployed, which was approved by Colonel Hopkins after it was submitted by Chairman Bartlett, and the possibility of other surveys was seen.

Figures made public last night showed that up to yesterday 109,693 jobs have been approved, calling for the payment of $17,382,808 in wages, the expenditure of $2,623,796 in materials and contributions of $3,510,796 by the cities and towns, making a gross total expenditure of $23,517,400. These figures indicated, Chairman Bartlett said, that the civil works quota of 121,000 jobs will surely be filled by Friday.

All the projects must be approved by Friday, but a few days leeway will be allowed for the actual starting of work, it was learned.

Provision for the employment of a

Approved 00 Women

total of 17,000 in Boston was made at a conference with Mayor Curley and the Civil Works Board. The board has already approved projects for the employment of 12,500 in this city, and a further list of 4500 or so will be approved shortly. Of the new lot, 2500 will be white-collar workers and 2000 laborers. The city has experienced some difficulty in securing picks and shovels for the approved projects, Mayor Curley reported, and another factor delaying the start of some projects is that it takes the federal re-employment bureau three days to assign men to the jobs.

The board decided to take up the matter of speeding the work of the agency, and provide more clerks for that purpose, and suggested that Mayor Curley hire tools from local contractors or buy them second-hand. It developed during the conference that the board has assigned inspectors to check up on the operation of the Boston Civil Works projects, which Mayor Curley termed a "very excellent thing."

Street Work Approved

Boston received approval of a project calling for the reconstruction of 70 streets, which will cost $142,000 and entail the employment of 717 men. Another large project which was approved was the repaving of park department gymnasiums and municipal and playground buildings, to cost $105,534 and give employment of 274 men. Also approved was the grading and grubbing of Marine Park and Castle Island at a cost of $44,959, to employ 274 men.

The possibility of employing double shift of workers on the new projects which Mayor Curley will present, was seen as Chairman Bartlett agreed that if there is not enough room in which the clerical employees can work, double shifts will be permitted.

Wants Pay for Signing Checks

A peculiar development arose when Roy A. Barrows, Civil Works administrator for the town of Mendon, appeared with a project calling for the payment of $20 to Moses V. Gaskill, town treasurer, who also is disbursing officer for the Civil Works Board. It appeared from Barrows' report that Gaskill refused to sign the pay checks due workers in that town on Civil Works projects, on the ground that he should be paid for doing so.

Barrows was directed to tell Gaskill to sign the checks, and if he refuses, he will be removed from his position as disbursing officer.

NO AID JOBS TO G. O. P. VOTERS

Charge of Councillor Roberts on CWA Work

Charging that Republicans did not have "a burglar's chance" of getting a CWA job here, City Councillor George W. Roberts, representing Back Bay's Ward 4, last night demanded that the civil works assignments be allotted without any preference for political party or Congressional district.

He alleged that more than 65 per cent of men and women put to work in Boston under the provisions of the CWA, were constituents of Congressman John

W. McCormack of South Boston. "I am not criticising Congressman McCormack. Good luck to him. But I do not think that an unemployed man or woman should be passed up merely because he or she happens to be enrolled in the Republican party," Roberts explained.

MAYOR SEEKS ACTION

Will Go to Washington to Speed Up City's Works Projects Involving $5,800,000 and 4000 Men

Mayor Curley is going to Washington tomorrow night for the expressed purpose of speeding up Boston's $5,800,000 public works programme so that 4000 men may go to work on NRA projects as soon as the civil works army demobilizes, Feb. 15.

The projects which have been approved by the State Emergency Finance Board and the federal advisory committee here include $1,000,000 for streets, $1,000,000 for sewers, $300,000 for water main, $2,000,000 for school buildings and $1,500,000 for hospital buildings, and must be approved by the Public Works Administration at Washington before the money will be made available under the NRA.

The City Council, yesterday, approved additional projects calling for the expenditure of $3,150,000 more, including $1,000,000 for the reconstruction of streets, $1,000,000 for sewers, $700,000 for water main extensions and $450,000 for a new wayfarers' lodge at the charity administration building.

At the same time the Council held up for a final decision next Monday its calling for $800,000 for prison buildings at Deer Island, $1,075,000 for consolidated fire stations, and $750,000 for consolidated police stations.

CWA Jobs Approved for 10,000 Women

As a result of the assurance by Colonel Hopkins, Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul and Mrs. Louis McHenry Howe, wife of the Presidential secretary, will submit plans immediately for knitting, sewing, canning, cataloging and other projects at which the women will be put to work. The inclusion of the 10,000 women in the Massachusetts allotment means that the complete quota of 121,000 jobs in this State will be reached either today or tomorrow, well within the time limit.

These jobs for women must be approved before Friday and the women will be at work as soon as it is mechanically possible thereafter. They will be guaranteed work for 10 weeks, the same as those who come under the Civil Works programme. School teachers, however, are not to be included in the Civil Works service classification, and their problem remains to be worked out.

Pleased Over Jobs for Women

A great burden was lifted from the local board by the announcement of Colonel Hopkins, because the board went ahead more than a week ago and approved projects for women, which included knitting and sewing. For a time it appeared as if these jobs would have to be done away with, but the board bombarded Washington with demands and requests for means of taking care of the women, and the assurance of Colonel Hopkins finally settled the question.

Provision for the employment of a total of 17,000 in Boston was made at a conference with Mayor Curley and the Civil Works Board. The board has already approved projects for the employment of 12,500 in this city, and a further list of 4500 or so will be approved shortly. Of the new lot, 2500 will be white-collar workers and 2000 laborers. The city has experienced some difficulty in securing picks and shovels for the approved projects, Mayor Curley reported, and another factor delaying the start of some projects is that it takes the federal re-employment bureau three days to assign men to the jobs.

The board decided to take up the matter of speeding the work of the agency, and provide more clerks for that purpose, and suggested that Mayor Curley hire tools from local contractors or buy them second-hand. It developed during the conference that the board has assigned inspectors to check up on the operation of the Boston Civil Works projects, which Mayor Curley termed a "very excellent thing."

Street Work Approved

Boston received approval of a project calling for the reconstruction of 70 streets, which will cost $142,000 and entail the employment of 717 men. Another large project which was approved was the repairing of park department gymnasiums and municipal and playground buildings, to cost $105,534 and give employment of 274 men. Also approved was the grading and grubbing of Marine Park and Castle Island at a cost of $44,559, to employ 274 men.

The possibility of employing double shift of workers on the new projects which Mayor Curley will present, was seen as Chairman Bartlett agreed that if there is not enough room in which the clerical employees can work, double shifts will be permitted.

Wants Pay for Signing Checks

A peculiar development arose when Roy A. Barrows, Civil Works administrator for the town of Mendon, appeared with a project calling for the payment of $20 a week to Moses U. Gaskill, town treasurer, who also is disbursement officer for the Civil Works Board. It appeared from Barrows' report that Gaskill refused to sign the pay checks due workers in that town on Civil Works projects, on the ground that he should be paid for doing so.

Barrows was directed to tell Gaskill to sign the checks, and if he refuses, he will be removed from his position as disbursing officer.

NO AID JOBS TO G. O. P. VOTERS

Charge of Councillor Roberts on CWA Work

Charging that Republicans did not have "a burglar's chance" of getting a CWA job here, City Councillor George W. Roberts, representing Back Bay's Ward 4, last night demanded that the civil works assignments be allotted without any preference for political party or Congressional district. He alleged that more than 65 per cent of men and women put to work in Boston under the provisions of the CWA were constituents of Congressman John

W. McCormack of South Boston. "I am not criticising Congressman McCormack. Good luck to him. But I do not think that an unemployed man or woman should be passed up merely because he or she happens to be enrolled in the Republican party," Roberts explained.

MAYOR SEEKS ACTION

Will Go to Washington to Speed Up City's Works Projects Involving $5,800,000 and 4000 Men

Mayor Curley is going to Washington tomorrow night for the expressed purpose of speeding up Boston's $5,800,000 public works programme so that 4000 men may go to work on NRA projects as soon as the civil works army demobilizes, Feb. 15.

The projects which have been approved by the State Emergency Finance Board and the federal advisory committee here include $1,000,000 for streets, $1,000,000 for sewers, $300,000 for water main, $2,000,000 for school buildings and $1,500,000 for hospital buildings, and must be approved by the Public Works Administration at Washington before the money will be made available under the NRA.

The City Council, yesterday, approved additional projects calling for the expenditure of $3,150,000 more, including $1,000,000 for the reconstruction of streets, $1,000,000 for sewers, $700,000 for water main extensions and $450,000 for a new wayfarers' lodge at the charity administration building.

At the same time the Council held up for a final decision next Monday items calling for $800,000 for prison buildings at Deer Island, $1,075,000 for consolidated fire stations, and $750,000 for consolidated police stations.

WILL GIVE 1000 TEACHERS JOBS

Washington Authorizes Hiring Outside Quota

To Instruct Adults, Care for Pre-School Children

Work for at least 1000 unemployed school teachers in Massachusetts was assured last evening by a telephone message from Washington stating that not only would special funds be allocated to pay these women, but they will be considered as additional to the job quota assigned to the Commonwealth.

The announcement was received by Commissioner of Education Payson Smith from L. R. Alderman, director of the Federal Emergency Education Program. He also reported to the State Civil Works Board that Federal Relief Administrator Harry L. Hopkins will allocate to the States, in addition to their regular Civil Works quotas, the employment of 40,000 teachers to be paid an average compensation of $50 per month.

The work must be done in educational centers, however, and those desiring the positions are advised that no regular class assignments outside of the original $15,000 per month allotment will be given. This leaves the problem only partially solved as far as concerning Supt. of Boston Schools Patrick Campbell, who had planned to use extra teachers in overcrowded class rooms.

Curley Seeks 4500 Jobs

Mayor Curley will appear before the Civil Works Board at 11 o'clock this morning in an effort to put 4500 more men and women to work in Boston. He called in all his department heads yesterday afternoon and notified them to have plenty of projects ready so that the city can obtain its full quota of jobs and get the unemployed to work before the 15th, the deadline for beginning CWA projects.

Approximately 43,000 persons had been assigned work by the Federal Reemployment Service last Saturday, according to a report issued by Dr. Robert S. Quimby, director of the service for Massachusetts. The other half of the approximately 170,000 jobs which had been approved at that time had been filled from welfare lists.

State May Get Still More

That Massachusetts will, in all probability, get a few thousand additional jobs in the near future because of the fine piece of work turned in by the State Civil Works Board, was the opinion of Robert W. Kelso, C. W. A. Administrator for the Northeastern States, who visited the Massachusetts Board yesterday afternoon.

"It is obvious that the Massachusetts Board will easily make its quota," said Mr. Kelso. "I have nothing but praise for this board which, without any pre-existing machinery, has turned out such a complete, fine job."

He added that all of the States under his jurisdiction were apparently completing their quotas on time, with Maine the only State which would have to hasten to finish in the given period. Maine with a 16,000 jobs quota, New Hampshire with 11,000, Vermont with 8000, Rhode Island with 18,000, and Connecticut with 40,000 jobs, are all entering the final lap to go through on schedule.

To Instruct Adults

The program to place 5000 additional women to work in addition to the 5000 already placed, which Mrs. Lois Rantoul is preparing, is expected by the board today.

A detailed report is expected tonight so that the board will know how much work it will have to complete by Friday. Women's projects are allowed more leeway but the board is anxious to get them started so that the women may get their share of funds as soon as possible.

Charles Howard, coordinator for the State Department, has projects calling for employment of more than 2000 women which he will present today.

As a result of the Washington action, emergency educational centers are to be established in a large number of cities and towns. Instruction will be given to adults, and nurseries will be established for children of pre-school age. Under the Washington decision no other form of educational work will be done.

These centers will be set up by local school authorities in the schools. It is expected some of these centers will be opened within 10 days.

Registration on Nashua St

M. J. McCarten, director of the Massachusetts Employment Service, said last night that registration of applicants for employment on Boston Civil Works that has been carried on at the Irvington-st armory for the past three weeks has been transferred to the Public Works Building at 100 Nashua st. The office has found many duplications in registrations and believes one registration is sufficient. The officials also point out that it is unnecessary for applicants to call at the registration office for assignment of work, as cards will be sent through the mail to all applicants assigned to work.

Chairman Bartlett stated last night that the only information he has received concerning Mayor-Elect Mansfield's opinions on the proposed public works program is that he favors the sewer and street projects, but is somewhat opposed to the Way-farer's lodge rebuilding proposal.

Day's Projects Approved

Projects approved by the board yesterday include:

Chicopee, $105,000, 205 men.
Plymouth, $2431, 38 men.

DISBURSING OFFICE VITAL C. W. A. LINK

Barracough Handling Big Job in Bay State

A very important, and hitherto scarcely noticed, branch of the Civil Works Administration in Massachusetts is the financial disbursing office in charge of Herbert H. Barracough, who was the Federal disbursing officer of the veteran's relief department before the development of the Civil Works program. He still holds that position and the duty of handling the C. W. A. payroll has been added to his labors.

At present the office has a staff of more than 50 men and women, all working at double speed. As soon as men or women are placed at work on a project the disbursing office must arrange for their payment at the completion of the first week. Organization is now working smoothly and all payrolls are being met without delay.

Checks Sent From Capital

The checks for the workers are sent from Washington and are payable by the United States Treasury. They come in blank form and have Mr. Barracough's name printed on them. His signature is not required, but without the printed name they are not valid.

The blank checks are kept under lock and key in the Boston office and are distributed from here as they are needed. Assistant disbursing officers have been chosen in every town and city where there is a Civil Works project under way.

These assistants are chosen by the State and are usually the town treasurers, who are also bonded by the State. After Federal approval of their bonds they may receive enough blank checks to cover the payments for any Civil Works jobs in their town. Customarily enough checks are sent out at a time to cover payrolls for four or five weeks.

In the event of theft or loss of any checks the Treasury Department at Washington is notified immediately. The tracing of the checks is placed in the hands of the Secret Service.

Checks Up on Materials

Among other duties, Mr. Barracough is responsible for the money spent on materials. Under the C. W. A. not more than 25 percent of an allotment can be spent on materials. The rest must go for labor. If a town or city spends more than 25 percent, or spends money on materials which they do not need but hope to keep at the termination of the C. W. A., the bill is sent from the local office here to Washington. No town is allowed to spend money on anything but labor except where it is necessary.

It is due to the efficiency of the disbursing office that payrolls have been met as soon as a work has been started. Their bonding of the assistant disbursers, distributing the checks, and tracing of money expended has played an important part in the success of this unprecedented effort to put men to work.

WILL KEEP 4,000,000 ON CIVIL WORKS JOBS TO SPRING AT LEAST

Government to Ask Billion or More From Congress—
Direct Relief Into Summer, Conservation Corps
Continued—Public Works, Farm Relief to Come

WASHINGTON, Dec. 12 (A. P.)—A billion dollars for carrying on the emergency unemployment activities of the Government was estimated in official circles today as the least the Administration would ask of the forthcoming Congress.

This sum does not include extension of the Public Works or the Farm Relief programs.

The needs for carrying on emergency relief activities after Feb. 15, when all present funds are expected to be exhausted, were set forth today as follows:

Civil Works Administration program, $300,000,000 to $600,000,000.

Emergency Relief Administration, including the Federal Surplus Relief Corporation, $250,000,000 to $500,000,000.

Civilian Conservation Corps, $300,000,000.

Year More of Relief

The programs of the Civil Works Administration, the Federal Emergency Relief Administration and the Federal Surplus Relief Corporation, all headed by Harry L. Hopkins, were ready today for submission to the President.

The Emergency Relief program calls for continuing the present direct relief through the Winter and indefinitely into the Summer. It is regarded as probable that the Federal Government will not be able to abandon this work for another year or more.

The Civil Works program, it was learned on high authority, will be continued in full, with the prospective 4,000,000 employees being retained on the rolls until Spring, at least. After that, with one Winter over, the probability was expressed that there would be a gradual lessening of the number employed on this form of work. Officials privately expressed the hope that industry would start absorbing these workers even before Spring.

It is known that the President hopes to continue the Civilian Conservation Corps another six months, possibly longer.

$100,000,000 to States for Food

The Civil Works program will cost the Government $500,000,000 between now and Feb. 15. Officials say there were 2,500,000 persons on the Civil Works payroll last Thursday and that by Dec. 16 the full quota of 4,000,000 men and women will be at work.

In addition, around $100,000,000 will be allocated to the States by the Relief Administration or spent for food and clothing to be given needy unemployed.

The Emergency Relief Administration today had approximately $197,000,000 left of the $500,000,000 appropriation, but $100,000,000 of this had been allotted to the Civil Works program.

Should the Civil Works program be carried until April 15 another $300,000,000 would be needed.

The question of tools for workers is proving a problem for the Civil Works Administration. Hopkins has appealed to the national organization of hardware manufacturers and as a result it was stated today that several factories were starting at once working day and night to supply picks, shovels, wheelbarrows and other hand tools needed.

BARTLETT OUTLINES STATE RELIEF WORK

Says 109,000 Have Been Assigned to Jobs

Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts Emergency Finance Board, came to the legislative luncheon of the Massachusetts Civic League, yesterday at 3 Joy st., outlined what the board has been trying to do since its establishment, and closed with the hope that while the efforts are being made, his hearers have confidence in what the board is attempting to accomplish.

He told the gathering that his office now has proof of 109,000 men having been put to work and he hoped to have authorized approval soon to have a total of 121,000 men and women engaged in some useful occupation on a wage basis.

The speakers described the big task of organizing a machine to get the unemployed to work in 355 cities and towns. He lauded the cooperation on the part of city and town officials through the State.

He said there were crowds of unemployed, who during the last three years of the depression haven't sought public welfare aid but have been determined enough to look for work. Those now going to work with the help of Federal funds are doing it, he said, in the spirit of trying to earn.

The people of Massachusetts, he asserted, will soon learn what a serious problem this was. He characterized activity of the Government as "a life-saver for Massachusetts."

Mr. Bartlett was high in his praise of Col. Hopkins, in charge in Washington, whom he called "one of the finest officials I've ever had the pleasure to work with."

He said that his eyes had been opened by the conditions he encountered, that acquaintances of 25 and 30 years ago whom he knew to be comfortably fixed, were now looking for a chance for gainful occupation.

He urged people to be patient if they see a man who has been swinging a pick and shovel on some project, take a rest. He explained that to many this work is new.

More than $30,000,000, he continued, is being distributed in this State to people who have been out of employment and who need it. This money, to be expended from now until Feb. 15, he pointed out, is bound to help every industry and store.

Aid for Artists to Be Planned in Boston Today

CWA Committee Is Meeting
at Museum of Fine
Arts

By Albert Franz Cochrane

A movement to aid New England artists who have been hard hit by the depression was started in Boston this afternoon when the regional committee of the Federal Public Works of Art Project, a subsidiary of the C. W. A., met at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts to discuss local ways and means of launching a program designed to give employment to 2500 artists throughout the United States.

A number of artists, museum directors, and others, were invited to the museum meeting by Henry F. Taylor, chairman of the New England committee, and director of the Worcester Museum of Art. Those urged to attend the meeting were also asked to supply the names of destitute artists, paying especial attention to those qualified for decoration of public buildings.

Assisting Chairman Taylor in making up this list are Paul J. Sachs, associate director of the Fogg Museum at Harvard, and Edward J. Holmes, director of the Boston Museum, at whose office the afternoon meeting was held. They sent telegrams to directors of all New England museums urging them to Boston this afternoon. Many of those invited were taken by surprise, knowing nothing of the contemplated project, which was started only a day or so ago in Washington. Twenty-five accepted invitations and started for Boston at once.

The program, as announced in Washington, will be under the general supervision of L. W. Robert, Jr., Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and was agreed

Only artists of professional standing will be considered, he said.

While the known leanings in art of various of those placed in charge of the movement throughout the country are largely toward modernism—with a few notable exceptions, such as Mr. Holmes, director of the Boston Museum—Mr. Taylor was emphatic in stating that no discrimination will be shown.

"Our project is two-fold," he said. "First to give employment to as many painters as possible. Second to select from what is thus made available work suitable to recommend to the Government for the decoration of public buildings."

Mr. Taylor also revealed that his committee had obtained from Washington a ruling to the effect that any framed picture could come under the official interpretation of a "mural." A mural is generally considered to be limited to a picture painted directly into the fresh plaster.

Under the new ruling, it will be possible to commission not only small paintings in oils, but etchings, lithographs and other such studies, suitable for distribution to public schools for exhibition and instruction in the various arts. Mr. Taylor believes the larger projects will be few in number, for lack of practice in work on a grand scale has prevented the development of many painters competent of such undertakings.

Denying the suggestion emanating from Washington news sources that Federal buildings are to be turned over freely to every painter who applies for work, Mr. Taylor stated that preliminary employment will take the established form of any competition, the drawing up of entry sketches. This work will be paid for on a salary basis. But the Government, through its committees, will reserve the right to commission or reject such entries.

114,055 Work on Projects of CWA Here

State Board Rushing to Fill State's Quota of 121,000
by Friday

The State Civil Works Board, composed of Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett, State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley and William B. Coy, Boston banker, has authorized to date the employment of 114,055 men and women on projects throughout the State in connection with the Federal CWA program. The Federal quota for Massachusetts, which must be completed by Friday, calls for the employment of approximately 121,000 persons and officials of the board are certain that the remainder of the State's program will be approved before Friday and the remaining 7000 persons placed at work.

The wage payments to the workers, as of today, reached $18,320,928, while

Chairman Bartlett today approved a number of new projects in Boston to provide work for 717 men at an expenditure of $189,598. Other projects calling for the employment of thousands of men were submitted to the board and given tentative approval, while many projects calling for the employment of women were also presented and held over for the Civil Works Service.

Statutes of Boston's statesmen of the past, which have not been given their usual bath for five or six years, are to be cleaned by nine men at a cost of $1400. This project received the tentative approval of the State board today.

Chairman Bartlett was informed that the city of Boston is struggling with the problem of getting proper foremen and supervisors from the two official sources from which the men are selected, the welfare lists and Federal registration.

Mayor Curley sought permission to seek such supervisors from other sources but Chairman Bartlett insisted that the mayor go over the matter with the particular authorities in each case and insist on competent help before seeking relief elsewhere. Mr. Bartlett admitted that there might be some difficulty in getting the trained men needed on many projects, but stated that he wants the general public to know that they are being treated fairly in the matter and that he wants the available lists scoured first.

Chairman Charles P. Howard of the commission on administration and finance today presented a large batch of new projects to Chairman Bartlett, many of which were tentatively approved.

Except in cases where communities are behind in their quotas, projects are being tentatively approved and Chairman Bartlett is hopeful that all be ready within the next day or two for final approval. The following new projects were approved today by the State board:

Peabody, ten men, $4461, interior and exterior painting of fire station; Newburyport, 104 men, $15,584, graveling and ditch work; Lynn, 257 men, $50,223, road, playground and reservation work; Framingham, 135 men, $23,736, road and playground work; Northfield, twenty men, $2004, brush, graveling and drainage work; Winchester, fifteen men, $3719, painting and renovating three elementary schools; Avon, twenty men, $1420, drainage, cleaning and park work; Dighton, ten men, $31127, graveling and road work; Chicopee, eighty men, $11,949, laying drain pipe.

$1,652,251 for Bay State War Projects

Washington, Dec. 13 (A.P.)—Representative McCormack of Boston said today that he had been informed by Civil Works Administrator Hopkins that War Department projects in Massachusetts totaling $1,652,251 have been approved. The projects are expected to provide employment for 1941 unemployed men who will be hired through the State re-employment bureaus.

Mr. McCormack conferred with Hopkins this morning to urge immediate approval of the Massachusetts projects recommended to the Q W A by the War Department and two hours later was told the entire list had been approved. He then was assured that work will be started immediately and that some men probably will be at work within a few days. The projects include:

For the Boston quartermaster depot, $900,000.

For reconditioning of the First Corps Area headquarters, $25,000.

For the Watertown Arsenal, $370,042.

For number of projects at Fort Devens, $579,907.

For the Springfield Armory which Representative Granfield of Massachusetts had asked be started immediately, $61,546.

For improvement of property at Fort Banks, $15,720.

The projects approved today bring the total allocated for the South Boston Army base to $1,129,000.

100,000 Women Get CWA Jobs

Washington, Dec. 13 (A.P.)—The Civil Works Administration today reported approximately 100,000 women have been given jobs. With figures still lacking for a half-dozen States, the names of which were withheld, officials said 94,798 women were on the payrolls last Monday. The women's division of the CWA estimated that over 400,000 women are in need of assistance.

WILL GIVE 1941 BAY STATE WORK

Army Base and Fort
Devens Improvements

Watertown and Springfield
Share in $1,642,151

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 (A. P.)—War Department projects which officials estimated would give employment to 1941 men and involving expenditure of $1,642,151 in Massachusetts were approved today by the Civil Works Administration.

Representative McCormack of Massachusetts was informed two hours after making a personal appeal for early approval of the projects that the entire supplementary program of the War Department in Massachusetts had been approved and would be started at once. The War Department, McCormack said, asserted some men would be at work within a few days.

The largest project called for expenditure of $900,000 for repair or replacement of the wharf piling and general reconditioning of the entire wharf and docking facilities at the Boston Quartermaster Depot in South Boston. This project, officials estimated, would provide work for 12 supervisors, 300 skilled workers, 150 semiskilled workers and 250 unskilled workers, with work to be started within 15 days.

Repairs at Watertown

Another allotment of $25,000 was approved for reconditioning and painting of the First Corps Area headquarters at Boston, with estimated employment for one supervisor, 10 skilled workers, two semiskilled workers and three unskilled workers, with work to be started in 10 days.

The Watertown Arsenal was allotted $70,042 for three projects.

Four buildings will be repaired at a cost of $21,920, with work for two supervisors, 20 skilled workers, six semiskilled workers and 14 unskilled men, to be started within 10 days. Work of painting seven buildings at a cost of $62,762 will be started within five days, with employment for two supervisors, 46 skilled workers, 10 semiskilled workers and 10 unskilled workers, while an additional $7280 will be spent on road repairs, with employment within 10 days for five supervisors, 70 skilled workers, 14 semiskilled workers and 40 laborers.

Nine Devens Projects

Nine projects at Fort Devens totaling $597,907, which Representative Rogers of Massachusetts had advocated in conferences with Civil Works Administrator Hopkins, also were approved. They were:

For clearing fire breaks, $38,760, with employment within five days for three supervisors, six skilled workers and 70 laborers.

For clearing underbrush, $43,776, with employment within five days for three supervisors, six skilled workers, six semiskilled workers and 65 laborers.

For transplanting trees, $54,555, with employment in 10 days for four supervisors, 20 skilled workers, six semiskilled workers and 58 laborers.

For salvaging buildings, $26,455, with work within 10 days for one supervisor, five skilled workers, six semiskilled workers and 66 laborers. For cleaning filter beds, $43,776, with work within 10 days for eight supervisors, 15 skilled workers, 16 semiskilled workers and 170 laborers.

For drainage, $8120, with work within 10 days for two supervisors, four skilled workers, 74 semiskilled workers and 30 laborers. For painting, $15,000, with work for two supervisors, 30 skilled workers, eight semiskilled workers and eight laborers.

For grading of the landing field, $22,560, with employment within 10 days for 41 supervisors, 122 skilled workers, 93 semiskilled workers and 340 laborers.

In all more than 1000 men will be employed at Fort Devens.

At Springfield Arsenal

The Springfield Arsenal was allotted $61,546 for four projects designed to provide work for 119 men. They were:

Road repairs, $36,576, with employment within 10 days for two supervisors, 10 skilled workers, eight semiskilled workers and 40 laborers.

Regrading and removing debris, $3900, within 15 days, for one supervisor, one skilled worker, one semiskilled worker and 20 laborers.

Painting, including the armory fence, $9204, with work within 10 days for one supervisor, one skilled worker, two semiskilled workers and two laborers.

Repairs to buildings, $11,866, with employment within 10 days for one supervisor, 10 skilled workers, five semiskilled workers and five laborers. Fort Banks and harbor posts at Boston were awarded $15,720 for improvements which within 10 days should give work to one supervisor, 10 skilled workers, 10 semiskilled workers and 10 laborers.

All the men to be employed will be hired by the State Employment Bureaus.

CHECK-UP FOR ALL JOBS POSSIBLE

Appeal Throughout State as Time Limit Nears

Chance for Thousands More Women—Projects Wanted

So close was the State Civil Works Board to the 121,250 jobs quota allotted to Massachusetts that at adjournment time last night a telegram was sent out to local C. W. A. chairmen in every city and town in the State requesting immediate information as to the number of persons approved for employment in each community.

Figures compiled by a statistics department, under the board, indicated last night that approval had been already given for 120,161 jobs for men and women in the State.

"The importance of immediate response to the request for accurate figures cannot be over-emphasized," said Chairman Bartlett, "because we must not let one person go unemployed who can be squeezed into the Civil Works program. We must also know how many women have already secured work or been allocated to it, so that we can fill our 10,000 jobs for women quota before we go on to any further approvals."

Urgent Need for Haste

The telegram sent to the 355 city and town C. W. A. chairmen in the State reads as follows:

"Write at once number of women approved for work on all projects; number of skilled persons at work on all projects; number of unskilled persons at work on all projects; total number of persons at work on all projects. Essential that this information be in our hands not later than noon, Dec. 14."

So urgent is the need for haste in response to this message that Chairman Bartlett asked the newspapers to request that local chairmen take announcement of the telegram in this morning's papers as official notice if they had not already received it.

The ruling concerning the 10,000 jobs quota for women was so recent that no special check had been kept up to date on women alone by the State Board.

2700 Women Provided For

Although Mrs. Lois Rantoul had not presented her projects calling for employment of women, up to last night, work was provided for 2700 women yesterday through approval of the project proposed through the State Department of Labor and Industries by Charles P. Howard. The work to be done consists of a survey of the unemployed throughout the State. The total number of persons to be employed in ever this work is 3085, and 2700 of these will be women. The project will cost $175,000.

It is expected that Mrs. Rantoul will present her projects calling for employment of women this morning noon and approval of her projects should clean up the work of allocating funds at the present time.

were not able to go to work because they lacked paint and brushes. The delegation seemed a bit surprised, but Mayor Curley explained that some one had fallen down on the job and he would see to it that the situation was righted at once.

Projects given actual approval yesterday are as follows:

Peabody—2 men, $4461.55.
Newburyport, 104 men, $15,584.
Lynn—257 men, $50,000.
Northfield—20 men, $3004.

Aid for Artists to Be Planned in Boston Today

CWA Committee Is Meeting
at Museum of Fine
Arts

By Albert Franz Cochrane

A movement to aid New England artists who have been hard hit by the depression was started in Boston this afternoon when the regional committee of the Federal Public Works of Art Project, a subsidiary of the C. W. A., met at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts to discuss local ways and means of launching a program designed to give employment to 2500 artists throughout the United States.

A number of artists, museum directors, and others were invited to the museum meeting by Henry F. Taylor, chairman of the New England committee, and director of the Worcester Museum of Art. Those urged to attend the meeting were also asked to supply the names of destitute artists, paying especial attention to those qualified for decoration of public buildings.

Assisting Chairman Taylor in making up this list are Paul J. Sachs, associate director of the Fogg Museum at Harvard, and Edward J. Holmes, director of the Boston museum, at whose office the afternoon meeting was held. They sent telegrams to directors of all New England museums urging them to Boston this afternoon. Many of those invited were taken by surprise, knowing nothing of the contemplated project, which was started only a day or so ago in Washington. Twenty-five accepted invitations and started for Boston at once.

The program, as announced in Washington, will be under the general supervision of L. W. Robert, Jr., Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and was agreed.

Only artists of professional standing will be considered, he said. While the known leanings in art of various of those placed in charge of the movement throughout the country are largely toward modernism—with a few notable exceptions, such as Mr. Holmes, director of the Boston Museum—Mr. Taylor was emphatic in stating that no discrimination will be shown.

"Our project is two-fold," he said. "First to give employment to as many painters as possible. Second to select from what is thus made available work suitable to recommend to the Government for the decoration of public buildings."

Mr. Taylor also revealed that his committee had obtained from Washington a ruling to the effect that any framed picture could come under the official interpretation of a "mural." A mural is generally considered to be limited to a picture painted directly into the fresh plaster.

Under the new ruling, it will be possible to commission not only small paintings in oils, but etchings, lithographs and other such studies, suitable for distribution to public schools for exhibition and instruction in the various arts. Mr. Taylor believes the larger projects will be few in number, for lack of practice in work on a grand scale has prevented the development of many painters competent of such undertakings.

Denying the suggestion emanating from Washington news sources that Federal buildings are to be turned over freely to every painter who applies for work, Mr. Taylor stated that preliminary employment will take the established form of any competition, the drawing up of entry sketches. This work will be paid for on a salary basis. But the Government, through its committees, will reserve the right to commission or reject such entries.

$2,811,753 will be expended in materials with the cities and towns contributing $3,045,014, making a gross total of $5,856,767.

New projects which will provide work for 10,000 women throughout the State will be submitted to Chairman Bartlett today by Mrs. Lois B. Rantou, director of the women's division of the State board. This work was made possible through an additional $2,000,000 grant allotted to Massachusetts recently by the Federal authorities. The women will be employed in knitting, sewing, canning, cataloging and other projects. In making the additional grant, Federal authorities ruled that the women may be hired on the basis of need. That is, they need not be on the welfare relief, but can be taken from the re-employment service lists.

Chairman Bartlett today approved a number of new projects in Boston to provide work for 777 men at an expenditure of $180,598. Other projects calling for the employment of thousands of men were submitted to the board and given tentative approval, while many projects calling for the employment of women were also presented and held over for the Civil Works Service.

Status of Boston's statesmen of the past, which have not been given their usual bath for five or six years, are to be cleaned by nine men at a cost of $1400. This project received the tentative approval of the State board today.

Chairman Bartlett was informed that the city of Boston is struggling with the problem of getting proper foremen and supervisors from the two official sources from which the men are selected, the welfare lists and Federal registration.

Mayor Curley sought permission to seek such supervisors from other sources but Chairman Bartlett insisted that the mayor go over the matter with the particular authorities in each case and insist on competent help before seeking relief elsewhere. Mr. Bartlett admitted that there might be some difficulty in getting the trained men needed on many projects, but stated that he wants the general public to know that they are being treated fairly in the matter and that he wants the available lists scoured first.

Chairman Charles P. Howard of the commission on administration and finance today presented a large batch of new projects to Chairman Bartlett, many of which were tentatively approved.

Except in cases where communities are behind in their quotas, projects are being tentatively approved and Chairman Bartlett is hopeful that all be ready within the next day or two for final approval. The following new projects were approved today by the State board:

Peabody, ten men, $441, interior and exterior painting of fire station; Newburyport, 104 men, $15,534, graveling and ditch work; Lynn, 257 men, $50,223, road, playground and reservation work; Franklin, 135 men, $25,736, road and playground work; Northfield, twenty men, $2004, brush, graveling and drainage work; Winchester, fifteen men, $3713, painting and renovating three elementary schools; Avon, twenty men, $1420, drainage, cleaning and park work; Dighton, ten men, $4127, graveling and road work; Chicopee, eighty men, $11,949, laying drain pipe.

$1,652,251 for Bay State War Projects

Washington, Dec. 13. (A.P.)—Representative McCormack of Boston said today that he had been informed by Civil Works Administrator Hopkins that War Department projects in Massachusetts totaling $1,652,251 have been approved. The projects are expected to provide employment for 1941 unemployed men who will be hired through the State re-employment bureaus.

Mr. McCormack conferred with Hopkins this morning to urge immediate approval of the Massachusetts projects recommended to the Q. W. A. by the War Department and two hours later was told the entire list had been approved. He then was assured that work will be started immediately and that some men probably will be at work within a few days. The projects include:

For the Boston Quartermaster depot, $900,000.

For reconditioning of the First Corps Area headquarters, $25,000.

For the Watertown Arsenal, $370,042.

For number of projects at Fort Devens, $579,907.

For the Springfield Armory which Representative Granfield of Massachusetts had asked be started immediately, $61,546.

For improvement of property at Fort Banks, $15,720.

The projects approved today bring the total allocated for the South Boston Army base to $1,129,000.

100,000 Women Get C W A Jobs

Washington, Dec. 13 (A.P.)—The Civil Works Administration today reported approximately 100,000 women have been given jobs. With figures still lacking for a half-dozen States, the names of which were withheld, officials said 94,798 women were on the payrolls last Monday. The women's division of the C. W. A. estimated that over 400,000 women are in need of assistance.

WILL GIVE 1941 BAY STATE WORK

Army Base and Fort
Devens Improvements

Watertown and Springfield
Share in $1,642,151

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 (A. P.)—War Department projects which officials estimated would give employment to 1941 men and involving expenditure of $1,642,151 in Massachusetts were approved today by the Civil Works Administration.

Representative McCormack of Massachusetts was informed two hours after making a personal appeal for early approval of the projects that the entire supplementary program of the War Department in Massachusetts had been approved and would be started at once. The War Department, McCormack said, asserted some men would be at work within a few days.

The largest project called for expenditure of $900,000 for repair or replacement of the wharf piling and general reconditioning of the entire wharf and docking facilities at the Boston Quartermaster Depot in South Boston. This project, officials estimated, would provide work for 12 supervisors, 300 skilled workers, 150 semiskilled workers and 250 unskilled workers, with work to be started within 15 days.

Repairs at Watertown

Another allotment of $25,000 was approved for reconditioning and painting of the First Corps Area headquarters at Boston, with estimated employment for one supervisor, 10 skilled workers, two semiskilled workers and three unskilled workers, with work to be started in 10 days.

The Watertown Arsenal was allotted $70,042 for three projects.

Four buildings will be repaired at a cost of $21,920, with work for two supervisors, 20 skilled workers, six semiskilled workers and 14 unskilled men, to be started within 10 days. Work of painting seven buildings at a cost of $62,782 will be started within five days, with employment for two supervisors, 46 skilled workers, 10 semiskilled workers and 10 unskilled workers, while an additional $7260 will be spent on road repairs, with employment within 10 days for five supervisors, 70 skilled workers, 14 semiskilled workers and 40 laborers.

Nine Devens Projects

Nine projects at Fort Devens totaling $537,907, which Representative Rogers of Massachusetts had advocated in conferences with Civil Works Administrator Hopkins, also were approved. They were:

For clearing fire breaks, $38,760, with employment within five days for three supervisors, six skilled workers, six semiskilled workers and 70 laborers.

For clearing underbrush, $43,776, with employment within five days for three supervisors, six skilled workers, six semiskilled workers and 65 laborers.

For transplanting trees, $54,555, with employment in 10 days for four supervisors, 20 skilled workers, six semiskilled workers and 52 laborers.

For salvaging buildings, $22,455, with work within 10 days for one supervisor, five skilled workers, six semiskilled workers and 66 laborers.

For cleaning filter beds, $43,776, with work within 10 days for eight supervisors, 15 skilled workers, 16 semiskilled workers and 170 laborers.

For drainage, $8120, with work within 10 days for two supervisors, four skilled workers, 74 semiskilled workers and 30 laborers.

For painting, $15,000, with work for two supervisors, 30 skilled workers, eight semiskilled workers and eight laborers.

For grading of the landing field, $232,580, with employment within 10 days for 41 supervisors, 122 skilled workers, 93 semiskilled workers and 340 laborers.

In all more than 1000 men will be employed at Fort Devens.

At Springfield Arsenal

The Springfield Arsenal was allotted $61,546 for four projects designed to provide work for 119 men. They were:

Road repairs, $36,576, with employment within 10 days for two supervisors, 10 skilled workers, eight semiskilled workers and 40 laborers.

Regrading and removing debris, $3900, within 15 days, for one supervisor, one skilled worker, one semiskilled worker and 20 laborers.

Painting, including the armory fence, $9204, with work within 10 days for one supervisor, one skilled worker, two semiskilled workers and two laborers.

Repairs to buildings, $11,866, with employment within 10 days for one supervisor, 10 skilled workers, five semiskilled workers and five laborers.

Fort Banks and harbor posts at Boston were awarded $15,720 for improvements which within 10 days should give work to one supervisor, 10 skilled workers, 10 semiskilled workers and 10 laborers.

All the men to be employed will be hired by the State Employment Bureaus.

Allotments Under Other Acts

Changing over from its role as State Civil Works Board to State Emergency Finance Board, the members last night in special session approved loans as follows:

West Springfield, $110,000 under Public Works act; Charlton, two loans, $1280 under the Tax Title act, $3400 under the Welfare act; Salem, $59,000 under the Tax Title act; Somerville, $45,000 under the Public Welfare act.

Representative Martin Hays of Brighton asked the board if under the public works program a project for a subway station at Audubon circle might receive consideration. Chairman Bartlett said that even if it were to receive approval of the Mayor the board would refuse it. Hays said later he would introduce a bill in the Legislature next month. He said he does not expect to get the work done under public works, but that depreciation of real estate in that section due to lack of proper subway facilities necessitates the project.

BAY STATE CWA NEARING QUOTA

Withholds Approval of Further Projects Until Check Is Made

The Massachusetts civil works administration, which set a national record for speed in approving civil works projects, was forced last night to withhold approval of additional projects when it appeared that the board was in danger of exceeding the state's quota of 121,750 jobs.

Because 10,000 women must be given work in this state on civil work and civil works service projects and no definite figures could be obtained on the number of women employed, and to be employed, the board last night sent telegrams to local CWA administrators asking for that information.

CENSUS OF JOBLESS

A census of the unemployed of the state will be conducted by the state department of labor and industries, and 3083 persons, mostly women, will be given work. The requisition for workers included 2830 enumerators, 211 stenographer-clerks, 10 inspectors, 14 district supervisors, four senior stenographers, a directing supervisor and an assistant supervisor, a chief statistician and three assistant statisticians. The census will cost $175,000 and about 2700 women will be employed.

Mayor Curley appeared with department heads before Chairman Bartlett yesterday morning with projects for several thousand men and women. The chairman approved projects providing work for 717 at an expenditure of $180,588, but requested that a large number of projects be re-phrased to include them within the scope of the CWA program.

The word that the board was nearing its goal spread among the officials of committees who waited outside the various board rooms in which projects were being approved. All the officials made efforts to "get in under the wire." New Bedford was successful and had projects approved to employ 136 men constructing surface and catch basin drains on the Plainville road, at a cost of $20,601, and another to hire 103 men to enlarge and improve bathing and skating facilities at Brooklawn park and fill in swamp area at an expenditure of $17,124.

SEVERAL LOSE OUT

Several other groups lost out, however, including the Berkshire county commissioners, who were told to submit projects in detail and "take a chance." The chairman rejected a proposal of the Lowell Real Estate Exchange representatives to re-assess the city.

Representative Martin Hays of Brighton suggested that a subway station be constructed at Arundel street, Back Bay, because lack of transportation in that vicinity has endangered the value of property worth $3,500,000. Chairman Bartlett said he would not approve such a project under the civil works programs. Hays indicated he will present a bill to the coming Legislature urging the station, which would cost $300,000.

Chairman Bartlett was asked to seek additional CWA money in Washington by Rep. C. F. Nelson Pratt of Saugus, who pointed out that the President will not withhold funds when he realizes the number of men going to work. Rep. Pratt complimented the chairman and his colleagues on the board. State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley and William B. Coy, on the excellent work being done.

While Bartlett was unable to give full approval to projects calling for employment of thousands of workers, as presented by the mayor, he did give "tentative approval" and asked that the projects be re-phrased and revamped. One of these was a project, on which nine men are to be employed, to clean streets in Boston, this list to be submitted today.

FOREMEN NEEDED

Boston is struggling with the problem of getting proper foremen and supervisors, the mayor told Bartlett. Curley inquired whether he could obtain such men from sources other than welfare department or the federal re-employment service and Bartlett ruled the mayor would have to talk over his problem with the re-employment people before seeking relief elsewhere. The general public must know it is being treated fairly before special lists are made up, the chairman emphasized.

Bartlett told the mayor that a complaint had been received from headquarters in Washington that 58 painters assigned to work in the City hospital had not been put to work because of lack of materials. Obviously surprised, the mayor admitted that perhaps a "slip had occurred" and promised to remedy conditions immediately.

The cleaning of private alleys to eliminate a health menace was declared a sound project by Bartlett, but he told the mayor and Dr. Francis X. Mahoney the city health commissioner, that Washington had withheld approval as yet. Among the projects passed for the city were repairs to voting booths, painting and repairing Eastern avenue docks resetting curbing on Commonwealth avenue to Newton line.

Cleaning the "wilderness acreage" a Franklin park, further development of the city's golf course in Hyde Park adding to force of stonecutters in public works department, repairs to Chelsea and Meridian street bridges, survey of streets were passed.

Projects held up were repairs and maintenance work in transit department, doubling force in assessing department working on block survey, miscellaneous work in Mattapan sanitation and West Roxbury Hospital, erection of fence and grading at Rainsford Island development and excavation work at Fairview Cemetery, Hyde Park, enlarging seaplane ramp at East Boston airport, additional force of surface grading of streets, repairs to building owned by city under White Fund.

The state emergency finance board—three members of which form the civil works administration—yesterday held a special session and approved the following loans: $110,000 by West Springfield under the public works act; two loans to Charlton, one for $1230 under the tax title law, and the other $3400 under the welfare act; and $45,000 to Somerville under the public works act.

Members of Painters Union, No. 11, of Boston, yesterday passed a resolution condemning the procedure followed by the civil works administration in giving out jobs, and also criticized severely the "surrender of the CWA to ward politicians who are attempting to use this relief measure to further their own ambitions."

Veterans preference was protested by the union members, who assailed the policy of giving half the jobs created to welfare recipients in their resolution. Copies of the resolution were sent to Chairman Bartlett and members of the cabinet at Washington and Col. Harry L. Hopkins, federal CWA administrator.

1830 MEN AT WORK ON LYNN PROJECTS

C. W. A. Plans Speeded Under Latest Survey

Special Dispatch to the Globe

LYNN, Dec. 13.—Survey of the Civil Works Administration in Lynn today revealed that 1830 men were on the payrolls of 31 projects already under way. These men by Feb. 15 will have collected $398,132.80 in wages while the city will spend $190,175.77 for equipment and materials to keep them engaged.

In addition, approval for the employment of about 200 more men, who will receive $49,204 on four projects, will probably be given soon.

These will require a city expenditure of $10,000 for material. Start of these projects will guarantee for Lynn workers, $448,500 of the C. W. A. Federal appropriation, or approximately $119,000 more than the original allotment for this city.

The C. W. A. at Boston also has for consideration one project here that would employ about 180 women in repairing clothing and sewing for public welfare. There are also several minor projects that will employ about 50 more men and women.

The projects accepted today by the Federal authorities will employ 75 more men at Pine Grove Cemetery in building a six-foot masonry wall between the cemetery and Hudson st.; 47 men in Lynn Woods building benches and gateways, and 104 men grading around the ponds in Lynn Woods.

Over 4 Million Now Employed on Civil Works

CWA Announces Goal Reached — 1,500,000 Families Still on Relief

Washington, Dec. 15 (A.P.)—The Civil Works Administration said today that more than 4,000,000 are now on its payroll. This was the goal set by President Roosevelt, in authorizing use of upwards of $400,000,000 for direct employment of persons previously on relief rolls. It is expected that Congress will be asked to provide more funds to carry the CWA into the spring months.

Harry L. Hopkins, civil works administrator, told reporters his information showed that the full quota of employment planned for Dec. 16 has been completed. He could not, however, give any definite figures and contented himself with the statement that over 4,000,000 are employed. He paid tribute to State and local civil works administrations and volunteer workers who have devoted their time to the situation for the past month.

Some of the States have not filled their CWA quota but others have exceeded the number they were supposed to employ. Adjustments will be made to level out the situation. Hopkins estimated there still are 1,500,000 families on relief rolls and said the exact number probably will not be known for another thirty days.

30-Hour Week for White Collar Men

Hopkins today made public rules covering the employment of clerical workers. This carries the stipulation that the so-called white-collar workers may be employed up to thirty-nine hours per week at prevailing rates in the individual communities, but not less than the following rates per week:

	Base	Intermediate	Superior	Technical
Southern zone...	$12	$15	$18	$18-$20
Central zone...	13	16	19	21-24
Northern zone...	18	21	24	24-45

The rates for semi-skilled labor depend upon local custom and are to be set between the wage rate for skilled and unskilled labor unless otherwise provided for by agreements approved by the Public Works administrations within or through the State.

Efforts to find work for women which will not interfere with jobs for men under the CWA was urged upon President Roosevelt today by Representative Edith N. Rogers (R., Mass.). She said Mr. Roosevelt expressed the hope of greater possibilities in this direction.

Boston Is Given Little in State List of Projects

Item of $164,000 in Today's Grant for Hospital — State Total Is $2,600,000

Massachusetts projects under the Public Works Administration which received the approval of Washington today, according to the Associated Press, total $2,600,000. In the list is a single project to be undertaken in Boston, that of a small building at the State Hospital. With the loans and grants approved hundreds of men can be put to work within a few months.

Mayor Curley's friends may be disappointed in seeing the least list of State projects in that none of the mayor's local program appears. The mayor has been in Washington since yesterday morning. The projects were approved by private corporations were allotted loans only.

The allotments included: In Massachusetts: Brookline, loan and grant, sewers, $16,000; Brookline, loan and grant, street improvement, $35,000; Quincy, loan and grant, sewers, $159,000; New Bedford, loan and grant, water, $500,000; New Bedford, loan and grant, sewers, $339,000; Quincy, loan and grant, school addition, $500,000; Massachusetts, loan and grant, highway improvements, $35,000.

Winchendon, loan and grant, highway improvements, $13,000; Boston, loan and grant, hospital, $164,000; Revere, loan and grant, highway improvement, $229,000; Waverly, loan and grant, $42,000; Massachusetts, loan and grant, highway improvements, $25,000; New Bedford, loan and grant, street improvements, $428,000; Massachusetts, loan and grant, street improvements, $120,000. In Connecticut: Wallingford, grant, sewage, $10,000.

State Improvements

Massachusetts received seven loans and grants. One for $25,000 was for resurfacing State highway route No. 13 from Monterey-Otis town line easterly to the junction with the State route No. 8. Work can start at once and PWA estimated forty-two men would be employed two months.

The second of $120,000 was for resurfacing with bituminous macadam 4.3 miles of State highway No. 33 from the Ware-Palmer town line to the junction with Thorndike street at Palmer. Work can start in two months and PWA said sixty-five men could be employed five months.

The third was $164,000 for construction of a two-story and part basement fireproof hospital and the purchase of certain equipment for the Boston State Hospital. Work can start in one month and PWA estimated fifty-one men would be employed five months.

The fourth was of $13,000 for widening and surfacing with bituminous macadam State highway number 331 in Winchendon. Work can start in three weeks and PWA estimated thirty-five men would be employed forty-five days.

The fifth was for $229,000 for reconstruction, resurfacing and widening 2.1 miles of State highway route 1-A in the city of Revere. Work can start in one month and PWA estimated 170 men would be employed five months.

The sixth was for $42,000 for construction of a sanitary sewer to serve the Walter E. Fernald State School at Waverly. Work can start in one month and PWA estimated forty men would be employed five months.

The seventh of $35,000 was for widening the State highway No. 126 between the towns of Ashland and Holliston. Work can start in two weeks and PWA estimated thirty-two men would be employed three months.

New Bedford's Loans

New Bedford, Mass., received three loans and grants. One of $500,000 was for replacement of approximately four miles of existing 36-inch cast iron pipe water mains with 48-inch cast iron. Work can start in two weeks and PWA estimated 85 men would be employed 15 months. The second of the same sum was for construction of a three-story and basement 46 classroom and cafeteria fireproof addition to the high school building. Work can start in one month and PWA estimated 120 men would be employed a year. The third was for $428,000 for surfacing with bituminous macadam and installation of curb and drainage facilities of parts of Acushnet avenue, Purchase street and Ashley boulevard. Work can begin immediately and PWA estimated 180 men would be employed a year.

Quincy and Brookline

Quincy, Mass., received two loans and grants, one of $339,000 for extension of its sanitary sewer system in Squantum, Adams Shore and Hough's Neck district. Work on this project can start in a week and PWA estimated 300 men would be employed eight months. The other was for $159,000 for improvement of storm water sewers by diversions and extensions of brook drains within the city. Work can start immediately and PWA estimated 150 men could be employed eight months.

Brookline, Mass., received two loans and grants, one of $33,000 for relocation of water mains including enlargement of the main along the widened Boylston street. Work on this project can begin in three weeks and PWA estimated fifteen men could be employed ten months. The other of $16,000 was for relocation of sanitary sewers on Boylston street preliminary to widening and repaving the thoroughfare. Work can start in one month and PWA estimated twenty men could be employed four months.

ALLOTMENTS FOR BAY STATE

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15 (UP)—The public works administration today allotted $22,000,300 for 72 projects in 26 states.

It is expected the projects will create 91,222 man months of direct employment and at least twice as much indirect and industrial employment. The allotments bring the total for non-federal work to more than $600,000,000.

Massachusetts projects are: Quincy, loan and grant, sewers, $129,000; New Bedford loan and grant, water main, $500,000; Quincy, loan and grant, sewer, $339,000; Brookline, loan and grant, sewer, $16,000; Brookline, loan and grant, street improvements, $35,000; New Bedford, loan and grant, school additions, $500,000; Commonwealth of Massachusetts, loan and grant, highway improvements, $35,000; Winchendon, loan and grant, highway improvements, $13,000; Revere, loan and grant, highway improvements, $229,000; Waverly, loan and grant, sewer, $42,000; Commonwealth of Massachusetts, loan and grant, highway improvements, $25,000; New Bedford, loan and grant, street improvements, $428,000; Commonwealth of Massachusetts, loan and grant, street improvements, $120,000.

4,000,000 HAVE C. W. A. JOBS

Quota Set by Roosevelt
Now Reached

WASHINGTON, Dec 15 (A. P.)—The Civil Works Administration said today that more than 4,000,000 persons are now on its payroll.

This was the goal set by President Roosevelt, in authorizing use of upwards of $400,000,000 for direct employment of persons theretofore on relief rolls. It is expected that Congress will be asked to provide more funds for this purpose to carry the C. W. A. into the Spring.

Harry L. Hopkins, Civil Works Administrator, told reporters his information showed that the full quota of employment planned for Dec 16 has been completed. He could not, however, give any definite figures and contented himself with the statement that 4,000,000 are employed.

He paid tribute to State and local Civil Works Administrations and volunteer workers who have devoted their time to the situation for the past month.

Some of the States have not filed their C. W. A. quota but others have exceeded the number they were supposed to employ. Adjustments will be made to level out the situation.

Hopkins estimated there still are 1,500,000 families on relief rolls and said the exact number probably will not be known for another 30 days.

Hopkins made public rules of the Civil Works Administration covering the employment of clerical workers. This carries the stipulation that the so-called white-collar workers may be employed up to 39 hours per week at prevailing rates in the individual communities but not less than the following rates per week:

	Open	Super-	Super-

zone	zone	zone	zone
Southern zone	$12	$15	$18
Central zone	$15	$18	$21
Northern zone	$18	$21	$24

The rates for semiskilled labor, the new rules say, depend upon local custom and will be set between the wage rate for skilled and unskilled labor in accordance with local prevailing rates, unless otherwise provided by agreements approved by the Public Works Administrations within or through the State.

State Board Gets Right to Add 2500 Women

Is 8000 Above C. W. A. Quota,
Bartlett Calls for Increase

With a final successful effort to secure additional work for Massachusetts unemployed, the State Civil Works Board last night obtained approval from Washington for putting 8000 men to work above the State's quota, and also authority to give jobs to 2500 more women.

In the day's work, Chairman Bartlett and his associates approved 4000 of the 9500 jobs for women she had submitted. The board found some projects had not been sanctioned by local authorities and others were not in proper shape for endorsement.

Mrs. Rantoul, Federal Relief Administrator for Women, told Chairman Bartlett and the board that she had been instructed to prepare the projects for women, but the two positions overlapped, the money for the women's work coming from the Federal emergency relief funds unless it is connected with construction work. But the board worked to straighten out the matter.

A delegation of Quincy women complained to State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, a member of the board, yesterday, about administration of the women's division of the C.W.A., charging unfairness in appointment of community chairmen.

Hurley said the board has made every possible effort to cooperate and meet all requests for aid in attempting to gain work for the women of the State. He said the controversy was due to Mrs. Rantoul's action.

Mrs. Rantoul said: "I appointed chairmen for women in various communities, and planned the projects. I was then taken ill for a week. Finally the board asked me to present my projects and I submitted them. I do not think the board gave me sufficient information as to how I should have proceeded. I was working and groping in the dark."

Mr. Hurley last night praised the work of Mr. Bartlett.

William B. Coy, member of the board in charge of finances, was informed yesterday that Moses M. Gaskell, town treasurer of Mendon and disbursing officer for the C. W. A., had declined to make payments to the C. W. A. workers. Gaskell had submitted a project to the board asking that he be paid $20 per week to make out these checks, but it was turned down, as all disbursing officers work without compensation.

Coy said that all Gaskell had to do was to issue 25 checks weekly, and he asked the Selectmen of the town to appoint a new disbursing officer.

Bartlett Asks Hopkins to

AT LEAST 10,000
WOMEN GET WORK

Racing against the clock, the Massachusetts civil works administration and its deputy boards were feverishly checking scores of women projects submitted at a late hour last night by Mrs. Lols B. Rantoul, in charge of CWA women's activities, in an effort to assure jobs for thousands of Massachusetts women.

A special session of the Governor's council will be called for today by Gov. Ely so that $100,000 can be made available to women working on civil works service projects. The women are engaged on projects not connected with construction and will be paid from special funds allocated to the state by the federal government.

Under the law, however, the funds must be paid out only after the Governor and his executive council have approved payment. Through an error the council failed to vote approval at its Wednesday meeting. Because of the emergency, it was considered advisable to call a special meeting of the council so that the women could receive money for their services.

A political row which has stirred the townspeople of Leicester threatened to halt the civil works board early this morning while Chairman Bartlett and his associates were engaged in approving women's projects. On complaint of a number of citizens of Leicester an investigator, Thomas F. Coady of the complaint division of the CWA, was sent to the town.

He reported early this morning that Chairman Titcomb of the Leicester board of assessors—a man without dependents and reputed to be worth thousands of dollars—had been given a

Projects Approved

The following projects were approved today by the state civil works board.

EASTON, $1697, 11 jobs, addition to cemetery on Poundry street; $2201, 15 men, gravel and elimination of curve.
BROCKTON $16,148, 95 jobs, shade trees.
MILFORD, $25,213, 190 jobs, shade trees.
Swamp park improvements.
QUINCY, $1781, 67 men, additional labor on projects already approved; $13,870, 49 men, sewer construction.

MILBURY, $4000, miscellaneous projects, 43 men; $2689, 20 men, streets.
LYNN, $2000, 38 men, grading.
WILLIAMSBURG, $1070, 10 men, graveling; $1620, 10 men, cleaning underbrush; $1350, second men, painting outside school.

NORFOLK COUNTY, $2367, 31 men, building house.
QUINCY, $6143, 37 men, painting and alterations to schools.
NORFOLK COUNTY, $9098, 50 men, painting inside schools.

AUBURN, $23,900, 98 men, building and grading athletic field.
AYER, $7004, 20 men, brush, grading.
OAK BLUFFS, $1150, 10 men, parks.

Gov. Ely yesterday approved a list of projects submitted by the state emergency public works commission as follows:

1—Widening the state highway on U. S. route 20 from its intersection with route 131 in Sturbridge to Brimfield village—$220,000.
2—Reconstruction of the state highway in Charlestown on route 2 from the bridge west of Charlestown to Scott's bridge, both being over the Deerfield river—$115,000.

3—Resurfacing and widening the state highway on U. S. route 5 from point 1000 feet north of the railroad bridge in Northampton to a point south of the railroad underpass in Haverhill—$180,000.
4—Reconstruction, resurfacing and widening of the state highway on route 12 from the north-west side of Sterling to the city's cement road in Leominster—$200,000.

5—Construction of a steel plate girder bridge and approach on route 1-A in Revere to span the Boston, Revere Beach & Lynn Railroad and the Revere Beach parkway—$321,000.

6—Widening and resurfacing the state highway on route 121 from the easterly side of Essex to a point 3700 feet west of the junction of route 121 and 127 in Gloucester—$182,000.

7—Resurfacing and widening the state highway on the route from Wrentham to Blanford Village, a distance of 5.51 miles—$113,000.

8—Repairs and alterations to the Commonwealth depot and motor park at Natick—$66,897.

9—Construction, equipment and furnishing of a junior inmates dormitory at the women's reformatory at Framingham—$57,874.

10—Resurfacing and widening the state highway on route 113 from the end of Pawtucket boulevard in Lowell to the approach of the Tenssboro bridge over the Merrimack river—$101,500.

11—Resurfacing a highway from route 20 at Carlton City to route 9 at East Brookfield—$31,200.

These projects must now be approved by the federal authorities.

who has not effected a settlement in a city or town must be given welfare relief by the community, which is reimbursed by the state.

The federal government, however, has agreed to send millions of dollars into this state and Chairman Charles P. Howard of the state commission on administration and finance felt that the cities and towns should drop their welfare claims. Gov. Ely placed the proposal before Chairman Bartlett and Theodore M. Waddell, director of the division of accounts in the state department of taxation.

After the conference, the Governor said:

"I decided we should make the payment as usual, although the federal government has reimbursed to the extent it has. We planned to hand over about $1,000,000 and had made provision for it when we made up the state budget. The cities and towns anticipate it."

Thus, by this decision, Massachusetts cities and towns will have an additional $1,000,000—and perhaps more—to aid the unemployed. The Governor announced that he had received a check for $1,500,000 from the federal government as part of the third quarterly installment to be disbursed to cities and towns for anticipated revenue.

ANTICIPATED REVENUE

"The first and second installments of this money were put into anticipated revenue. This money is more or less free money so far as the budgets of cities and towns are concerned. The federal government, as you know, agreed to allocate $1 for every $3 spent by a city or town for welfare relief, but the money must be spent under the direction of the federal government."

"The money could be spent by the state, in part, to cover our own welfare expenses. There will be another $1,500,000 coming to Massachusetts in two payments of $750,000 each."

Of the $3,000,000 allotted to Massachusetts under the so-called welfare reimbursement bill presented by Senator Costigan, the state received $1,500,000 in payment of the third quarterly installment. Chairman Bartlett will confer with Washington officials regarding his plans for spending this money.

For hours yesterday the civil works board was nervous as Mrs. Rantoul failed to submit her projects. Mrs. Rantoul was appointed by Washington of-cial and has created an organization of her own which in many respects has conflicted with that established by the civil works board. To prevent an open break Chairman Bartlett has courteously awaited Mrs. Rantoul's projects.

Quota Set by Roosevelt
Now Reached

WASHINGTON, Dec 15 (A. P.)—The Civil Works Administration said today that more than 4,000,000 persons are now on its payroll.

This was the goal set by President Roosevelt, in authorizing use of upwards of $400,000,000 for direct employment of persons theretofore on relief rolls. It is expected that Congress will be asked to provide more funds for this purpose to carry the C. W. A. into the Spring.

Harry L. Hopkins, Civil Works Administrator, told reporters his information showed that the full quota of employment planned for Dec 16 has been completed. He could not, however, give any definite figures and contented himself with the statement that 4,000,000 are employed.

job on a CWA project in preference to the veterans, and over married men with dependents.

The board was unofficially informed that Chairman Lyon of the public welfare department who is the civil works administrator for the town had assigned Titcomb at the request of certain Republican members of the board of selectmen. This report will be given formally to the board today and prompt action will be taken. In other instances where political favoritism has been charged the civil works administration had vigorously pointed out that politics must not enter into the CWA program at any stage.

Only yesterday afternoon Chairman Bartlett telegraphed all local civil works administrators that no discrimination be shown veterans, disabled or not. The chairman also informed the local leaders that henceforth all requisitions for workers must be made to the federal re-employment officers in cities and towns. Originally requisitions for workers were to be sent to the welfare department until Dec. 1, and from the re-employment office until Dec. 15, but the chairman changed the ruling to include an even division until Dec. 15.

Early this morning Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the civil works board, announced that at least 10,000 women would be given work in sewing, knitting, cleaning, canning and similar projects, thus bringing Massachusetts over its original limit of 121,750 by several thousand.

Convinced that the desperate need of Massachusetts citizens, men and women, for employment entitled the state to a larger quota, Chairman Bartlett yesterday telephoned Col. Harry L. Hopkins, federal civil works administrator and asked that the commonwealth be allotted 145,000 jobs. Col. Hopkins had not replied at midnight, but there was a feeling among the board members that he would accede to Bartlett's request.

Eager to give Boston as many jobs as possible, Chairman Bartlett yesterday broke several appointments to allow Charles J. Fox, budget commissioner, an opportunity to present several projects. As a result, 13 projects were approved to provide employment for 2129 men at a cost of $684,408.65.

GIVES WORK TO 1305 IN STATE

P. W. A. Allots More Than $2,500,000 Here

New Bedford Gets $1,428,000, Quincy $498,000

By CHARLES S. GROVES

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15—More than $2,500,000 is contained for the State and municipalities of Massachusetts in the Public Works Administration allotments announced tonight.

There are seven separate projects in which the Commonwealth figures in loans and grants for a total of $628,000. The city of New Bedford gets $1,428,000 and the city of Quincy $498,000. Smaller allotments go to Brookline. The projects are estimated to give employment to 1305 men.

Today's total P. W. A. allotments is $22,000,300 for 72 projects, the larger of which are $7,000,000 to Louisiana for combined railway and highway construction across the Mississippi river, near Baton Rouge, and $4,000,000 to New York city for a tubercular unit for Bellevue Hospital. There is also included a loan and grant of $3,570,000 to the university system of Georgia for new buildings, etc. at various colleges in that State.

Boston Hospital Addition

The detailed projects in the State of Massachusetts are as follows:

Revere—Loan and grant for $229,000 to the Commonwealth for the reconstruction, resurfacing and widening of 2.1 miles of State highway, route 1-A. The approximate cost of labor and material is $168,000, of which 30 percent is a grant. The balance is a loan secured by 4 percent general obligation bonds. Work can start in one month and be completed in five months, giving 170 men employment during construction.

Boston—Loan and grant for $164,000 to the Commonwealth for construction of a two-story and part basement fireproof hospital, including certain equipment, at the Boston State Hospital. Thirty percent of the cost of labor and material, which totals approximately $128,000, is a grant. The balance is a loan secured by 4 percent general obligation bonds. Work can begin at once and be completed in nine months, giving 51 men employment during construction.

Waverly—Loan and grant for $42,000 to the Commonwealth for the construction of a sanitary sewer to serve the Walter E. Fernald State School, Waverly. Work can start in one month and be completed in five months, giving 40 men employment during construction.

State Road Resurfacing

Winchendon—Loan and grant for $12,000 to the Commonwealth for widening and bituminous macadam surfacing of State highway No. 32, in Winchendon. Thirty percent of the cost of labor and material, which totals approximately $10,000, is a grant. The balance is a loan secured by 4 percent general obligation bonds. Work can start in three weeks and be completed in 1½ months, giving 35 men employment during construction.

Massachusetts—Loan and grant for $120,000 to the Commonwealth for bituminous macadam resurfacing of approximately 4.3 miles of State highway No. 32, from the Ware-Palmer town line to the junction with Thorndike st. at Palmer. The approximate cost of labor and material is $97,400, of which 30 percent is a grant. The balance is a loan secured by 4 percent general obligation bonds. Work can start in two months and be completed in five months, giving 65 men employment during construction.

Also loan and grant for $25,000 to the Commonwealth for resurfacing of State highway route No. 13, from Montevideo town line easterly to the junction with State route No. 8. The approximate cost of labor and material is $20,000, of which 30 percent is a grant. The balance is a loan secured by 4 percent general obligation bonds. Work can start at once and be completed in two months, giving 42 men employment during construction.

Also loan and grant of $35,000 to the Commonwealth for widening of existing bituminous macadam State highway No. 126, between the towns of Ashland and Holliston. Thirty percent of the cost of labor and material, which totals approximately $28,000, is a grant. The balance is a loan secured by 4 percent general obligation bonds. Work can start in two weeks and be completed in three months, giving 32 men employment during construction.

Large New Bedford Works

New Bedford—$500,000 to the city of New Bedford for the construction of a three-story and basement 46 classroom and cafeteria fireproof addition to existing high school building. Thirty percent of the cost of labor and material, which totals approximately $400,200, is a grant. The balance is a loan secured by 4 percent general obligation bonds. Work can start in one month and be completed in 12 months, giving 120 men employment during construction.

New Bedford for bituminous macadam surfacing including certain necessary curb and drainage construction of parts of Acushnet av. Purchase st and Ashley boulevard. The approximate cost of labor and material is $398,000, of which 30 percent is a grant. The balance is a loan secured by 4 percent general obligation bonds. Work can begin at once and be completed in 12 months, giving 180 men employment during construction.

Also loan and grant for $500,000 to New Bedford for the replacement of approximately four miles of existing 36-inch castiron pipe water main with 48-inch castiron pipe. Thirty percent of the cost of labor and material, which totals approximately $401,000, is a grant. The balance is a loan secured by 4 percent general obligation bonds. Work can start in two weeks and be completed in 15 months, giving 85 men employment during construction.

Work can start in one month and be completed in four months, giving 20 men employment during construction.

Also loan and grant for $33,000 to Brookline for the relocation of water mains, including enlargement of same along the widened Boylston st. Thirty percent of the cost of labor and material, which totals approximately $26,000, is a grant. The balance is a loan secured by 4 percent obligation bonds. Work can start in three weeks and be completed in 10 months, giving 15 men employment during construction.

STATE WORKS QUOTA JUMPS

8000 More Jobs Approved Decision Monday on 14,500 Others

A decision on the granting of 14,500 new jobs, in addition to the state quota of 131,500 jobs on civil work projects, is due Monday from Col. Harry L. Hopkins, federal CWA administrator.

Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts civil works administration, announced the proposed increase in the state's quota of jobs after a telephone conference with Col. Hopkins.

Chairman Bartlett has already approved 8000 jobs over the state's quota. Provision also is to be made for employment of 2500 women at 40 cents an hour.

Women who have worked on projects technically known as civil works have been paid from federal emergency relief funds will not be paid today. It was announced. About $100,000 is due them but because the Governor's council through an error, failed to approve payment, the money will be disbursed Monday.

Federal law prevents disbursement without a vote of approval by the council.

The last day of the approving period for civil works projects was as hectic as any, as charges and counter charges were bandied back and forth between Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, in charge of CWA women's activities, and State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, who defended the board of which he is a member.

As the day closed there was doubt as to the validity of the appointment of Mrs. Rantoul to the position of state director of women's activities for the federal emergency relief administration, and the same position for the civil works administration.

Word has been received from Washington that so-called white collar workers in this section will be paid an average of $18 a week, and technical workers up to $45 a week. Last night Chairman Bartlett said he had not been informed of the ruling. He thought, at the wage schedule applied to public works projects but added that the pay rate for civil works projects would average $18 a week.

The schedule as announced for the north zone is: Base rate $18, intermediate group $21, supervisory $24, and technical supervisory $45 a week.

State Treasurer Hurley issued a statement last night calling attention to the splendid showing of the state and said the major share of the credit should be given Chairman Bartlett. The treasurer emphasized that the board had always shown interest in women's projects, and that the members, Bartlett, Hurley and William B. Coy, a Boston banker, were unpaid.

URGED TO GET TO WORK

While Hopkins has agreed to consider Bartlett's request for 14,500 more jobs, the board members felt strongly last night that local officials should waste no time in getting men to work as new regulations from the national capital may mean the rescinding of approvals already given. It was considered doubtful that Washington would halt men at work.

Originally the Massachusetts quota for CWA jobs was 97,000 jobs. So swiftly did the Bartlett board organize and begin to approve projects that delighted Washington officials, pointing to Massachusetts as one state which realized the spirit of the CWA program, granted more jobs, bringing the total to 121,750.

Chairman Bartlett agreed that 10,000 women should be included in the quota. Although the quota was filled, they continue to examine projects and give tentative approvals. Yesterday he asked Hopkins to give the state 145,000 jobs in all.

At the same time he related the plight of Massachusetts women and said thousands more could be put to work. Hopkins, much pleased with the Bartlett board, allowed an additional 2,500 women for civil works service projects and agreed to let the state have the 129,000 others already approved, thus bringing additional hundreds of thousands of dollars into the state.

The board will begin the work of selecting from the projects submitted by Mrs. Rantoul a sufficient number to exhaust the 2500 figure. The women will be engaged in sewing clothes for the needy, knitting, rebinding library books and cleaning public buildings.

HURLEY STATEMENT

At the close of the meeting, State Treasurer Hurley said:

"The Commonwealth and its citizens should be congratulated that this board has Mr. Bartlett as chairman. He has given unstintingly of his time and services for the success of the CWA program. The figures prove beyond question that Mr. Bartlett's leadership has brought our program to a successful conclusion, borne out further by the fact that he has obtained an extra allotment of women, making a total of 13,100 women. This shows Mr. Bartlett has not neglected the problem of providing jobs for women and that he has extended every courtesy to them."

William B. Coy, third member of the board, summarily removed Moses Gaskill, civil works administrator for the town of Mendon, when Gaskill refused to sign 20 CWA checks for workers unemployed. Coy suggested that the selectmen choose another administrator. Coy also said that any man not willing to assist in the patriotic movement should be dropped from his position. Gaskill is chairman of the public welfare department of the town. The members of the state CWA board have been working night and day without pay since Nov. 17, Coy said, and local officials are expected to co-operate.

SOME TIME BREWING

The squabble between Mrs. Rantoul and the members of the civil works board has been brewing for some time. Mrs. Rantoul organized women throughout the state to devise civil works projects for women. She named women as administrators for women projects, the theory being that women would be better to conceive projects calling for the employment of women.

Skilled in organizing, and acquainted with many prominent women throughout the state, Mrs. Rantoul in a comparatively short time had an organization of her own at work. Spurred by patriotism, many Massachusetts women devoted hours to devising projects, enrolling unemployed women, investigating the needs of women.

Then an order came through from Washington that women employed on so-called civil works projects for women could not be paid from the $400,000,000 civil works fund, but had to be paid from a special fund set aside from the welfare money given for reimbursement by the federal government to cities and towns on the basis of $1 for every $3 expended for welfare. Chairman Bartlett managed to obtain $3,000,000 from the federal government to pay women on women's projects, and the projects were named civil works service projects. At that point Massachusetts was allocated 10,000 women out of the quota of all jobs assigned to the state.

AGREED ON 10,000 TO BE HIRED

Chairman Bartlett made an agreement with Mrs. Rantoul that 10,000 women would be hired, but that women already engaged and those in approved projects and about to go to work would have to be included in the figure, as would the 2500 women to be employed in a state unemployment census under the direction of the department of labor and industries. This brought the number of available unfilled women's jobs down, but the chairman promised that approximately 4000 women could be taken care of in projects approved by Mrs. Rantoul.

WORKERS CHARGE CWA VIOLATIONS

Complaints Aired at Building Trades Council

Vigorous complaints against the CWA were made by the more than 250 delegates to the special convention of the Massachusetts State Building Trades' Council which met yesterday at the American House.

Alleged violations of the CWA and PWA included failure to pay the fixed minimum wage rates, employment of incompetent mechanics, the use of political pull for work that ordinarily would be done by union labor, hostility of a number of assistant administrators to organized labor, and pleas of a lack of authority on the part of administrators to interpret parts of the measures or enforce mandates in relation to fixed wages.

A committee of three was named to take up the complaints with the administrators of these acts at Washington and with President Roosevelt, if remedies cannot be had from the local and state administrative boards. Named on the committee were E. A. Johnson, president of the state council; James B. McMan, secretary, and Robert J. Watts, secretary-treasurer of the Massachusetts State Federation of Labor. The committee will meet today to arrange its program.

In some localities, delegates declared, foremen supervisors had been engaged on CWA projects at a wage rate of $1.50 or more an hour, although skilled mechanics were paid $1.20, the minimum set by the act. Grafting on a small scale was reported in a few cities and towns.

Delegates from Lynn, Newton and Pittsfield read communications, purporting to be copies of letters from Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the state CWA board, approving wages of from 80 cents to $1 per hour for semi-skilled labor.

Medfield was named as one place where the state was violating the wage of the CWA for skilled work by paying as low as 85 cents an hour, although the cities and towns were obliged to pay $1.20 an hour.

Outlining the purpose of the special convention, E. A. Johnson stressed the splendid accomplishments of the CWA in general since Nov. 16, but declared that union labor had been defrauded of a living wage under the highway construction act, the OCC, the PWA and the CWA through violations and evasions of the wage standards set in all of these relief acts.

Artists Welcome CWA Projects As End of Fish and Rabbit Diet

[Special Dispatch to The Herald]

PROVINCETOWN, Dec. 17—Impoverished artists who have been living on free codfish and rabbits and using their masterpieces to patch walls and floors in their draughty cottages are brimming with hope and ideas, now that the government plans to use them through CWA projects.

They are willing to paint posters, do portraits of postmasters, living and dead, make over the national Capitol in modernistic style or even paint barns if a change of diet and a few more comforts are to be the result.

ARRAY OF TALENT

Probably never before in history has so much artistic talent been available for the asking on Cape Cod. There are modernists, post-impressionists, cubists, vorticists, masters of landscape, seascape and portraiture, sculptors, scene painters, designers and architects by the score, every one eager to do his bit for the government.

Today it was suggested that to get the CWA art project plan under way as soon as possible, the artists be set to work designing posters for a campaign for recovery.

Richard Miller, a member of the National Academy of Art, is principal sponsor for the poster plan, which has the hearty support of a majority of the other artists. He proposed it last night at a supper of the Beachcombers, an organization of men painters, and said he would suggest it to Francis Henry Taylor, director of the Worcester art museum and regional chairman for New England of the public works art project.

A canvass of the homes of local artists today revealed how pressing is their need. Many of them live in flimsy frame cottages, the ceilings and walls covered with castoff paintings to keep the wind away. They burn driftwood for fuel and live on fish and game contributed by local fishermen and hunters.

One young artist said he lives on $2.10 a week and allows himself only 10 cents a week for tobacco.

An ingenious painter said he has worked out a plan of sustenance that keeps him well fed, but allows him little for buying paint. Whenever he receives a gift of a cod, haddock, duck or rabbit he makes a still life picture of it before he cooks it for dinner, thus providing himself with inspiration and nourishment at the same time.

Each Monday morning he sets a 10-gallon pot of potato soup on the stove, and whatever comes in in the way of meat goes in the pot, in the style of French peasants.

For two weeks during the gunning season he had enough in the way of duck to provide himself and a neighboring artist with black duck three times a day.

He has a studio measuring 16 feet by 24 feet which rents for $125 a year and has a balcony for sleeping quarters, and his possessions include an easel, a bed, a model stand, an oil lamp and a lot of old bottles and other objects picked up on the beach as subjects for still life paintings.

PAINTINGS ON FLOOR

On windy days he covers the floor with paintings intended for exhibition last summer, and his favorite remark is that he is standing on his national academy prize painting. His coffee pot freezes nearly every night with the fire still burning under it, he said.

Mrs. Harold Haven Brown, director of the Provincetown Art Association, is collecting a list of artists whose names will be sent to Taylor with the suggestion their talents be used under federal project.

TAKE HEALTH CENSUS IN HUB

Seek Data on Effects Here of the Depression

In an attempt to discover to what degree the health of the people in Boston has suffered as the result of the depression, a health survey will be made in conjunction with the unemployment survey to be made by several thousands of women in all parts of the State, Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the State civil works board, announced last night.

Mrs. Ann Page of Cambridge has been named to direct the survey. She will be assisted by George Mulvey of Dorchester.

The health census, in addition to providing valuable statistics of a general nature, will also be used to assist those who are undernourished and mentally affected by providing medical care for them.

LAUDS CWA PROGRAMME

To the Editor of the Post:

Sir—Now that the labor of the Civil Works Board has been brought to a successful close by putting 131,600 unemployed men to work, in this State, within the remarkably short period of 26 days, the thanks and appreciation of all those benefiting by this most remarkable peace-time project is in order.

Therefore, as one of the 230 unemployed men in Lowell, who have had the "sting" of the winter taken away by this emergency employment, I wish to express, not only my own gratitude, but the heartfelt, sincere thanks of every man employed on the local projects, to the State Board for their untiring efforts to bring assistance to so many of our fellow citizens. I want to thank also, Harry L. Hopkins, federal relief administrator, who first proposed the Civil Works programme and then carried it out as administrator. I am sure that the entire 4,000,000 men employed throughout the nation are in accord with me when I express my sincere gratitude for the execution and promptness of the works programme.

Treasury Open Extra Hours for Workers

Washington, Dec. 9 (A.P.)—The Treasury will remain open three extra hours today to cash checks for workers under the civil works administration. Instead of closing at 1 P. M., the customary bank closing hour, the Department will be open until four o'clock to accommodate C. W. A. employees. Old-timers described the extra hours as the first time in their memory the Treasury has taken such a step.

C. W. A. GIRLS SEND CARD TO PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

Among the millions of Christmas cards in the mails yesterday were three that bear a world of Yuletide spirit from 45 girls who only a short time ago were far from happy because of unemployment. Joyous now because of the C. W. A. program in which they have a part, each girl contributed three cents and the money went for three Christmas cards.

One card is on its way to President Roosevelt, another to Mayor Curley, and the third to Soldiers' Relief Commissioner John J. Lydon. The girls are putting in shipshape the records of Capt Lydon's department.

C. W. A. MAY RELIEVE POVERTY OF ARTISTS

Provincetown Colony Is Reduced to Potato Soup Diet—Aid Near

Special Dispatch to the Globe

PROVINCETOWN, Dec. 17—The acute poverty of no small number of artists in the local art colony—said to represent the worst straights in which artists have found themselves here in many decades—may shortly be relieved by Uncle Sam, who is planning to enlist the darlings of the arts in his rugged C. W. A.

If the plan works—and there seems nothing against its working—it will mean no more onion soup and shivery, endless nights among the ideal-worshipping Bohemians.

Mrs. Harold Haven Brown, in short, a director of the Provincetown Art Association, has been informed by mail that she can start the enlistment by forwarding at once the names of the most needy of the artists to Francis Henry Taylor, regional chairman of the public works program.

At Least 100 in Need

Labor for Uncle Sam with a paint brush and palette instead of pick and shovel is what this C. W. A. business will mean, it is hoped here, and mean it for at least 100 artists and craftsmen.

Richard Miller, member of the National Academy, and one of the local leaders, has suggested—in the absence of other suggestions—that the C. W. A. artists be assigned to making drawings for posters such as appeared during the World War and at the time of the Liberty Loan drives.

He remarks the artists might well devote their time on Uncle Sam's payroll, if only out of gratitude, to drawing pictures which would boost Uncle's N. R. A. and other alphabetical organizations.

The artists, meanwhile, don't want anyone to get the notion they are not intensely serious about joining the civil workers. They're not the Summer brand of artists. They're the kind that work industriously all year round. And last Summer incomes from paintings were small.

Just at present dire stories typify the poverty of the artists.

One young man, a very earnest young man who managed to sell a few canvases last Summer, is now reduced to living on $2.10 per week. The 10 cents is squandered on tobacco. The rest goes for food, shelter, heat, clothing, etc.—all items on none too large a scale.

Another very competent young artist (40 years old) is tending a furnace to keep body and soul together.

Among some of the artists the chief item of food is potato soup. This dish is made of potatoes and onions—usually placed in a 10-gallon container. Then, if the gourmand is given a rabbit, he chucks it into the soup—and at once he has rabbit stew. Ducks treated similarly produce duck soup, etc.

Another artist, living way out on the dunes, is living on the bounty of the Coast Guard, having been rewarded some weeks ago for notifying them of a shipwreck.

Share Communal Soup

Still other artists have resorted to beachcombing. In this manner they usually get fuel to warm up their none too pretentious studios. Occasionally they run across a kindly fisherman who gives them some of his catch.

So bitter has the poverty become, artists, huddled away from the Wintry winds in their creaky studios, have placed the precious canvases of last Summer (unsold) against the cracks in the wall. Some are even using next Summer's canvases as carpets—against the cold.

Once a week, though, the colony splurges. On Saturday the artists and craftsmen gather at the "Beachcombers," an old boat shed near the waterfront. While talk goes the rounds a big pot is put in the center of the room over a fire and potato soup is served communally while the artists forget their woes.

MRS. RANTOUL IS UNDER FIRE IN CWA ROW

State Treasurer Accuses Her of Causing Trouble

State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, member of the Massachusetts civil works board, today directly charged that Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, director of women's activities in this state under the CWA, is responsible for the trouble which has arisen around the women's activities.

BLAMES HER FOR UNREST

"All the controversy and unrest among the various women's activities may be charged directly to Mrs. Rantoul," Treasury Hurley said.

He made the statement following the visit of a delegation of Quincy women, who went to his office to protest the while 4000 jobs are provided through projects submitted by Mrs. Rantoul. Most of her projects, it is understood, call for material as well as labor.

This brought Director Scully of the federal emergency relief board into the picture, Scully believes he is within his rights in appropriating money, on his own authority, for material to put women at work. Bartlett disagrees with him.

As a result a meeting of the Emergency finance board will be held tomorrow morning in an attempt to straighten out the situation. Meanwhile Bartlett plans to talk today to Harry Hopkins, national director of the CWA at Washington.

The 4000 jobs under Mrs. Rantoul's projects, which were passed today, added to the women employed on municipal projects brings the total jobs provided for women to slightly more than the 10,000 allotted for women.

Mrs. Rantoul, however, believes that the work for women should have been allotted through projects presented by her. At the request of the board she submitted a program last Wednesday to give work for 9500 women.

QUESTION OVER FORMS

"I understood," said Mrs. Rantoul, "that I was to go ahead and line up projects for women. I did. I appointed chairmen for women in various communities of the state to plan projects. Then I was taken ill for a week. Finally the civil works board asked me to present my projects and I submitted them. Now I understand the board cannot accept them in the form in which they have been submitted. But I presented them in the same form as the cities and towns presented their applications for projects."

"I do not think the board gave me sufficient information as to how I should have proceeded. I was working and groping in the dark. Now I have been told not to submit any more projects."

There are approximately 18,000 unemployed women in the state. Approval of the projects, submitted by Mrs. Rantoul, would cut this list by more than half.

A solution of the entire situation may be reached if Harry Hopkins, national director of the CWA, approves the request of Chairman Bartlett for an allotment of approximately 26,000 additional workers for Massachusetts. He is expecting an answer to his request today.

If the reply is favorable it is believed that the women's projects will be among the first to be approved, which would clear up the entire situation.

Today was the day assigned for completing the filling of quotas, and Massachusetts, according to a late check of figures, has already exceeded its quota, which was 121,000. Bartlett's request to Director Hopkins is that the figure be raised to 145,000.

When advised of what Mrs. Rantoul had said Bartlett refused to enter into any argument on the matter and simply presented a record showing that more than 10,000 women had been provided for by projects already approved.

According to his list more than 4000 of the 9500 women on Mrs. Rantoul's list have already been given work on projects as they came before the board.

He stated that Washington has shut down somewhat on the number of men and women that can be given employment in Massachusetts, but added that authorities are asking Washington for permission to put another 45,000 persons to work in the state.

WHITE COLLAR SCALE

A new scale of wages for white collar workers under the CWA was announced today. The scales are arranged for three separate zones, southern, central and northern, with the northern zone receiving the highest wages. This is for the most part $3 per week more than in the central zone, which in turn is usually $3 higher than in the southern zone.

Under the scale the base pay here for white collar workers will be $18 per week, and the wage will range as high as $45 per week for technical supervisors. The intermediate group will receive $21 per week, supervisory $24 per week and technical supervisory $24 to $45 per week.

The 4000 jobs under Mrs. Rantoul's projects, which were passed today, added to the women employed on municipal projects brings the total jobs provided for women to slightly more than the 10,000 allotted for women.

Mrs. Rantoul, however, believes that the work for women should have been allotted through projects presented by her. At the request of the board she submitted a program last Wednesday to give work for 9500 women.

Make Roads Safe Campaign Begins Under the CWA

State-Wide Traffic Count Is First Step in Drive

What is undoubtedly the greatest drive against automobile mishaps on the road that this country ever has known opened this morning throughout the Commonwealth as a CWA project known as the Massachusetts highway accident survey swung into action.

In seven districts, 500 men are making traffic counts at important intersections and at other places along popular roads where accidents have occurred. On the eighth floor of the Public Works Building on Nashua street, West End, another large group is at work tabulating the returns of these checks and analyzing accidents that have occurred and which are listed on records of the Motor Vehicle Registry.

When the project was launched as an undertaking that would provide work for about 1000 persons and accomplish something worth while, Governor Ely requested officials of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology to direct it. Colonel Robert C. Eddy, who resigned his commission in the United States Army to become professor of economics at Tech, has been placed in charge and co-operating with him are various safety organizations and those State bodies that have to deal with highway traffic.

In particular, the Public Works Department, which already has made extensive traffic and accident surveys in connection with its maintenance of roads, has been enlisted and C. P. Taylor, traffic engineer of that body, is in charge of the checkpoints that are being made, while 200 trained men are overseeing the work of the 300 who are making the tallies.

The traffic count is for the purpose of showing what roads are being used most and what seasonal conditions guide the selection of certain roads by motorists. This, it is explained, might apply to a particularly icy or dangerous route. The count also tends to show from what direction the flow of traffic is coming and to where it is bound.

In all, more than 500 intersections are to be checked in this manner, and thirty-five of these are to be subjected to a twenty-four-hour daily inspection.

When the analytical force completes its study of accidents already listed these results will be handed over to the field force which then will check anew on the points where the accidents have occurred. When all this is accomplished the men in charge of the outdoor checkpoints will be in position to co-operate with local authorities in a study of the danger points and of remedies for the situation as shown by the records they will compile.

The districts are the same as laid down by the Public Works Department. One covers Berkshire County, another deals with Hampshire and Franklin Counties, the third with Worcester County, the fourth with Middlesex, the fifth with Essex and outlying parts of Suffolk County, the sixth with Norfolk and Bristol Counties and the seventh with Plymouth, Barnstable, Dukes and Nantucket Counties. The work that was begun today will extend through several months, it is thought. The initial appropriation is in the neighborhood of $200,000.

STATE QUOTA IN CWA IS INCREASED TO 131,500; MORE WOMEN TO WORK

WITH TREASURER

Validity of Her Appointment Is Called Into Question

HOPKINS TO PASS ON 14,500 NEW JOBS

Decision Monday — White Collar Men's Average Pay $18 a Week

Massachusetts has been granted additional jobs to bring the state's total to 131,500 jobs on civil works projects, Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts civil works administration, announced last night after a conference by telephone with Col. Harry L. Hopkins, federal CWA administrator. Hopkins confirmed Bartlett's approval of nearly 8000 jobs over the commonwealth's quota of 121,750, said Bartlett, and agreed to approve projects providing work for an additional 2500 women at 40 cents an hour. The federal administrator agreed to consider the local chairman's request for 14,500 more jobs and give a decision Monday.

Women who have worked on projects, technically known as civil works projects because payment for services is made from federal emergency relief funds, will not be paid today. It was announced. About $100,000 is due them, but because the Governor's council through an error, failed to approve payment, the money will be disbursed Monday. Federal law prevents disbursement without a vote of approval by the council.

The last day of the approving period for civil works projects was as hectic as any, as charges and counter charges were bandied back and forth between Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, in charge of CWA women's activities, and State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, who defended the board of which he is a member.

As the day closed there was doubt as to the validity of the appointment of Mrs. Rantoul to the position of state director of women's activities for the federal emergency relief administration, and the same position for the civil works administration.

Word has been received from Washington that so-called white collar workers in this section will be paid an average of $18 a week, and technical workers up to $45 a week. Last night Chairman Bartlett said he had not been informed of the ruling. He thought at first the wage schedule applied to public works projects, but added that the pay rate for civil works projects would average $18 a week.

State Treasurer Hurley issued a statement last night calling attention to the splendid showing of the state and said the major share of the credit should be given Chairman Bartlett. The treasurer emphasized that the board had always shown interest in women's projects, and that the members, Bartlett, Hurley and William B. Coy, a Boston banker, were unpaid.

URGED TO GET TO WORK

While Hopkins has agreed to consider Bartlett's request for 14,500 more jobs, the board members felt strongly last night that local officials should waste no time in getting men to work as new regulations from the national capital may mean the rescinding of approvals already given. It was considered doubtful that Washington would halt men at work.

Originally the Massachusetts quota for CWA jobs was 97,000 jobs. So swiftly did the Bartlett board organize and begin to approve projects that delighted Washington officials, pointing to Massachusetts as one state which realized the spirit of the CWA program, granted more jobs, bringing the total to 121,750.

Chairman Bartlett agreed that 10,000 women should be included in the quota. Although the quota was filled, they continue to examine projects and give tentative approvals. Yesterday he asked Hopkins to give the state 145,000 jobs in all.

At the close of the meeting, State Treasurer Hurley said:

"The Commonwealth and its citizens should be congratulated that this board has Mr. Bartlett as chairman. He has given unstintingly of his time and services for the success of the CWA program. The figures prove beyond question that Mr. Bartlett's leadership has brought our program to a successful conclusion, borne out further by the fact that he has obtained an extra allotment of women, making a total of 131,500 women. This shows Mr. Bartlett has not neglected the problem of providing jobs for women and that he has extended every courtesy to them."

William B. Coy, third member of the board, summarily removed Moses Gaskill, civil works administrator for the town of Mendon, when Gaskill refused to sign 20 CWA checks for workers unless paid. Coy suggested that the selectmen choose another administrator. Coy also said that any man not willing to assist in the patriotic movement should be dropped from his position. Gaskill is chairman of the public welfare department of the town. The members of the state CWA board have been working night and day without pay since Nov. 17, Coy said, and local officials are expected to co-operate.

SOME TIME BREWING

The squabble between Mrs. Rantoul and the members of the civil works board has been brewing for some time. Mrs. Rantoul organized women throughout the state to devise civil works projects for women. She named women as administrators for women projects, the theory being that women would be better to conceive projects calling for the employment of women. Skilled in organizing, and acquainted with many prominent women throughout the state, Mrs. Rantoul in a comparatively short time had an organization of her own at work. Spurred by patriotism, many Massachusetts women devoted hours to devising projects, enrolling unemployed women, investigating the needs of women.

The federal government to towns on the basis of $1 expended for welfare. The federal government to towns on the basis of $1 expended for welfare. The federal government to towns on the basis of $1 expended for welfare.

AGREED ON 10,000 TO B

Chairman Bartlett made it known that 10,000 women would be hired, but already engaged and those projects and about to go to have to be included in the figure, as would the 2500 women to be employed in a state unemployment census under the direction of the department of labor and industries. This brought the number of available unfilled women's jobs down, but the chairman promised that approximately 4000 women could be taken care of in projects approved by Mrs. Rantoul.

Mrs. Rantoul had named a date for women to submit projects to her. This date was set ahead 24 hours, so that Wednesday night was the deadline. Braving the storm in an effort to obtain work for needy women, groups of women, armed for demonstration, filed and Grafton and arrived after the deadline. S. P. M. But Mrs. Rantoul included the projects in the batch presented to the board Thursday night, bringing the total to 9500, although 4000 had been agreed upon.

Examination of the projects disclosed that a large percentage had not been approved by local civil works administrators appointed by the board. Under the CWA regulations these could not be approved. Others were not explained sufficiently to permit of understanding the projects, while still others could not be approved for various reasons. The board struggled with the problems until early yesterday morning and then adjourned.

During all the period that projects were being approved the status of Mrs. Rantoul was somewhat in doubt, but to spare her embarrassment the board listened to her suggestions and made agreement with her as though she were empowered to do the work.

AUTHORITY IN DOUBT

Yesterday John T. Scully, federal emergency relief administrator, admitted that he had appointed Mrs. Rantoul as state chairman of women's activities for the CWA on Nov. 22 after Mrs. Ellen S. Woodward, national head of FERA women's activities, had approved her appointment. There is doubt that Scully had the authority to make such an appointment.

Regarding the appointment as director of women's activities for the CWA it is a known fact that no member of the civil works administration ever appointed Mrs. Rantoul to the position, which is a federal position for which no salary is paid. Yesterday the feeling among the members was that the women's projects submitted by Mrs. Rantoul would be acted on as though they were officially presented.

Mrs. Rantoul yesterday said she had not been given sufficient information as to procedure by the board. She declared she had done her work of creating a state organization, and then had been taken ill. She felt hurt that she was the subject of criticism because the projects submitted could not be approved in the form presented.

State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley quickly defended his board. He insisted that "all controversy and unrest among the various women's activities could be charged to Mrs. Rantoul." As he spoke a delegation of women from Quincy entered his office to protest against the unfairness evidenced in the manner of appointing community directors by Mrs. Rantoul. This delegation, the fifth to visit the state treasurer, charged that politics was the deciding factor in the appointments. $5,500,000 loan awarded the railroad by the public works administration. The following statement concerning the application of the money was made yesterday by the Boston and Maine: "In the application for the loan, $1,000,000 was allocated for locomotive, freight car and passenger coach repairs. The money would insure continuous employment during December, January, February and March for approximately 730 workmen at the Billerica locomotive repair shops and approximately 720 men in the shops at Concord, N. H. The balance, it is proposed, we will spend on maintenance of roadbed and tracks, and possibly some portion of it for new equipment. This part of the loan, however, will not be drawn down. If at all, until spring when such work is possible."

MRS. RANTOUL IS UNDER FIRE IN CWA ROW

State Treasurer Ac- cuses Her of Caus- ing Trouble

State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, member of the Massachusetts civil works board, today directly charged that Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, director of women's activities in this state under the CWA, is responsible for the trouble which has arisen around the women's activities.

BLAMES HER FOR UNREST

"All the controversy and unrest among the various women's activities may be charged directly to Mrs. Rantoul," Treasury Hurley said.

He made the statement following the visit of a delegation of Quincy women, who went to his office to protest the while 4000 jobs are provided through projects submitted by Mrs. Rantoul. Most of her projects, it is understood, call for material as well as labor.

This brought Director Scully of the federal emergency relief board into the picture. Scully believes he is within his rights in appropriating money on his own authority, for material to put women at work. Bartlett disagrees with him.

As a result a meeting of the Emergency finance board will be held tomorrow morning in an attempt to straighten out the situation. Meanwhile Bartlett plans to talk today to Harry Hopkins, national director of the CWA at Washington.

The 4000 jobs under Mrs. Rantoul's projects, which were passed today, added to the women employed on municipal projects brings the total jobs provided for women to slightly more than the 16,000 allotted for women.

Mrs. Rantoul, however, believes that the work for women should have been allotted through projects presented by her. At the request of the board she submitted a program last Wednesday to give work for 5000 women.

QUESTION OVER FORMS

"I understood," said Mrs. Rantoul, "that I was to go ahead and line up projects for women. I did. I appointed chairmen for women in various communities of the state to plan projects. Then I was taken ill for a week. Finally the civil works board asked me to present my projects and I submitted them."

"Now I understand the board cannot accept them in the form in which they have been submitted. But I presented them in the same form as the cities and towns presented their applications for projects."

"I do not think the board gave me sufficient information as to how I should have proceeded. I was working and groping in the dark. Now I have been told not to submit any more projects."

There are approximately 18,000 unemployed women in the state. Approval of the projects, submitted by Mrs. Rantoul, would cut this list by more than half.

A solution of the entire situation may be reached if Harry Hopkins, national director of the CWA, approves the request of Chairman Bartlett for an allotment of approximately 25,000 additional workers for Massachusetts. He is expecting an answer to his request today.

If the reply is favorable it is believed that the women's projects will be among the first to be approved, which would clear up the entire situation. Today was the day assigned for completing the filling of quotas, and Massachusetts, according to a late check of figures, has already exceeded its quota, which was 121,000. Bartlett's request to Director Hopkins is that the figure be raised to 145,000.

When advised of what Mrs. Rantoul had said Bartlett refused to enter into any argument on the matter and simply presented a record showing that more than 10,000 women had been provided for by projects already approved.

According to his list more than 4000 of the 9500 women on Mrs. Rantoul's list have already been given work on projects as they came before the board. He stated that Washington has shut down somewhat on the number of men and women that can be given employment in Massachusetts, but added that authorities are asking Washington for permission to put another 45,000 persons to work in the state.

WHITE COLLAR SCALE

A new scale of wages for white collar workers under the CWA was announced today. The scales are arranged for three separate zones, southern, central and northern, with the northern zone receiving the highest wages. This is for the most part $3 per week more than in the central zone, which in turn is usually $3 higher than in the southern zone.

Under the scale the base pay here for white collar workers will be $18 per week, and the wage will range as high as $45 per week for technical supervisors. The intermediate group will receive $21 per week, supervisory $24 per week and technical supervisory $24 to $45 per week.

Make Roads Safe Campaign Begins Under the CWA

State-Wide Traffic Count Is First Step in Drive

What is undoubtedly the greatest drive against automobile mishaps on the road that this country ever has known opened this morning throughout the Commonwealth as a CWA project known as the Massachusetts highway accident survey swung into action.

In seven districts, 500 men are making traffic counts at important intersections and at other places along popular roads where accidents have occurred. On the eighth floor of the Public Works Building on Nashua street, West End, another large group is at work tabulating the returns of these checks and analyzing accidents that have occurred and which are listed on records of the Motor Vehicle Registry.

When the project was launched as an undertaking that would provide work for about 1000 persons and accomplish something worth while, Governor Ely requested officials of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology to direct it. Colonel Robert C. Eddy, who resigned his commission in the United States Army to become professor of economics at Tech, has been placed in charge and co-operating with him are various safety organizations and those State bodies that have to deal with highway traffic.

In particular, the Public Works Department, which already has made extensive traffic and accident surveys in connection with its maintenance of roads, has been enlisted and C. P. Taylor, traffic engineer of that body, is in charge of the engineer of that body is being made, while 200 checkmen are overseeing the work of the 300 who are making the tallies.

The traffic count is for the purpose of showing what roads are being used most and what seasonal conditions guide the selection of certain roads by motorists. This, it is explained, might apply to a particularly icy or dangerous hill that causes drivers to seek an alternate route. The count also tends to show from what direction the flow of traffic is coming and to where it is bound.

In all, more than 500 intersections are to be checked in this manner, and thirty-five of these are to be subjected to a twenty-four-hour daily inspection.

When the analytical force completes its study of accidents already listed these results will be handed over to the field force which then will check anew on the points where the accidents have occurred. When all this is accomplished the men in charge of the outdoor checkers will be in position to co-operate with local authorities in a study of the danger points and of remedies for the situation as shown by the records they will compile.

The districts are the same as laid down by the Public Works Department. One covers Berkshire County, another deals with Hampden, Hampshire and Franklin Counties, the third with Worcester County, the fourth with Middlesex County, the fifth with Essex and outlying parts of Suffolk County, the sixth with Norfolk and Bristol Counties and the seventh with Plymouth, Barnstable, and Nantucket Counties. The work that was begun today will extend through several months, it is thought. The initial appropriation is in the neighborhood of $200,000.

STATE QUOTA IN CWA IS INCREASED TO 131,500; MORE WOMEN TO WORK

WITH TREASURER

Validity of Her Appoint- ment Is Called Into Question

HOPKINS TO PASS ON 14,500 NEW JOBS

Decision Monday—White Collar Men's Average Pay $18 a Week

Massachusetts has been granted additional jobs to bring the state's total to 131,500 jobs on civil works projects, Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts civil works administration, announced last night after a conference by telephone with Col. Harry L. Hopkins, federal CWA administrator. Hopkins confirmed Bartlett's approval of nearly 8000 jobs over the commonwealth's quota of 121,750, said Bartlett, and agreed to approve projects providing work for an additional 2500 women at 40 cents an hour. The federal administrator agreed to consider the local chairman's request for 14,500 more jobs and give a decision Monday.

Women who have worked on projects, technically known as civil works projects because payment for services is made from federal emergency relief funds, will not be paid today, it was announced. About $100,000 is due them, but because the Governor's council through an error, failed to approve payment, the money will be disbursed Monday. Federal law prevents disbursement without a vote of approval by the council.

The last day of the approving period for civil works projects was as hectic as any, as charges and counter charges were handled back and forth between Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, in charge of CWA women's activities, and State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, who defended the board of which he is a member.

As the day closed there was doubt as to the validity of the appointment of Mrs. Rantoul to the position of state director of women's activities for the federal emergency relief administration, and the same position for the civil works administration.

Word has been received from Washington that so-called white collar workers in this section will be paid an average of $18 a week, and technical workers up to $45 a week. Last night Chairman Bartlett said he had not been informed of the ruling. He thought at first the wage schedule applied to public works projects, but added that the pay rate for civil works projects would average $18 a week.

The schedule as announced for the north zone is: Base rate $18, intermediate group $21, supervisory $24, and technical supervisory $45 a week.

State Treasurer Hurley issued a statement last night calling attention to the splendid showing of the state and said the major share of the credit should be given Chairman Bartlett. The treasurer emphasized that the board had always shown interest in women's projects, and that the members, Bartlett, Hurley and William B. Coy, a Boston banker, were unpaid.

URGED TO GET TO WORK

While Hopkins has agreed to consider Bartlett's request for 14,500 more jobs, the board members felt strongly last night that local officials should waste no time in getting men to work as new regulations from the national capital may mean the rescinding of approvals already given. It was considered doubtful that Washington would halt men at work.

Originally the Massachusetts quota for CWA jobs was 97,000 jobs. So swiftly did the Bartlett board organize and begin to approve projects that delighted Washington officials, pointing to Massachusetts as one state which realized the spirit of the CWA program, granted more jobs, bringing the total to 121,750.

Chairman Bartlett agreed that 10,000 women should be included in the quota. Although the quota was filled, they continue to examine projects and give "tentative approvals." Yesterday he asked Hopkins to give the state 145,000 jobs in all.

At the same time he related the plight of Massachusetts women and said thousands more could be put to work. Hopkins, much pleased with the Bartlett board, allowed an additional 2500 women for civil works service projects and agreed to let the state have the 129,000 others already approved, thus bringing additional hundreds of thousands of dollars into the state.

The board will begin the work of selecting from the projects submitted by Mrs. Rantoul a sufficient number to exhaust the 2500 figure. The women will be engaged in sewing clothes for the needy, knitting, rebinding library books and cleaning public buildings.

HURLEY STATEMENT

At the close of the meeting, State Treasurer Hurley said:

"The Commonwealth and its citizens should be congratulated that this board has Mr. Bartlett as chairman. He has given unstintingly of his time and service for the success of the CWA program. The figures prove beyond question that Mr. Bartlett's leadership has brought our program to a successful conclusion, borne out further by the fact that he has obtained an extra allotment of women, making a total of 131,500 women. This shows Mr. Bartlett has not neglected the problem of providing jobs for women and that he has extended every courtesy to them."

William B. Coy, third member of the board, summarily removed Moses Gaskill, civil works administrator for the town of Mendon, when Gaskill refused to sign 20 CWA checks for workers unless paid. Coy suggested that the selectmen choose another administrator. Coy also said that any man not willing to assist in the patriotic movement should be dropped from his position. Gaskill is chairman of the public welfare department of the town. The members of the state CWA board have been working night and day without pay since Nov. 17, Coy said, and local officials are expected to co-operate.

SOME TIME BREWING

The squabble between Mrs. Rantoul and the members of the civil works board has been brewing for some time. Mrs. Rantoul organized women throughout the state to devise civil works projects for women. She named women as administrators for women projects, the theory being that women would be better to conceive projects calling for the employment of women.

Skilled in organizing, and acquainted with many prominent women throughout the state, Mrs. Rantoul in a comparatively short time had an organization of her own at work. Spurred by patriotism, many Massachusetts women devoted hours to devising projects, enrolling unemployed women, investigating the needs of women.

Then an order came through from Washington that women employed on so-called civil works projects for women could not be paid from the $400,000,000 civil works fund, but had to be paid from a special fund set aside from the welfare money given for reimbursement by the federal government to cities and towns on the basis of $1 for every $3 expended for welfare. Chairman Bartlett managed to obtain $3,000,000 from the federal government to pay women on women's projects, and the projects were named civil works service projects. At that point Massachusetts was allocated 10,000 women out of the quota of all jobs assigned to the state.

AGREED ON 10,000 TO BE HIRED

Chairman Bartlett made an agreement with Mrs. Rantoul that 10,000 women would be hired, but that women already engaged and those in approved projects and about to go to work would have to be included in the figure, as would the 2500 women to be employed in a state unemployment census under the direction of the department of labor and industries. This brought the number of available unfilled women's jobs down, but the chairman promised that approximately 4000 women could be taken care of in projects approved by Mrs. Rantoul.

Mrs. Rantoul had named a date for women to submit projects to her. This date was set ahead, 24 hours, so that Wednesday night was the deadline. Braving the storm in an effort to obtain work for needy women, groups of women, started for Duxbury, Mass., field and Grafton and arrived after the deadline, 8 P. M. But Mrs. Rantoul included the projects in the batch presented to the board Thursday night, bringing the total to 9500, although 4000 had been agreed upon.

Examination of the projects disclosed that a large percentage had not been approved by local civil works administrators appointed by the board. Under the CWA regulations these could not be approved. Others were not explained sufficiently to permit of understanding the projects, while still others could not be approved for various reasons. The board struggled with the problems until early yesterday morning and then adjourned.

During all the period that projects were being approved the status of Mrs. Rantoul was somewhat in doubt, but to spare her embarrassment the board listened to her suggestions and made agreement with her as though she were empowered to do the work.

AUTHORITY IN DOUBT

Yesterday John T. Scully, federal emergency relief administrator, admitted that he had appointed Mrs. Rantoul as state chairman of women's activities for the "ERA" on Nov. 22 after Mrs. Ellen S. Woodward, national head of FEWA women's activities, had approved her appointment. There is doubt that Scully had the authority to make such an appointment.

Regarding the appointment as director of women's activities for the CWA it is a known fact that no member of the civil works administration ever appointed Mrs. Rantoul to the position, which is a federal position for which no salary is paid. Yesterday the feeling among the members was that the women's projects submitted by Mrs. Rantoul would be acted on as though they were officially presented.

Mrs. Rantoul yesterday said she had not been given sufficient information as to procedure by the board. She declared she had done her work of creating a state organization, and then had been taken ill. She felt hurt that she was the subject of criticism because the projects submitted could not be approved in the form presented.

State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley quickly defended his board. He insisted that "all controversy and unrest among the various women's activities could be charged to Mrs. Rantoul." As he spoke a delegation of women from Quincy entered his office to protest against "the unfairness evidenced in the manner of appointing community directors" by Mrs. Rantoul. NOON HOUR AT THE CONCORD-AV PLAYGROUND, CAMBRIDGE. AT A SHELTER
MADE BY C. W. A. WORKERS

The old-time pioneer days have come to Cambridge as the C. W. A. digs in, scoffs at the biting wind and bitter cold and has its cup of coffee and sandwich before an improvised stove fashioned out of an empty oil drum.

Work in the open where the wind sweeps across old Cofrans Pit on Concord av like a gale hurrying across a prairie is hardening the C. W. A. and like good soldiers they are adapting themselves to it that little girls may have pretty dolls for Christmas and the families may have food and shelter during these cold winter months.

It is an old axiom that Americans can adapt themselves to any kind of weather or conditions. Take these men. Some of them have not worked for two and three years, and many in white collar jobs. Suddenly they found themselves in the open performing hard work with the pick and shovel. Backs ached and bodies were weary at the end of the day's toil, but they are carrying on, happy to get a chance to work.

Then comes lunch time. Sandwiches wrapped in paper and perhaps a bottle of cold tea or coffee they carry to work. At noon they gather some old boxes and other wood and make a fire. An abandoned oil barrel is fashioned into a stove. Around the fire they sit and eat and smoke and talk. And at times the temperature is not like that at Miami Beach. But the men are cheery. They are a bit like the prisoners of old. The noon luncheon is a happy one.

Then at the end of the day's work they board the city trucks and Cambridge looks as if it were mobilizing its citizenry. Packed in the trucks they are driven to various parts of the city near their homes. Others who happen to live where the trucks do not go walk to their homes. But the walk home saves a nickel or a dime and the nickel or the dime probably may mean a few oranges or apples or a little candy in some little children's stocking on Christmas. General headquarters in Cambridge reports that the C. W. A. is carrying on.

RELIEF WORK IN NEW YORK: A SURVEY OF THE VAST WEB

An Analysis by William Hodson of Threefold System, Federal, Municipal and Private, to Aid the Unemployed and Needy

By WILLIAM HODSON,
New Commissioner of Public Welfare and Director of the Welfare Council.

It has become almost a commonplace to pick up the morning newspaper and read of what seems to be a new project to put hundreds of thousands of men to work, or of some new fund of millions of dollars for relief, or of the free distribution of millions of pounds of some surplus foodstuff. Little wonder, then, that there is in the minds of many people great confusion as to the seriousness of the relief situation, as to the need or wisdom of supplementing tax-supported relief with welfare work financed by private contributions, as to the local effect of the recently created Federal relief and employment projects, and, finally, confusion as to the current drives for funds by groups of welfare agencies and by numerous individual health and welfare agencies.

To clear up some of this confusion the following necessarily brief review of the whole local relief situation has been prepared, dealing first with the public agencies—Federal, State, and local—and then with the voluntary or so-called private agencies.

The Government's Work.
In a nutshell, the situation is this: In the field of direct relief—that is, the provision of the necessities of life, food, shelter and clothing—nine-tenths of the job is now being done under government auspices and out of tax funds and one-tenth out of funds contributed to voluntary agencies by generous citizens. This one-tenth is essential because, at least up to now, there has always been a considerable number of families who for one reason or another were not eligible for public relief, or who needed along with material relief the painstaking kind of friendly social service known to social workers as "case work," which government relief agencies have not thus far been able to develop.

Thus, of more than a quarter of a million families (including more than a million persons) in this city who are receiving relief, some 110,000 heads of families are now Federal employes on the payroll of the Civil Works Administration, to which they have just been transferred from the City Work Bureau; about 100,000 families are receiving relief from the municipal Home Relief Bureau in the form of food tickets, rent tickets and occasional medical service; and about 20,000 families are being aided by the privately financed family service and relief agencies, some through cash allowances, some through emergency work, some in a variety of other ways.

I—FEDERAL RELIEF.

When, on Nov. 7, President Roosevelt created the Federal Civil Works Administration, he performed an act of the deepest historical significance, with consequences so far-reaching as to be only dimly appreciated even by those who are carrying out the immediate purposes the President had in mind. In effect the President has said:

Here are millions of men and women out of work and unable to provide for themselves or their families. Some of them are getting relief in the form of food or cash in small wages for made work. Others have managed to get on without public assistance, but they, too, will need help soon. The relief being given is beggarly in amount and the only remedy for the workless is work and real wages. If these cannot be provided by private industry, it is the duty of the Federal Government, in cooperation with the local and State governments, to provide jobs and the money to pay decent wages. We will substitute, so far as possible, the pay forestation, flood control, soil erosion and pest control projects. The list is merely suggestive of what may be done.

This work will call for large amounts of unskilled labor; it will also require skilled labor, including carpenters, painters, plumbers, plasterers and others. For planning and supervision, engineers, architects and other professional personnel will be needed. Clerks, stenographers, office managers, bookkeepers, accountants and a wide variety of semi-skilled and so-called "white-collar" employees, both men and women, will be needed.

200,000 on Civil Works.

Now, who will get the jobs? Well, there are 4,000,000 persons to be employed throughout the nation. New York City will probably have 200,000 men and women on civil works. But it must be remembered that more than half of the total number to be put to work have previously been employed on work-relief projects. These projects and the payrolls have been carried over into civil works so far as possible. As a result, there will not be 200,000 new jobs in New York City, for example, because about half that number were already on work relief and are now on civil works. There will be less than 100,000 new places to be filled unless the New York quota is enlarged.

These jobs will be given to those who are being registered at the Federal Re-employment Service.

F. Allan Morgan,
William Hodson, New Commissioner of Public Welfare.

This service cannot refer men and women for work until the civil works projects are organized to take on more men than are now working. As this is done, the Civil Works Administration will call upon the Re-employment Service for the number and kind of employees needed. No investigation of applicants for work is permitted and no showing of need or destitute condition is required. Any one who needs work may apply.

Wages and Hours.

Now as to wages and hours. The Federal regulation calls for a thirty-hour week and a minimum of 50 cents an hour for unskilled labor and a minimum of $1.20 an hour for skilled labor. These rates are minimum rates; where the going wage in the community—that is, where the wage normally paid for that kind of work is more than the minimum—that going wage must be paid. For technical, professional and semi-skilled workers the Federal Government has not fixed the rate, but has decreed that the going wages in the community will be determining.

The wages of the civil works emstruction or building. They are to give work to musicians, artists, teachers, nurses, research and statistical workers, architects, engineers, doctors, dentists, accountants, typists, stenographers, clerks and others. The work to be done will include study and research, adult education and drafting of plans for useful public services.

Civil Works Service projects must be carried on by a public authority or under supervision of a public agency. The State Civil Works Administration has established a special department of Civil Works Service in the Port Authority Building. A special committee including persons representing the private social agencies through the Welfare Council of New York City and others will be a clearing house for the consideration of different types of work which can be undertaken.

Civil Works and Service.

There is one important difference between Civil Works and Civil Works Service. In the case of the latter the applicant must show that he is in need, although interpretation of what constitutes need will be more liberal than heretofore in Home and Work Relief. One reason for this difference is that Civil Works Service is maintained out of Federal relief funds and relief procedure must be followed to some extent to comply with the law, whereas in Civil Works proper the money is provided out of funds appropriated for public works construction and is therefore free of the limitations which surround the administration of relief funds.

Hours of work under Civil Works Service must not exceed forty a week. Persons employed on a weekly basis will be paid not less than $15 nor more than $35 a week; if employment is on an hourly basis wages will be not less than 30 cents an hour nor more than 75 cents an hour.

II—MUNICIPAL RELIEF.

With the transfer of all persons formerly on the rolls of the City Work Bureau to the rolls of the Civil Works Administration, the City Work Bureau is practically discontinued and will in fact be discontinued on Dec. 31. The staff of this bureau, heretofore a part of the New York City Department of Public Welfare, has been largely taken over as the staff of the local CWA.

The City of New York will, however, continue to maintain its Home Relief Bureau for the aid of those who are unable to work or who, though able-bodied and perhaps even skilled, are not able to obtain jobs in the Civil Works Administration, the Civil Works Service, or in the employment market generally. How large a part of the unemployed population will, for the time being, be subjected to this dis-appointment may be appreciated from the fact that in the last two weeks the local re-employment service has registered close to 200,000 persons seeking Civil Works jobs, whereas the unfilled portion of New York City's allotment of such jobs is in the neighborhood of 65,000.

It must not be assumed that, because the Federal Government has thrown large sums into the breach or because three or four major drives for relief funds are under way in this city, the problem of keeping people from starvation, from cold and unattended illness has been solved or even that it is a diminishing problem. Quite the contrary is true: This is most vividly illustrated by the fact that, though a million persons are already receiving some form of relief in this city, a daily average of 2,000 additional persons—most of them heads of families—applied to the Home Relief Bureau for help during November. The present daily average is more than double the civil works program. Home-relief costs will now be borne by the city and by the State through the Temporary Emergency Relief Administration.

This, then, is what is being done locally with money coming from the Federal Relief Administration, from New York City's share of the $400,000,000 National Civil Works fund, from the State's relief funds and from New York City's month-to-month appropriations for relief.

When, on Nov. 7, President Roosevelt created the Federal Civil Works Administration, he performed an act of the deepest historical significance, with consequences so far-reaching as to be only dimly appreciated even by those who are carrying out the immediate purposes the President had in mind. In effect the President has said:

Here are millions of men and women out of work and unable to provide for themselves or their families. Some of them are getting relief in the form of food orders or in small wages for made work. Others have managed to get on without public assistance, but they, too, will need help soon. The relief being given is beggary in amount and the only remedy for the workless is work and real wages. If these cannot be provided by private industry, it is the duty of the Federal Government, in cooperation with the local and State governments, to provide jobs and the money to pay decent wages. We will substitute, so far as possible, the pay envelope on the job for the grocery order and idleness in the home.

Extent of the Program.
As a result the Federal Government will be the employer of 4,000,000 men and women; the President has set aside $400,000,000 out of the billions appropriated for public works construction, to pay wages and other costs until Feb. 15, when future action must be determined by Congress. That the program in some form must be continued after Feb. 15 no one can doubt. As this is written, word comes from Washington that Congress will be asked to continue civil works until May 1. How is this gigantic plan of public employment to be carried out? What kind of work will be provided, who will get the jobs, what wages will be paid and what machinery is set up to administer the program?

Civil works projects are to be carried on either by public authority or under the supervision of governmental agencies. These projects must be socially and economically desirable; they must be finished by Feb. 15 or be of such a character that they can be stopped at that time without substantial loss.

With these restrictions you cannot build postoffices, school houses, bridges and other types of heavy construction—all such building must be carried on in the way provided by the law creating the Public Works Administration. However, you can, under the civil works program, build and repair roads, repair and improve public buildings, repair sewers and water mains, build parks and playgrounds, swimming pools and athletic fields; carry on sanitation, re-number were already on work relief and are now on civil works. There will be less than 100,000 new places to be filled unless the New York quota is enlarged.

These jobs will be given to those who are being registered at the Federal Re-employment Service.

F. Allan Morgan.
William Hodson, New Commissioner of Public Welfare.

This service cannot refer men and women for work until the civil works projects are organized to take on more men than are now working. As this is done, the Civil Works Administration will call upon the Re-employment Service for the number and kind of employees needed. No investigation of applicants for work is permitted and no showing of need or destitute condition is required. Any one who needs work may apply.

Wages and Hours.

Now as to wages and hours. The Federal regulation calls for a thirty-hour week and a minimum of 50 cents an hour for unskilled labor and a minimum of $1.20 an hour for skilled labor. These rates are minimum rates; where the going wage in the community—that is, where the wage normally paid for that kind of work is more than the minimum—that going wage must be paid. For technical, professional and semi-skilled workers the Federal Government has not fixed the rate, but has decreed that the going wages in the community will be determining.

The wages of the civil works employees will be paid out of Federal funds and the cost of materials will also be met by the Federal Government in so far as the localities are unable to provide the necessary funds. In New York City the December program calls for $12,000,000 for wages to 159,000 employees and approximately $2,000,000 in material costs, $1,000,000 of which will be provided by the city, the balance by the Federal Government.

So vast an enterprise could not be undertaken by the Federal Government without the full cooperation of the States and the cities and counties. In New York the State Temporary Emergency Relief Administration has control of civil works as agent of the Federal Government. This State body receives the allocation of funds from Washington and in turn allocates them to cities and counties. Approval of civil works projects and authorization to localities to undertake them emanates from the State administration.

Local Work Bureaus.

Since civil works, aside from special projects carried on by the State and Federal Government, must be organized and administered by local public authority, the State body designates in each city or county an individual or a local work bureau as the civil works agent in the community. The local civil works administrator in New York City is Travis Whitney, who was appointed with the approval of Mayor-elect LaGuardia.

To meet the need for professional and white-collar employment, the State Civil Works Administration has established what it calls Civil Works Service projects. These projects have nothing to do with construction and are maintained out of Federal relief funds and relief procedure must be followed to some extent to comply with the law, whereas in Civil Works proper the money is provided out of funds appropriated for public works construction and is therefore free of the limitations which surround the administration of relief funds.

Hours of work under Civil Works Service must not exceed forty a week. Persons employed on a weekly basis will be paid not less than $15 nor more than $35 a week; if employment is on an hourly basis wages will be not less than 30 cents an hour nor more than 75 cents an hour.

II—MUNICIPAL RELIEF.

With the transfer of all persons formerly on the rolls of the City Work Bureau to the rolls of the Civil Works Administration, the City Work Bureau is practically discontinued and will in fact be discontinued on Dec. 31. The staff of this bureau, heretofore a part of the New York City Department of Public Welfare, has been largely taken over as the staff of the local CWA.

The City of New York will, however, continue to maintain its Home Relief Bureau for the aid of those who are unable to work or who, though able-bodied and perhaps even skilled, are not able to obtain jobs in the Civil Works Administration, the Civil Works Service, or in the employment market generally. How large a part of the unemployed population will, for the time being, be subjected to this dis-appointment may be appreciated from the fact that in the last two weeks the local re-employment service has registered close to 200,000 persons seeking Civil Works jobs, whereas the unfilled portion of New York City's allotment of such jobs is in the neighborhood of 65,000.

It must not be assumed that, because the Federal Government has thrown large sums into the breach or because three or four major drives for relief funds are under way in this city, the problem of keeping people from starvation, from cold and unattended illness has been solved or even that it is a diminishing problem. Quite the contrary is true. This is most vividly illustrated by the fact that, though a million persons are already receiving some form of relief in this city, a daily average of 2,000 additional persons—most of them heads of families—applied to the Home Relief Bureau for help during November. The present daily average is more than double that of recent months.

More Adequate Relief.

It is hoped and expected that home relief can be made more adequate than it has been in the past. New York City is planning to spend nearly a million dollars in excess of previous monthly expenditures. The Federal Government, however, will not contribute to the cost of providing home relief in the future as heretofore because of the tremendous load it is assuming in the civil works program. Home relief costs will now be borne by the city and by the State through the Temporary Emergency Relief Administration.

This, then, is what is being done locally with money coming from the Federal Relief Administration, from New York City's share of the $400,000,000 National Civil Works fund, from the State's relief funds and from New York City's month-to-month appropriations for relief.

QUOTA IS FILLED ON C. W. A. JOBS

Bay State Must Wait for Extension

Board Here Had Sought to Place 14,000 More

Further extension of the Massachusetts jobs quota under the Civil Works Administration program will be impossible for the present, according to Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the State Board, who declared that Federal C. W. A. Administrator Harry Hopkins notified him yesterday afternoon that he could not accede to the request made by the State Board for 14,000 additional jobs.

The State Board has already made provisions for the employment of 131,000 persons under the C. W. A. program, and had enough projects tentatively approved to put 45,000 more persons to work, if Washington would extend the quota.

Hopkins said that the record made by the State Board justified the request for additional jobs, but that he was receiving requests from many other States and so did not dare allot more jobs for fear that the money would be expended before Feb. 15.

Survey Is Approved

The board yesterday afternoon authorized the employment of 130 social welfare workers to study conditions and cooperate with welfare workers in 39 cities and large towns exclusive of Boston in an effort to find ways and means of improving welfare work. Boston was not included because of the $50,000 appropriated for the employment of welfare workers to cooperate with the Welfare Department of this city.

Among the projects approved for the employment of women yesterday was one to put 300 women to work knitting and sewing in Fall River. These jobs were created from the additional 2500 jobs granted to the State last week for employment of women.

A Federal project approved by the State board yesterday calls for the employment of 600 men in improving the Boston Airport. The work will consist of filling and grading.

After a meeting yesterday afternoon, the committee which has been chosen by the Massachusetts State Building Trades Council to voice its protest to Washington against alleged violations of the wage and other sections of the P. W. A. and the C. W. A., decided to present its chief issues to Mr. Bartlett, local C. W. A. director, before proceeding to higher officials in Washington.

If the committee is unable to get satisfaction from Bartlett, it will then appeal to Washington officials, particularly to Secretary Ickes, to remedy the alleged infringements in this State of these relief measures.

The committee is made up of E. A. Johnson, president of the State Building Trades Council; James P. Meehan, secretary, and Robert J. Watt, secretary-treasurer of the Massachusetts Federation of Labor.

Watt said yesterday afternoon that the three issues which the committee would take up with Bartlett at the earliest opportunity were the following:

1. Whether the rule providing for wages of 50 cents an hour for unskilled labor and $1.20 an hour for skilled labor, as described in Bartlett's telegrams to cities and towns, was going to be enforced.

2. If it is to be enforced, whether there would not be required some definite standard of qualification for skilled labor, just as there are definite standards as to citizenship and veteran service.

3. Whether the provisions of the relief measures are to be merely "beautiful gestures" or whether enforcement machinery will be set up to carry out the provisions of the measures.

Watt said the committee was in favor of some system of supervisors or inspectors, chosen from men of background and training in construction work who would be able to observe the working of the relief measures intelligently and be in a position to say whether the measures were being lived up to.

At yesterday's all-day special convention of the Building Trades Council a list of alleged violations of the relief acts was presented. It included alleged failure to pay fixed minimum wage rates; employment of incompetent mechanics; "political pull" to secure employment for work that ordinarily would be done by union labor; hostility of a number of assistant administrators to organized labor; plea of lack of authority on part of administrators to interpret parts of the measures or enforce its mandates in relation to wages; establishment of intermediate wage rates and occupational classifications never before heard of.

The Building Trades committee will not be able to meet with Chairman Bartlett today, as the Civil Works Board has declared a holiday so that its headquarters can be moved from room 249 to rooms 415-416. An appointment has been made for this group to meet him tomorrow morning.

Anticipating an extension of the C. W. A. program through to June or July, with the possibility of favorable Federal action on the proposal to enlarge the scope so that more jobs may be provided, Mayor Curley yesterday asked all his city department heads to be ready to submit programs for additional work at a conference to be held in his office tomorrow afternoon.

STATE JOB SERVICE OPENS NEW OFFICES

Gov Ely and Others Will Speak This Afternoon

The Massachusetts State Employment Service will open its new offices in the 9th floor of the new Public Works Building at 100 Nashua st, this afternoon at 3. John S. Lawrence, chairman of the State Advisory Committee, will preside at the opening exercises which will include addresses by Gov Ely, Director W. Frank Persons of the United States Employment Service and Commissioner Edwin S. Smith of the State Department of Labor and Industries. Among those especially invited are many prominent Boston business men and leaders in social service and labor movements.

The opening marks the culmination of a new phase in the history of the State employment service, begun in 1931, when Commissioner Smith made it a separate division in the State Department of Labor and Industries. The office of director is now held by M. Joseph Curtin. Since that time the office has become affiliated with the United States Employment Service through the acceptance of the Wagner-Peyser act by the Massachusetts Legislature. Meanwhile, owing to its placement work in C. W. A. projects the Boston office, under the supervision of Everett L. Hanna, has become known to a wider public.

The new offices are arranged in accordance with the latest ideas of efficient service to employers and employees as developed in experimental stations at Rochester and Philadelphia. Besides the administrative offices there are two main divisions: one for workers in industry and skilled trades, the other for clerical, professional and technical workers.

A receptionist directs the applicants to the proper office, where an opportunity is afforded for a private interview with the registrar. Ample waiting room and clear directions facilitate the handling of applicants and save time. The department for laborers and casual workers, who visit the office in greater numbers and more frequently, is in the basement.

One of the salient features of the new set-up is the opportunity offered employers to talk privately with prospective employees. For this purpose, space in the interviewing rooms has been allowed, and in the clerical and technical division, a separate consultation room is provided.

In addition to these offices the service has further established several bureaus to coordinate the several departments, to bring their work into relationship with outside groups, and to take care of special cases among applicants.

These bureaus are Veterans Placement, Junior Placement, Rehabilitation, and the department for Co-operative Agencies, which will assist in the clearance of jobs through local nonpaying agencies as well as providing for such special work as is required by the existing Emergency Planning and Research Bureau.

PROTEST TO ELY ON MRS RANTOUL

Women's Club Says Privileged Few Gain—Her Appointment
Came From Washington

The undercurrent of criticism and questioning concerning the appointment and activities of Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul as director of the women's division of the Civil Works Administration in Massachusetts broke into the open again yesterday afternoon.

The Massachusetts Women's Political Club became the latest group to express dissatisfaction with the way Mrs. Rantoul has carried on her work and even to question how she obtained her appointment and who appointed her. Letters were sent by the organization to both Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State Civil Works Board and to Gov Ely requesting explanations.

LOIS B. RANTOUL
Chief of the Women's Division

"Had Nothing to Do With It"

Although the State Board did not meet yesterday because its headquarters were being moved in the State House, it is understood that the members do not know who appointed Mrs. Rantoul. They have said repeatedly that they had nothing to do with her appointment.

State Treas. Charles F. Hurley, a member of the board, charged several days ago that Mrs. Rantoul was responsible for all problems that have arisen out of the administration of the women's division of the C. W. A.

When Gov Ely was informed yesterday that a protest against the activities of Mrs. Rantoul as head of the women's division was going to be made, he said:

"Washington has appointed her to the position, we have nothing to do with it."

The position is a Federal office and the only connection Gov Ely ever had with the matter was in accepting Mrs. Rantoul's appointment as Emergency Relief Administrator when it was made from Washington.

Named by Mrs Woodward

A Globe reporter last night in consultation with John T. Scully, Federal Emergency Relief Administrator for Massachusetts, and Mrs. Rantoul, discovered that no women's civil works administrator for Massachusetts, as such, had ever been appointed.

Mrs. Rantoul obtained her position in the following way.

On Nov. 8, Scully received a telegram from Harry L. Hopkins, Federal Emergency Relief Administrator, informing him on that day the President had created the Civil Works Program. The telegram continued:

"The Federal Emergency Relief Administration will name its State and local emergency relief administrators to put this program into immediate effect."

On Nov. 22, Scully received word from Mrs. Ellen S. Woodward, Federal Women's Emergency Relief Director, to the effect that Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, who had been recommended to her as director of women's emergency relief for Massachusetts, by Scully, had been officially appointed by her to that post.

The previous telegram from Hopkins automatically placed Mrs. Rantoul in charge of women's C. W. A. work. Scully explained this further by pointing out that women do not come under the C. W. A. as such, but under Civil Works Service.

Women's Political Club stated their objections to Mrs. Rantoul as follows: "We feel that the selection of Mrs. Rantoul has been most unfortunate. We have shown the disposition to give her every chance to make good in the important position to which she has been assigned. In any action we take we wish to be constructive and not destructive."

"In the face of State-wide protests against directors of her choosing, we have remained silent, hoping that sad experience might influence Mrs. Rantoul to use better judgment and keener discernment in later selections. But, as directors continue to be named, more furious are the resulting storms of objections."

"Confusion reigns. The confidence of the women is being shaken in the C. W. A. program by the partisanship shown in naming directors. Women are beginning to view the Civil Works program as a vehicle to benefit a privileged few who happen to be friends of the cliques of women in whose hands are placed the vast power of giving jobs with the taxpayer's money."

Appeal to Bartlett

The letter to Chairman Bartlett read:

"Hearsay and uncertain rumor informs us that Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul has been named as director of the women's division of the civil works program in Massachusetts, but the fact does not appear to have official sanction."

"Will you kindly tell us, if Mrs. Rantoul is appointed, by whose authority the action was taken. We think it is the right of the women to have this all important and much-mooted question answered without evasion."

Charges that colored women are being discriminated against in the allotting of work to unemployed women under the Civil Works Service program were sent to Mrs. Rantoul last night by the Massachusetts branch of the National Equal Rights League.

According to William Munroe Trotter, secretary of the league, jobs, especially of the sewing type, are not being given out impartially, and an attempt is being made to employ women in a separate colored unit.

PRAISES CHIEFS OF RELIEF WORK

Governor Gives Christmas
Message by Radio

Rejoices That Near 150,000
Have Been Given Jobs

High Compliment Paid
Chairman Bartlett

With nearly 150,000 more people at work in this State than were employed Nov. 15, Gov. Ely, in a radio address last evening, declared that one of the dangers of the winter had passed and took occasion to wish the people of Massachusetts a merry Christmas.

The Governor was speaking over Station WNAC in place of James Roosevelt. His address dealt almost altogether with the Civil Works Administration program in Massachusetts and in this connection he praised Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State Civil Works Board as "one of the finest administrators and public officials who have been brought into the spot-conditions which must arise before plans, specifications and necessary approvals were secured for the construction of buildings, we were all summoned to Washington to participate in the organization of a civil works program.

"The officials of the Federal Administration had set aside the sum of $400,000,000 for that purpose. We were told the sort of thing that it was proposed to do. We were told that 4,000,000 men were to be taken from the relief rolls and the unemployed list and given work for which they were to be paid. It was a great town meeting.

"I was a silent witness of the sympathetic enthusiasm of Governors and Mayors from all over the United States for a plan which seemed to furnish relief from the depressed state of mind which comes from the constantly reiterated response to a request for aid. There is nothing that I can do for you."

State's Funds Not Enough

"For three years in this Commonwealth such funds have been used as we felt could be spared to put men to work along the highways, in the marshes to eliminate the mosquito, in the forests to preserve them, at our public institutions to increase their efficiency, and we in Massachusetts know the most satisfactory results achieved by that method of relief. The trouble with our efforts in the past has been that they were not sufficiently extensive and could not be with our resources to carry out the idea that upon a certain day we might say to one another, "Everyone is at work."

"We received our instructions in Washington from Harry Hopkins, the director of the division. Massachusetts has no reason now to complain of the cooperation which has been given us by the Federal Government in carrying out the policies of the New Deal. The difference of opinion which we originally had with the Secretary in charge of public works over the method of allocation of funds to Massachusetts, now seems to have arisen because of a lack of understanding of the purposes of the Massachusetts set-up. When that was made plain the difficulty and the difference disappeared.

Compliments Hopkins

"But I wish to take this occasion to pay my respects to Mr. Hopkins. I wish to compliment the President for appointing a man with a disposition like his—suave and unruffled, happy yet intensely practical and concise in his decisions. The record ordinarily incident to such a program has been cut, and I look upon the civil works program as one of the outstanding accomplishments of modern Government."

"We were not told in Washington how much money we could spend in this work. We were told that it was our responsibility to find useful employment for 97,000 men and women, who were to be kept employed so far as possible until Feb. 15, 1934. Our quotas were to be filled Dec. 15, 1933. Mr. Hopkins selected as the Federal representatives in Massachusetts of this great drive, Joseph W. Bartlett, who was serving as chairman of the Emergency Finance Board in charge of relief to cities and towns and two other members of the same commission, Charles F. Hurley, the State Treasurer, and William B. Coy. To these three men was intrusted the great responsibility of cutting the red tape of bureaucratic Government, approving the projects which were to be submitted by the cities and towns, and the State and counties, making the allotment of men for each project, and seeing to it that this great drive should move.

Commission's High Service

"I dare say to you that Mr. Bartlett is one of the finest administrators and public officials who has been brought into the spotlight of publicity in this Commonwealth for many years—honest, sympathetic, direct, intelligent and capable. He has given all of his time, night and day, to the furtherance of this work. I feel very proud that, for some reason I can't explain, this man was brought into the public service.

"In hardly less degree, may I pay my tribute to the other members of this commission? Mr. Hurley, who in addition to his duties as State Treasurer, has efficiently performed his work side by side with his chief; and Mr. Coy, really loaned to the State service through the courtesy of the Merchants National Bank—a sympathetic student of municipal affairs—the business man of the commission. This has been a laborious undertaking and the public owes to these three men a deep debt of gratitude.

Found Work for 142,511

"Now, what are the results? Three thousand six hundred and forty five projects have been approved, furnishing work for 130,750 men. After the work was well started, the necessity of finding work for women became apparent and Mrs. Rantoul was named by the Federal Government to become the director of the Women's Division. She has put together an organization almost overnight with great energy and ability; 359 projects for women have been approved, employing 11,761 women.

"The total wages resulting from this Civil Works Program and the original projects will amount to more than $21,000,000 and the total cost of these projects will amount to $28,500,000. Twenty-five percent of the cost is for materials. Eleven percent of this material cost is paid by the Federal Government, and 14 percent is paid locally. There are also Army and Navy projects employing 3800 men and costing nearly $2,000,000. The vast extent of this work is apparent when you are told that the total projects for public works approved in this State amount to $37,000,000.

One of the Dangers Passed

"Perhaps it is an exaggeration to say on the eve of this Christmas, 'everyone is working,' but we may say that nearly 150,000 more people are working than were employed Nov. 15. May we not rejoice in that fact? We do not know what the future holds for us. We may be over-enthusiastic in regard to it.

"The mere fact that there are dangers ahead need not on this occasion, any more than it does the mariner, cause us to despair. A dangerous course for the mariner is marked by the lighthouse and the beacons and he makes the journey successfully. No more than the mariner should we, knowing the dangers ahead, fail to rely on the beacons of civilization. It is for us to study the charts and the course mapped for us.

"Having created employment for 150,000, may we not say that one of the dangers of the winter has been passed, and the ship sails on? Therefore, I wish you a Merry Christmas. 'I have been enabled to say these

TO PAY WOMEN $350,000 TODAY

Civil Works Checks Are Sent—Boston's, $38,280

680 Men Work on Schools Here
—35 Artists Given Positions

The State Civil Works Board sent out last night checks totaling more than $350,000 for payment to Civil Works service workers, who are mostly women. These checks go to the larger cities and towns.

Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett announced that under these first allocations of Federal emergency relief funds for service projects Boston will receive $38,280, Springfield $10,795, Worcester $6028.

Repairs to buildings in the Boston School System are keeping 680 formerly unemployed men busy. William W. Drumme, Superintendent of School Buildings, reported yesterday.

Of the 150 artists who applied for work yesterday at the regional headquarters of the C. W. A. for artists, at the Gardner Museum, 35 will go to work this morning. It was announced last night. Two of the works started are designing of health posters and decorating the children's ward of the Cambridge City Hospital.

Charles A. Cronin, Lawrence Postmaster and a trustee of the State Infirmary at Tewksbury, criticized Richard K. Conant, State Commissioner of Public Welfare, yesterday on his appointments of contractors and engineers to supervise the C. W. A. projects at the Tewksbury institution.

In letters addressed to Gov. Ely and other State authorities, Cronin alleged that foremen and engineers were being employed at unnecessary expense to make up plans which also were unnecessary, because a State engineer, on duty at the infirmary, was capable of doing this work.

Opposes Machines on Civil Works Jobs

A. F. of L. Reports Haverhill on Alleged Violation of the Rules

Whether it will be permissible to discharge labor and substitute machinery on Civil Works projects may be determined in connection with a project in Haverhill, where on a sand pit operation the use of forty-five men for a period of eight weeks was authorized by the Civil Works Board. This morning Robert J. Watt, secretary-treasurer of the Massachusetts State Federation of Labor, received a complaint from a group of Haverhill men who say that about thirty men have been laid off and replaced by mechanical loaders, which can do the whole job in three weeks. They point out that they will have to return to the welfare list from which they were enrolled for the C. W. A. job.

Mr. Watt reported the matter to John T. Sully, the emergency relief director for the State, who called Mayor Dalrymple of Haverhill, the civil works administrator for the city. The mayor explained that with hand labor it was not possible to produce and forward the sand as fast as it was wanted, but the situation will be reconsidered.

To use machinery where the work can be done by human labor is contrary to the spirit of the law, said both Mr. Watt and Mr. Sully.

End Civil Works in South Feb. 1

Washington, Dec. 21 (A.P.)—The Civil Works Administration may bring its projects in the extreme southern part of the country to an end by Feb. 1. Harry L. Hopkins, the administrator, said some of the projects in the citrus belt of Florida may not last more than another week or two. Hopkins, who intends to see that there is no shortage of labor in rural areas, said, "When I came here I found they were paying 5 cents an hour for a ten-hour day on highways in Georgia. When I put the relief rate at 30 cents an hour they said the world would come to an end. It didn't. I believe in a new deal for the worker and the farm hand."

APPROVES $952,461 MORE IN PROJECTS

Governor's List Includes
Chelsea Dormitory

Gov. Ely yesterday approved projects submitted by the State Emergency Public Works Board calling for $952,461. They will be sent to Washington for approval.

Among them is the construction of a kitchen and dining room at the State Infirmary, Tewksbury, to include connecting tunnels and other items. The cost is estimated at $439,990. Another project provides for a new dormitory at the Soldiers' Home, Chelsea, at a cost of $218,700.

This is the 10th list of projects in Massachusetts to be undertaken by grant and loan from the Federal Public Works Fund. The cost of each has been estimated on present prices and an additional fixed percentage to cover the increased cost of labor and supplies. The direct labor cost is figured at 36 percent of the total. They are expected to furnish 2623 man-months labor.

Other items in the approved list are construction of a shore house at State Infirmary, Tewksbury, to cost $126,621; installation of a new well field at the same institution, $67,600; reconstruction and extension of stone jetties and dredging the channel

ROW OVER CWA IN CAMBRIDGE

"Fraud and Politics" Are Charged in Giving Jobs

A row among Cambridge CWA officials became known yesterday afternoon shortly after Mayor Russell and Charles J. McMenimen, Cambridge CWA administrator, declared that 129 men were on the CWA payrolls as the result of "fraud and politics."

John M. Kirk, personnel administrator, blamed by the Mayor and McMenimen for the situation, declared in a statement that "unwarranted interference" by his accusers was to blame. "Mayor Russell wanted his own list accepted by me in toto while Superintendent of Streets William E. McMenimen placed more than 130 names on the CWA payrolls without the authority of my office. If the city officials will leave my office alone, there will be none of the so-called 'frauds,'"

According to Charles McMenimen, a police check-up of 129 CWA workers has revealed that 180 men not in need of aid have been employed. These include men who are not residents of the city, but who gave false addresses such as vacant lots; single men in preference to married men; and men who had a "pull."

100,000 ON BAY STATE CWA ROLLS

30,000 More Will Be Working by
Jan. 1

With more than 100,000 already on Civil Works Administration payrolls, Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett said yesterday that by New Year's day this number will be increased by 30,000 more.

Many members of this army of 130,000 who will once more know the joy of receiving a weekly envelope have been jobless for two years.

EVERY CITY AND TOWN

Pointing to the speed with which projects are being carried out, Bartlett said that men are already at work in Salem, Brookline, Springfield, Marlboro and in many other places.

Civil Works projects financed entirely from federal money are being rushed through in every city and town in the State.

Mayor George E. Dalrymple of Haverhill yesterday denied that machines are being used on projects in his city where labor could have been used, and that, as a result, 30 workers were laid off.

"In regard to the statement that I have laid off any workers, I want to say that it is an absolute falsehood," he said. He added that, because of the nature of the work being done on one of the projects, it is impossible to use laborers. He said that, if hand labor had been used, it would have been impossible to complete the work before Feb. 15, the time specified by the CWA administration in Washington.

Approved by Bartlett

Corroborating Mayor Dalrymple's contentions, John J. Fitzgerald, chief engineer of the State Civil Works board, told Chairman Bartlett conditions were such in Haverhill that hand labor could not be used.

Commending Mayor Dalrymple for the way in which the work in Haverhill has been carried on, Chairman Bartlett said that it is, and always has been, the policy of the Civil Works administration to use man labor to the greatest extent possible, but where this cannot be done and the use of machinery is needed, it has been his aim to put into effect a plan whereby as many men as possible would be used under the circumstances.

He said this was the situation in Haverhill and that he approved the course of action taken by Mayor Dalrymple.

The sum of $254,000 was authorized for the construction of a new Waltham high school at a meeting of the emergency finance board. The law under which the money is advanced provides that 70 per cent of the total is raised by the municipality, and the remaining 30 per cent by the federal government. Wilmington was allowed to borrow $15,000 against its tax titles, and Greenfield $20,000 for public welfare expenditures.

PRaises CHIEFS OF RELIEF WORK

light of publicity in this Common-wealth for many years."

President's Success

The address of the Governor was as follows:
"I wish you a Merry Christmas. In a way you may take this as a Christmas message. During the last three years I have thought many times that it would be a wonderful thing if a drive could be put on throughout the State so that on a certain day we might say to one another, 'Everyone is working.'"

"Like many other people in the world, I feel that upon occasion I have very grand ideas, but also like many other people, in fact most people, the idea and its accomplishment are two different matters. I have the idea, but the ability to execute it is too often lacking."

"This, quite apparently, is not the status of President Roosevelt and his assistants. He seems to have the ideas and those ideas are carried out."

Civil Works Inspiration

"Just a few weeks ago, when it became apparent that in the natural course of events it would be impossible to put into operation a program of public works in a climate like ours, because of unfavorable weather conditions which must arise before plans, specifications and necessary approvals were secured for the construction of buildings, we were all summoned to Washington to participate in the organization of a civil works program."

"The officials of the Federal Administration had set aside the sum of $400,000,000 for that purpose. We were told the sort of thing that it was proposed to do. We were told that 4,000,000 men were to be taken from the relief rolls and the unemployed and given work for which they were to be paid. It was a great town meeting."

"I was a silent witness of the sympathetic enthusiasm of Governors and Mayors from all over the United States for a plan which seemed to furnish relief from the depressed state of mind which comes from the constantly reiterated response to a request for aid. There is nothing that I can do for you."

State's Funds Not Enough

achieved by that method of relief. The trouble with our efforts in the past has been that they were not sufficiently extensive and could not be with our resources to carry out the idea that upon a certain day we might say to one another, 'Everyone is at work.'"

"We received our instructions in Washington from Harry Hopkins, the director of the division. Massachusetts has no reason now to complain of the cooperation which has been given us by the Federal Government in carrying out the policies of the New Deal. The difference of opinion which we originally had with the Secretary in charge of public works, over the method of allocation of funds to Massachusetts, now seems to have arisen because of a lack of understanding of the purposes of the Massachusetts set-up. When that was made plain the difficulty and the difference disappeared."

Compliments Hopkins

"But I wish to take this occasion to pay my respects to Mr. Hopkins. First, I wish to compliment the President for appointing a man with a disposition like his—suave and unruffled, happy yet intensely practical and concise in his decisions. The red tape ordinarily incident to such a program has been cut, and I look upon the civil works program as one of the outstanding accomplishments of modern Government."

"We were not told in Washington how much money we could spend in this work. We were told that it was our responsibility to find useful employment for 97,000 men and women who were to be kept employed so far as possible until Feb. 15, 1934. Our Mr. Hopkins selected as the Federal representatives in Massachusetts of this great drive, Joseph W. Bartlett, who was serving as chairman of the Emergency Finance Board in charge of relief to cities and towns, and two other members of the same commission, Charles F. Hurley, the State Treasurer, and William B. Coy. To these three men was intrusted the red tape of bureaucratic Government, approving the projects which were to be submitted by the cities and towns, and the State and counties, making the allotment of men for each project, and seeing to it that this great drive should move."

Commission's High Service

"I dare say to you that Mr. Bartlett is one of the finest administrators and public officials who has been brought into the spotlight of publicity in this Commonwealth for many years—honest, sympathetic, direct, intelligent and capable. He has given all of his time, night and day, to the furtherance of this work. I felt very proud that, for some reason I can't explain, this man was brought into the public service."

"In hardly less degree, may I pay my tribute to the other members of this commission? Mr. Hurley, who in addition to his duties as State Treasurer, has efficiently performed his work side by side with his chief, and Mr. Coy, really loaned to the State service through the courtesy of the Merchants National Bank—a sympathetic student of municipal affairs—the business man of the commission. This has been a laborious undertaking and the public owes to these three men a deep debt of gratitude."

Found Work for 142,511

"Now, what are the results? Three thousand six hundred and forty five projects have been approved, furnishing work for 130,750 men. After the work was well started, the necessity of finding work for women became apparent and Mrs. Rantoul was named by the Federal Government to become the director of the Women's

"The total wages resulting from this Civil Works Program and the original projects will amount to more than $21,000,000 and the total cost of these projects will amount to $28,500,000. Twenty-five percent of the cost is for materials. Eleven percent of this material cost is paid by the Federal Government, and 14 percent is paid locally. There are also Army and Navy projects employing 3800 men and costing nearly $2,000,000. The vast extent of this work is apparent when you are told that the total projects for public works approved in this State amount to $37,000,000."

One of the Dangers Passed

"Perhaps it is an exaggeration to say on the eve of this Christmas, 'everyone is working,' but we may say that nearly 150,000 more people are working than were employed Nov. 15. May we not rejoice in that fact? We do not know what the future holds for us. We may be over-enthusiastic in regard to it."

"The mere fact that there are dangers ahead need not on this occasion, any more than it does the mariner, cause us to despair. A dangerous course for the mariner is marked by the lighthouse and the beacons and he makes the journey successfully. No more than the mariner should we, knowing the dangers ahead, fail to rely on the beacons of civilization. It is for us to study the charts and the course mapped for us."

"Having created employment for 150,000, may we not say that one of the dangers of the Winter has been passed, and the ship sails on? Therefore, I wish you a Merry Christmas. 'I have been enabled to say these few words to you through the courtesy of James Roosevelt, who brings you a message each Tuesday evening from this station. I hope that you will be able very shortly to be back on the air."

TO PAY WOMEN $350,000 TODAY

Civil Works Checks Are Sent—Boston's, $38,280

680 Men Work on Schools Here —35 Artists Given Positions

The State Civil Works Board sent out last night checks totaling more than $350,000 for payment to Civil Works service workers, who are the larger cities and towns.

Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett announced that under these first allocations of Federal emergency relief funds for service projects Boston will receive $38,280, Springfield $10,795, Worcester $6028.

Repairs to buildings in the Boston School System are keeping 680 formerly unemployed men busy. William W. Drummey, Superintendent of School Buildings, reported yesterday.

Of the 150 artists who applied for work yesterday at the regional headquarters of the C. W. A. for artists, at the Gardner Museum, 35 will go to work this morning. It was announced last night. Two of the works started are designing of health posters and decorating the children's ward of the Cambridge City Hospital.

Charles A. Cronin, Lawrence Postmaster and a trustee of the State Infirmary at Tewksbury, criticized Richard K. Conant, State Commissioner of Public Welfare, yesterday on his appointments of contractors and engineers to supervise the C. W. A. projects at the Tewksbury institution.

In letters addressed to Gov. Ely and other State authorities, Cronin alleged that foremen and engineers were being employed at unnecessary expense to make up costly plans which also were unnecessary, because a State engineer, on duty at the infirmary, was capable of doing this work.

Opposes Machines on Civil Works Jobs

A. F. of L. Reports Haverhill on Alleged Violation of the Rules

Whether it will be permissible to discharge labor and substitute machinery on Civil Works projects may be determined in connection with a project in Haverhill, where on a sand pit operation the use of forty-five men for a period of eight weeks was authorized by the Civil Works Board. This morning Robert J. Watt, secretary-treasurer of the Massachusetts State Federation of Labor, received a complaint from a group of Haverhill men who say that about thirty men have been laid off and replaced by mechanical loaders, which can do the whole job in three weeks. They point out that they will have to return to the welfare list from which they were enrolled for the C. W. A. job.

Mr. Watt reported the matter to John T. Sully, the emergency relief director for the State, who called Mayor Dalrymple of Haverhill, the civil works administrator for the city. The mayor explained that with hand labor it was not possible to produce and forward the sand as fast as it was wanted, but the situation will be reconsidered.

To use machinery where the work can be done by human labor is contrary to the spirit of the law, said both Mr. Watts and Mr. Sully.

End Civil Works in South Feb. 1

Washington, Dec. 21 (A.P.)—The Civil Works Administration may bring its projects in the extreme southern part of the country to an end by Feb. 1. Harry L. Hopkins, the administrator, said some of the projects in the citrus belt of Florida may not last more than another week or two. Hopkins, who intends to see that there is no shortage of labor in rural areas, said, "When I came here I found they were paying 5 cents an hour for a ten-hour day on highways in Georgia. When I put the relief rate at 30 cents an hour they said the world would come to its end. It didn't. I believe in a new deal for the worker and the farm hand."

APPROVES $952,461 MORE IN PROJECTS

Governor's List Includes Chelsea Dormitory

Gov. Ely yesterday approved projects submitted by the State Emergency Public Works Board calling for $952,461. They will be sent to Washington for approval.

Among them is the construction of a kitchen and dining room at the State Infirmary, Tewksbury, to include connecting tunnels and other items. The cost is estimated at $439,990. Another project provides for a new dormitory at the Soldiers' Home, Chelsea, at a cost of $218,700.

This is the 10th list of projects in Massachusetts to be undertaken by grant and loan from the Federal Public Works Fund. The cost of each has been estimated on present prices and an additional fixed percentage to cover the increased cost of labor and supplies. The direct labor cost is figured at 36 percent of the total. They are expected to furnish 2623 man-months labor.

Other items in the approved list are construction of a shore house at State Infirmary, Tewksbury, to cost $126,621; installation of a new well field at the same institution, $67,600; reconstruction and extension of stone jetties and dredging the channel

"Fraud and Politics" Are Charged in Giving Jobs

A row among Cambridge CWA officials became known yesterday afternoon shortly after Mayor Russell and Charles J. McMenimen, Cambridge CWA administrator, declared that 129 men were on the CWA payrolls as the result of "fraud and politics."

John W. Kirk, personnel administrator, blamed by the Mayor and McMenimen for the situation, declared in a statement that "unwarranted interference" by his accusers was to blame. Mayor Russell wanted his own lists accepted by me in toto while Superintendent of Streets William R. McMenimen placed more than 150 names on the CWA payrolls without the authority of my office. If the city officials will leave my office alone, there will be none of the so-called 'frauds,' he said.

According to Charles McMenimen, a police check-up of 129 CWA workers has revealed that 129 men not in need of aid have been employed. These include men who are not residents of the city, but who gave false addresses such as vacant lots; single men in preference to married men; and men who had a "pull."

100,000 ON BAY STATE CWA ROLLS

30,000 More Will Be Working by Jan. 1

With more than 100,000 already on Civil Works Administration payrolls, Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett said yesterday that by New Year's day this number will be increased by 30,000 more.

Many members of this army of 130,000 who will once more know the joy of receiving a weekly envelope have been jobless for two years.

EVERY CITY AND TOWN

Pointing to the speed with which projects are being carried out, Bartlett said that men are already at work in Salem, Brookline, Springfield, Marlboro and in many other places.

Civil Works projects financed entirely from federal money are being rushed through in every city and town in the State.

Mayor George E. Dalrymple of Haverhill yesterday denied that machines are being used on projects in his city where labor could have been used, and that, as a result, 30 workers were laid off.

"In regard to the statement that I have laid off any workers, I want to say that it is an absolute falsehood," he said. He added that, because of the nature of the work being done on one of the projects, it is impossible to use laborers. He said that, if hand-labor had been used, it would have been impossible to complete the work before Feb. 15, the time specified by the CWA administration in Washington.

Approved by Bartlett

Corroborating Mayor Dalrymple's contention, John J. Fitzgerald, chief engineer of the State Civil Works board told Chairman Bartlett conditions were such in Haverhill that hand labor could not be used.

Commending Mayor Dalrymple for the way in which the work in Haverhill has been carried on, Chairman Bartlett said that it is, and always has been, the policy of the Civil Works Administration to use man labor to the greatest extent possible, but where this cannot be done and the use of machinery is needed, it has been his aim to put into effect a plan whereby as many men as possible would be used under the circumstances.

He said this was the situation in Haverhill and that he approved the course of action taken by Mayor Dalrymple.

The sum of $254,000 was authorized for the construction of a new Waltham high school at a meeting of the emergency finance board. The law under which the money is advanced provides that 70 per cent of the total is raised by the municipality, and the remaining 30 per cent by the federal government. Waltham was allowed to borrow $15,000 against its tax titles, and Greenfield $20,000 for public welfare expenditures.

Assails Conant as Wasting CWA Cash

Tewksbury Postmaster Alleges Unnecessary Expense and Political Appointments

Lawrence, Dec. 21 (A.P.)—Charles A. Cronin, Lawrence postmaster and a trustee of the State Infirmary at Tewksbury, today bitterly assailed Richard K. Conant, State commissioner of public welfare, for his appointment of contractors and engineers to supervise CWA projects at the Tewksbury institution.

In letters addressed to Governor Joseph B. Ely and other State officials, Cronin charged that town officials are being employed as foremen; that "costly and unnecessary" charts and plans are being drawn for the various jobs, and that the work was awarded to contractors and engineers already employed on other works at big expense and contrary to the spirit and letter of law.

These unnecessary expenses, Cronin said, deprive jobless men of the benefits intended for them under the CWA. "Even if only $3000 in supervisors' fees were saved," he wrote to the governor, "it would mean $15 each to 200 needy families and I know it can be done."

"This fund," said Cronin, referring to the allotment of $185,000 for work at the infirmary, "was never intended for plans and engineering charts particularly in simple projects, but for labor, that the money should get directly to the needy—to reduce privation—without resorting to a dole."

Cronin asserted a State engineer, qualified in every way, is on duty at the infirmary and easily could take over general supervision of the work at no extra expense.

"And still," Cronin wrote, "Mr. Conant picks contractors and engineers—already building projects and not unemployed—at big expense. Mr. Conant has arbitrarily put certain employed firms or persons in positions as supervisors. These supervisors through instructions from Mr. Conant or otherwise employed people not in distress or unemployed—contrary to law and humane principles and in contradiction to the idea and policies of the Public Works Administration."

"The commissioner's obligation is satisfied when he sees that his charges are properly clothed, fed and cared for medically."

"When an investigation is made Commissioner Conant steps aside and is satisfied to let censure fall on those accountable, but when an opportunity at self-aggrandizement appears he is again in the picture, ruling through factions born of his political appointments and handsocial contacts and assumed authorities, communicating, not by the written word for record, but by dinners and clandestine meetings with an occasional philanthropic clad mission to the institution."

Mayors Split Of $12,000,000 for Civil Works

State House meeting tomorrow, although the mayors actually have absolutely nothing to do with the allocation of the money in this state.

That the state civil works board will expect the cities to contribute part of the savings gained by putting welfare recipients to work on civil works projects came as a distinct surprise to several mayors.

Many refused to believe it until they had official word from Chairman Bartlett, although item 3 on the civil works application blanks reads: "Contribution by the Local Community," and calls for a list of contributions, whether money, or its equivalent. One mayor said he would refuse money on this basis, but quickly retracted his words. Most of them, however, felt that the only fair thing to do would be to co-operate and put up the money or the equivalent.

State laws may prevent a city from obtaining money to match the civil works grant, it was asserted by several mayors. If a city wanted to borrow money for this purpose by issuing bonds, it would be at least 34 days before the money would be available. This delay would nullify the President's efforts to speed up employment. Whether the state board would take the word of a mayor that a loan order would be passed was considered doubtful by many mayors.

It was then pointed out that the state can lend cities money through the state emergency finance board, of which Bartlett is also the chairman. This gives the finance board the right to approve budgets before they are passed, and the thought of Chairman Bartlett and his colleagues scrutinizing their budgets was distasteful to several city chiefs.

Mayor Curley introduced a motion urging that the cities establish municipal employment boards which would co-operate with the civil works board in selecting men for jobs. It was pointed out that the federal reemployment service wants to do this work under authorization from Washington, and the mayor withdrew his motion.

He then asserted that newspaper reports had given the impression that only welfare recipients would receive work, when, as a matter of fact, the welfare men would obtain work up to Dec. 1. After that date and until Dec. 15 the unemployed not on the welfare rolls will be assigned jobs on civil works projects. He introduced a motion clarifying the point, which was passed, as was a resolution promising complete co-operation of the mayors with the state board.

Mayor Curley felt that many persons desiring work and feeling that being a welfare recipient was a pre-requisite, would immediately apply for welfare aid. The civil works regulations state that only those who were on the welfare rolls on or before Nov. 16 last are eligible for work. This confusion in the minds of many was evidenced yesterday when the quarters of the civil works board at the State House were stormed by unemployed seeking jobs.

The "rush-hush" atmosphere of the meeting—occasioned by the belief of Mayor Casassa that the civil works board might not like the idea of a special meeting because of a possible "conflict"—had an amusing sidelight when Mayor Curley, delayed momentarily in reaching the meeting room, found it locked. "I hope I have the password," he said, jokingly.

The simplified application blanks for civil works projects which will be available to mayors, selectmen and welfare agents at the State House were shown in mimeographed form at the meeting for the first time.

The state civil works board appointed welfare agents in cities and towns as the local civil works administrators. The instruction sheet of the blank reads:

"The local civil works administrator assumes responsibility of notifying the state board of any attempt to use the existence of the civil works program as an excuse for substantially reducing normal government expenditures."

Thus, cities or towns which might have used the civil works grant to re-

Plans for Using Federal Money

Jobs for at least 1000 men immediately is Mayor Curley's aim under the Washington plan of relieving the welfare department of cities and towns of the country with an appropriation of $400,000,000. When he reached his City Hall office at noon today he found gathered there, in response to an early morning summons, representatives of the public works, park, assessing, law, auditing, budget and city planning departments, with whom he conferred for nearly two hours on drawing up a program that would total about $4,000,000.

As outlined by the mayor the specific projects would include a survey of the city looking into the future for 100 years, which would require a City Planning Board force of scores of engineers, architects and draughtsmen; a bathing pool development in the park system which would provide a new source of employment in at least fifteen of the playgrounds; an extensive improvement of the bathing beaches and the Strandway, South Boston; and a continuation of the work on the block system for the assessing department, which would mean a doubling of the expert force.

The mayor did not know just how much money would be allotted to Boston, but if the State receives no more than $12,000,000 Boston's share would perhaps not exceed $2,000,000. If so, the number of men that could be employed would not approach the 1000 mark which the mayor was hopeful of reaching. But there is improvement in the city's financial position. The Strandway and the bathing beaches, with the additional work of providing bathing pools in remote sections, the cost will approach $1,500,000. Having successfully prevailed upon the George Robert White Fund trustees to undertake the construction of a Prado in the North End, Mayor Curley is now anxious to build a much longer Prado along the Strandway from Columbus Circle to the L street, bathhouse, which would be planted with trees and shrubbery and adorned with grass plots and flower gardens. He would also construct concrete steps leading from the roadway to the wide expanse of beach and increase the bathing facilities in this popular playground.

Another extensive public improvement lies in the smooth-paving of alleyways all over the city to minimize the dangers from germs in summer and the inconvenience and unsightliness of mud in spring. Many alleys have been paved in the last fifteen years, particularly in the Back Bay, but there are many such bad spots in other sections, breeding places for tubercular germs which cannot be kept clean by the city except as the opportunity is afforded to flush them from the hydrants. Whether the mayor can secure money from the special fund to correct these evils is a question. Anyways, in a few weeks there will be several inches of frost in the ground and all street and sewer work will be abandoned.

Then there is the matter of repairs on public buildings, of which Chairman Frank A. Goodwin of the Finance Commission has called attention to the mayor and department heads. Repairs have been by the board for several years, owing to the necessity of cutting the budget to the bone. As Chairman Goodwin states, "If there is any group in this community which has suffered all during the depression it is made up of workers in the building trades, plumbers, carpenters, masons, and it seems about time to do something for them. Not only that, but a failure to make the necessary repairs is bound to cost the city large sums in the future."

TO SEE THAT WOMEN GET SHARE OF JOBS

Mrs Lois B. Rantoul Named Director of Civil Works Administration—Office Being Enlarged

MRS. LOIS B. RANTOUL.

Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, a tireless worker for child and woman welfare, today was appointed director of the women's division of the Civil Works Administration and immediately set about her job of seeing that needy and unemployed women get a slice of the $12,500,000 Federal allotment for work in the Commonwealth.

Announcement of the appointment was made this morning by John T. Scully, director of the State Emergency Relief Administration, in the midst of a madhouse hubbub in his crowded offices at 15 Ashburton place. Although the State Civil Works Board was still meeting in room 249 at the State House today, city and town officials and others jammed the offices of the State Emergency Relief Administration at 15 Ashburton place seeking application blanks for Federal allotments and asking thousands of questions of anyone who appeared to have the slightest claims to an official position in the offices.

The confusion was increased by the comings and goings of carpenters who were at work enlarging the offices to make possible a consolidation of the activities of the C. W. A. and the State Relief organization into one office.

A staff of 10 men was working under the direction of director Scully preparing the mass of blanks that must be filled out and rushed through in order to let the emergency work get under way immediately.

Mrs. Rantoul, in speaking of her new job today, said that her chief duty was to make sure that the unemployed women are not overlooked in the rush to put men to work on community projects.

"Of course the problem of the unemployed woman is not so easy to solve as is the one of the unemployed man," Mrs. Rantoul declared. "You can put 1000 men to work immediately in road building projects, but you cannot do the same thing with 1000 unemployed women."

"We will work with existing relief agencies, employment agencies, and cooperative workshops. An added difficulty in meeting the woman's problem is that many desperately needy women are not on the welfare lists. The situation among unemployed domestic servants is particularly acute. I am glad to see that the Boston projects for the expenditure of the city's Federal allotments provide for the employment of a certain number of women, mostly in clerical jobs."

Mrs. Rantoul said that announcement of a staff of women workers to assist her will be announced shortly. As chief of the Women's Ordinance Bureau during the war, and as leader in the activities of the Massachusetts League of Women Voters and the Women's Trade Union League, Mrs. Rantoul has had wide experience with women's labor problems.

SENT OUT 39,000
BLANK CHECKS

Herbert Barracough, disbursing officer at the regional office of the United States Veterans' Administration, in the Postoffice Building, this morning described the method of payment of the civil workers whereby the Veterans' Administration is associated.

"In every community throughout the State," he said, "there is appointed a certifying officer. He prepares a payroll dealing with the work in that community of each civil works man for the week extending from Friday to Thursday."

"That payroll is handed to the treasurer of the community, who has become a sort of deputy to me. It is his job then to fill out, in accordance with the payroll, the blank checks which I have sent to him for that purpose."

"When does such payment begin?" Mr. Barracough was asked.

"It probably has begun," he replied, "for last night I sent out 39,000 such blank checks to the treasurers of 21 towns and communities in this State. The partial week from Tuesday to Thursday was thus accounted for."

"Shall you go through similar procedure each week?"

"Not necessary. I shall send out such blank checks only when they are asked for by the community treasurers needing them in accordance with the method described."

for caring for the unemployed on the welfare list.

The Springfield programme, he stated, met with prompt approval of the authorities at Washington, and he is confident that if the city of Springfield filled its blank out Monday the money would be available within the next 24 hours and the men put back to work.

Bay State May Get $7,000,000
Bartlett could give no idea last night—without considerable detail in figuring, just what funds would be available to Massachusetts. Others figured that the amount to be made available to Massachusetts would be in the neighborhood of $7,000,000.

The Federal government is to expend $100,000,000 to put men back to work at once. It will be allotted to the various States on this basis—75 per cent on population and 25 per cent on the number of families on relief rolls. It is all part of the government's plan to transfer 2,000,000 men throughout the country from work relief to full-paid, 30-hour week jobs within the next few days. The directing head of the enterprise for the country is Harry L. Hopkins, who has been appointed civil works administrator for expenditure of the $100,000,000. The ultimate object is to provide work for 4,000,000 men throughout the nation.

Welfare Lists First

Only those on the welfare lists of cities and towns will be available for employment at the outset of the programme. Between Dec. 1 and 15 plans will be put into operation whereby thousands of other men, now unemployed and not on the welfare lists, will be taken into consideration and given employment.

Chairman Bartlett pointed out last night that despite the great difficulty in the past in caring for the so-called "white-collar worker," plans are now being made to care for this group of unemployed, and find positions for them in the new projects to be put into operation.

He made it clear, however, that this group will not be employed in such large numbers as the laborers and artisans. He said it is much easier in most of the projects to find work for the latter type of men.

Tells Officials Get Busy

The jobs will be created in every city and town in Massachusetts, under the plan explained last night by Chairman Bartlett. He stated he has not had an opportunity since his return to confer with the other members of his board, and that he could give but a slight outline of the plans, and will announce the complete details later.

He urged the importance of city and town officials and welfare heads getting busy at once to think up plans whereby the men can be put back to work. The money will be available by the first of the week and the men are ready to work, he explained. All that is left for the heads of Massachusetts cities and towns to conceive the proper type of projects.

The board will be unable to approve projects now under way or other projects such as the removal of snow, the carrying of garbage and ashes. This, Bartlett explained, would ordinarily be cared for by the city and town governments and cannot be considered new projects.

City and town officials are urged to get busy and conceive these projects today, tomorrow and Sunday, in the event the blanks arrive from Washington as anticipated by Monday. Thus the programme can be put into operation at once.

Suggests Types of Projects

The laying of sewers, the installation of water pipes, the repairing of city, town and State roads, work on public parks, civil improvements, the construction of bandstands, building of sidewalks, the improvement of rivers and harbors, the repairing of river banks, are a few of the projects that were suggested last night by Bartlett. As explained by Chairman Bartlett last night the programme from the beginning will follow the following steps, roughly.

ing that the unemployed welfare lists will be degree. He says the work done is a far off being paid a dime. He stated that now welfare lists are received a week. Under the new plan is to be from the present men employed men through payments. They are money—just enough what in caring for. The chairman explained now receiving, say, local welfare department work under the new he will be paid what a fair living wage, as a laborer the minimum paid him is 50 cents.

If it develops that by and that the cents an hour pays, and that this is his family, he will to a higher class of money. Unskilled labor is minimum of 50 cents a labor up to $1.20 a week. If it is of men will be $2.00 a week, and if it is not a question of Bartlett. "Every basis of a fair living wage, these men are employing them and we intend to these funds, that a living wage."

Jobs for Who

Under the many come in for consideration. Bartlett said the social class will find ways to hire stenographers, bookkeepers, architects, draftsmen and others now called "white collar men." They will, in this fashion, be cared for.

"Here is one illustration of how a plan will probably be worked out. Assuming we say to the welfare department of the city of Boston that we will expend $100,000 in some project that has been approved in Boston. The welfare department furnishes the list of men and the men go to work, and they are paid with these government funds."

"It is quite probable that we will expect the welfare department to get $100,000 we saved them to further use for the unemployed on the same basis."

"That is, we can turn to the welfare department and say, 'Here, the city has a project calling for the expenditure of $100,000. We are saving you either this entire amount which you would have to pay out, or we are saving you $85,000. We will put $25,000 to this project and you will give the remaining $75,000.'"

"This will enable us, as you can readily see, to place a great many more thousands back to work."

Must Devise Work Projects

"The thing to stress in this whole programme is the inventive ability of the city and town officials. They must conceive programmes that come within the ruling of this Federal law—it must be a new project, a project that is not already under way."

"It should be comparatively simple for the city and town officials to get busy on such a programme and have their plans in readiness by Monday or Tuesday to fill the blanks out."

"I have been assured by officials in Approximately 100,000 unemployed men in Massachusetts will be put back to work under the government's general public works programme—some of them within a week.

From now until Dec. 1 only those on the city and town welfare lists will be employed.

The rapidity with which men can be put back to work in the various cities and towns of the State depends entirely upon the "inventive genius" of the city and town officials. Provided a city or town already has a programme worked out that is logical and is a new project, the money will be available within the next few days—almost without question by Monday or Tuesday.

Curley Sees Jobs for 1000 in Boston

Mayor Holds Conference on Plans for Using Federal Money

Jobs for at least 1000 men immediately is Mayor Curley's aim under the Washington plan of relieving the welfare departments of cities and towns of the country with an appropriation of $400,000,000. Massachusetts is expected to get $12,000,000. When he reached his City Hall office at noon today he found gathered there, in response to an early morning summons, representatives of the public works, park, assessing, law, auditing, budget and city planning departments, with whom he conferred for nearly two hours on drawing up a program that would total about $4,000,000.

As outlined by the mayor the specific projects would include a survey of the city looking into the future for 100 years, which would require a City Planning Board force of scores of engineers, architects and draughtsmen; a bathing pool development in the park system which would provide a new source of employment in at least fifteen of the playgrounds; an extensive improvement of the bathing beaches and the Strandway, South Boston; and a continuation of the work on the block system for the assessing department, which would mean a doubling of the expert force.

The mayor did not know just how much money would be allotted to Boston, but if the State receives no more than $12,000,000 Boston's share would perhaps not exceed $2,000,000. If so, the number of men that could be employed would not approach the 1000 mark which the mayor was hopeful of reaching. But there is much to be done.

Strandway and the bathing beaches, with the additional work of providing bathing pools in remote sections, the cost will approach $1,500,000. Having successfully prevailed upon the George Robert White Fund trustees to undertake the construction of a Prado in the North End, Mayor Curley is now anxious to build a much longer Prado along the Strandway from Columbus Circle to the L street bathhouse, which would be planted with trees and shrubbery and adorned with grass plots and flower gardens. He would also construct concrete steps leading from the roadway to the wide expanse of beach and increase the bathing facilities in this popular playground.

Another extensive public improvement lies in the smoothing of alleyways all over the city to minimize the dangers from germs in summer and the inconvenience and unsightliness of mud in spring. Many alleys have been paved in the last fifteen years, particularly in the Back Bay, but there are many such bad spots in other sections, breeding places for malarial germs which cannot be kept clean by the city except as the opportunity is afforded to flush them from the hydrants. Whether the mayor can secure money from the special fund to correct these evils is a question. Anyway, in a few weeks there will be several inches of frost in the ground and all street and sewer work will be abandoned.

Then there is the matter of repairs on public buildings, of which Chairman Frank A. Goodwin of the Finance Commission has called attention to the mayor and department heads. Repairs have gone by the board for several years, owing to the necessity of cutting the budget to the bone. As Chairman Goodwin states, "If there is any group in this community which has suffered all during the depression it is made up of workers in the building trades, plumbers, carpenters, masons, and it seems about time to do something for them. Not only that, but a failure to make the necessary repairs is bound to cost the city large sums in the future."

TO SEE THAT WOMEN GET SHARE OF JOBS

Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul Named Director of Civil Works
Administration—Office Being Enlarged

MRS. LOIS B. RANTOUL

Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, a lifelong worker for child and woman welfare, today was appointed director of the women's division of the Civil Works Administration and immediately set about her job of seeing that needy and unemployed women get a slice of the $12,500,000 Federal allotment for work in the Commonwealth.

Announcement of the appointment was made this morning by John T. Scully, director of the State Emergency Relief Administration, in the midst of a madhouse hubbub in his crowded offices at 15 Ashburton pl.

Although the State Civil Works Board was still meeting in room 249 at the State House today, city and town officials and others jammed the offices of the State's Emergency Relief Administration at 15 Ashburton pl. seeking application blanks for Federal allotments and asking thousands of questions of anyone who appeared to have the slightest claims to an official position in the offices.

The confusion was increased by the comings and goings of carpenters who were at work enlarging the offices to make possible a consolidation of the activities of the C. W. A. and the State Relief organization into one office.

A staff of 10 men was working under the direction of director Scully preparing the mass of blanks that must be filled out and rushed through in order to let the emergency work get under way immediately.

Mrs. Rantoul, in speaking of her new job today, said that her chief duty was to make sure that the unemployed women are not overlooked in the rush to put men to work on community projects.

"Of course the problem of the unemployed woman is not so easy to solve as is the one of the unemployed man," Mrs. Rantoul declared. "You can put 1000 men to work immediately in road building projects, but you cannot do the same thing with 1000 unemployed women."

"We will work with existing relief agencies, employment agencies, and cooperative workshops. An added difficulty in meeting the woman's problem is that many desperately needy women are not on the welfare lists. The situation among unemployed domestic servants is particularly acute. I am glad to see that the Boston projects for the expenditure of the city's Federal allotments provide for the employment of a certain number of women, mostly in clerical jobs."

Mrs. Rantoul said that announcement of a staff of women workers to assist her will be announced shortly. As chief of the Women's Ordinance in Boston during the war, and as leader in the activities of the Massachusetts League of Women Voters and the League of Women Trade Union League, Mrs. Rantoul has had wide experience with women's labor problems.

GLOBE, Nov. 25 SENT OUT 39,000 BLANK CHECKS

Herbert Barracough, disbursing officer at the regional office of the United States Veterans' Administration, in the Postoffice Building, this morning described the method of payment of the civil workers wherewith the Veterans' Administration is associated.

"In every community throughout the State," he said, "there is appointed a certifying officer. He prepares a payroll dealing with the work in that community of each civil works man for the week extending from Friday to Thursday."

"That payroll is handed to the treasurer of the community, who has become a sort of deputy to me. It is his job then to fill out, in accordance with the payroll, the blank checks which I have sent to him for that purpose."

"When does such payment begin?" Mr. Barracough was asked.

"It probably has begun," he replied, "for last night I sent out 39,000 such blank checks to the treasurers of 22 towns and communities in this State. The partial week from Tuesday to Thursday was thus accounted for."

"Shall you go through similar procedure each week?"

"Not necessary. I shall send out such blank checks only when they are asked for by the community treasurers needing them in accordance with the method described."

"Come back and ask me any further information you may need. I shall probably be on the job here up to midnight tonight."

Men Back to Work

Joseph W. Bartlett of Newton, chairman of the Municipal Finance Commission, operating under the NRA, returned last night from Washington with plans to call a conference of all city and town officials and welfare leaders at the State House, Monday or Tuesday.

He will outline to these officials the results of the conference at Washington, which was attended by Mayor Curley, Governor Ely and other Massachusetts officials. He expects to have in his possession by the first of the week the necessary blanks from Washington to cover these new projects.

As rapidly as the city and town heads can fill these blanks out and return to the board of which Bartlett is chairman, and they are approved, the money will be made available at once and the work started.

As a specific illustration Chairman Bartlett last night pointed out the city of Springfield. He stated the Mayor of Springfield is attending the Washington conference, and outlined the program now in vogue in Springfield for caring for the unemployed on the welfare list.

The Springfield programme, he stated, met with prompt approval of the authorities at Washington, and he is confident that if the city of Springfield filled its blank out Monday the money would be available within the next 21 hours and the men put back to work.

Bay State May Get $7,000,000

Bartlett could give no idea last night—without considerable detail in figuring just what funds would be available to Massachusetts. Others figured that the amount to be made available to Massachusetts would be in the neighborhood of $7,000,000.

The Federal government is to expend $100,000,000 to put men back to work at once. It will be allotted to the various States on this basis—25 per cent on population and 25 per cent on the number of families on relief rolls.

It is all part of the government's plan to transfer 2,000,000 men throughout the country from work relief to full-paid, 20-hour week jobs within the next few days. The directing head of the enterprise for the country is Harry W. Hopkins, who has been appointed civil works administrator for expenditure of the $100,000,000. The ultimate object is to provide work for 4,000,000 men throughout the nation.

Welfare Lists First

Only those on the welfare lists of cities and towns will be available for employment at the outset of the programme. Between Dec. 1 and 15 plans will be put into operation whereby thousands of other men, now unemployed and not on the welfare lists, will be taken into consideration and given employment.

Chairman Bartlett pointed out last night that despite the great difficulty in the past in caring for the so-called "white-collar worker," plans are now being made to care for this group of unemployed, and find positions for them in the new projects to be put into operation.

He made it clear, however, that this group will not be employed in such large numerical numbers as the laborers and artisans. He said it is much easier in most of the projects to find work for the latter type of men.

Tells Officials Get Busy

The jobs will be created in every city and town in Massachusetts, and the plan explained last night by Chairman Bartlett. He stated he has not had an opportunity since his return to confer with the other members of his board, and that he could give but a slight outline of the plans, and will announce the complete details later.

He urged the importance of city and town officials and welfare heads getting busy at once to think up plans whereby the men can be put back to work. All that is left is for the heads of Massachusetts cities and towns to conceive the proper type of projects.

As explained by Chairman Bartlett last night the programme from the beginning will follow the following steps, roughly.

The heads of city and town governments will conceive of new projects that can be put into operation in their respective communities. They will ing that the unemployed men on the welfare lists will be helped to a real degree. He says that being paid for work done is a far different thing from being paid a dole.

He stated that many men on the welfare lists are receiving but $10 and $12 a week. Under the new plan they would be given in many instances twice this amount, and possibly more.

The method is to pay a fair living wage to all those who are employed. The employment of these men under the new plan is to be divorced entirely from the present method of aiding unemployed men through the welfare departments. They are not to be "given" money—just enough to aid them somewhat in caring for their families.

The chairman explained that if a man now receiving, say $10 a week from his local welfare department is put to work under the new work programme, he will be paid what officials feel to be a fair living wage. If he is employed as a laborer the minimum that can be paid him is 30 cents an hour.

If it develops that he has a large family and that the 20-hour week of 30 cents an hour pays him but $15 a week, and that this is insufficient to care for his family, he will possibly be elevated to a higher class of work, paying more money.

Unskilled labor is to be paid a minimum of 50 cents an hour and skilled labor up to $1.20 an hour. Thousands of men will be scaled between these two classes. If it is found that $15 a week for a laborer is not sufficient to care for his family, this man may well be graduated so that he will receive $20 a week, and so on.

"It must be understood that this is not a question of charity," explained Bartlett. "Everything is to be on the basis of a fair living wage. We are not giving these men money. We are employing them at a fair living wage, and we intend to see, in dispensing these funds, that all men receive a fair living wage."

Jobs for White Collar Class

Under the many projects that will come in for consideration and approval the so-called "white collar class" will find work. It will be necessary to hire stenographers, clerks, bookkeepers, architects, draughtsmen and others now called "white collar men." They will, in this fashion, be cared for.

There is one illustration of how a plan will probably be worked out. Assuming we say to the welfare department of the city of Boston that we will expend $100,000 in some project that has been approved in Boston. The welfare department furnishes the list of men and the men go to work, and they are paid with these government funds.

START PUBLIC WORK TUESDAYs Tuesday

Chairman Bartlett Says Remainder of 97,000 Jobs Will Be Filled as Soon as Projects Are Approved

CIVIL WORKS HEAD RUSHES PLANS
Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the Civil Works Administration for Massachusetts is shown dictating outline of emergency plans to his secretary, Miss Luberia Clause, at the State House yesterday.

Moving with remarkable swiftness, despite technical difficulties, the new State Civil Works Administration got under way yesterday, initiating action that will put 97,000 men to work in this State within a few weeks, and pour a total of approximately $12,000,000 into the depleted coffers of almost every city and town in the Commonwealth.

will be addressed by Governor Joseph B. Ely, the chairman will tell the various community heads that the money is to be spent on public works, and that all works proposed must be authorized by his board.

Subsequent authorization from Washington is technically necessary, but Chairman Bartlett announced that he stands ready to cut red tape to the point where actual work will start as soon as his board gives permission. After that, telegrams will be despatched to Washington to notify federal authorities of the amounts of money involved.

Mayors and other community heads who want part of this sum of money are to be given application blanks at the meeting. If they have projects in mind at that time which meet with the favor of the board, they may be able to actually put men to work the following day.

As previously stated, Bartlett expects at least one city to be so prepared. He declined to name the community or to give details of its plan.

Questions to Be Answered

Each mayor and selectman is to be asked to come to Monday's meeting prepared to answer the following questions:

Hour to a Week by the Authorization of Projects Already Decided Upon

Mayor Curley announced last night, after an all-day conference with city department heads, that Boston could put 2000 men at work on the government's public works programme, within an hour to a week from the receipt of authorization from Washington.

These men will include "white collar" workers, as well as craftsmen and laborers, with a large percentage supplied from the public welfare rolls.

Boston may expect a quota of $3,000,000 from the State's allotment of $12,000,000. In the emergency public works programme, the Mayor said, and of this amount, he believes the city should as a matter of duty, in cooperation with the federal administration, contribute a tenth, or some $300,000, for which a loan may be sought at once to provide tools and equipment for the work projected.

On the scale of wages to be paid, the Mayor said that the ruling of the State administrator of the programme will govern.

Of the 3000 men for whom work will be sought by the city, under authority to be sought through the State administrator and Washington, the Park Department will provide for 1000, the Public Buildings Department will provide for 1000, and the School Construction, Public Buildings and Hospital Departments could provide for the remaining 1000 men.

Work Not Likely for 10 Days

It is not believed that authorization to put men to work will be received for 10 days, the Mayor said. This period includes the wait until Monday when for blanks to be filled out by the city for the State, for action by the State administrator, and then for approval by Washington.

The Park Department can put men to work within an hour of authorization, the Mayor said. The Public Buildings and Hospital Departments will be able to put men to work within 24 hours of receipt of authorization, the Mayor said.

The Welfare Department stands ready to supply almost any number of men for the emergency work, it called upon by the Mayor to do so. The classification by occupation of the recipients of welfare is in such shape that at very short notice this can be accomplished, welfare officials stated last night.

There is little likelihood that any of the welfare appropriation will be turned back to the city for this emergency programme, it was stated, as virtually the entire appropriation will be required to round out the year.

Mayor Calls Meeting

The Mayor in his conference with heads of departments yesterday started the ball rolling on the public works problem as soon as he got back to his desk from Washington. He called for work and asked for suggestions.

At the conclusion of the conference the Mayor announced the city's plans. "The programme as compiled by the city of Boston, contemplates the placing of 2000 men to work," he said. "Of this number, provision has been made to double the force of men now employed in the drafting of a block system of assessment for the city of Boston. For the past 18 months 100 engineers, draftsmen and architects have been employed at this work and the funds immediately available for the remainder of the year will be exhausted on Dec. 2."

"Provided the federal government is willing to make a contribution towards this work, I shall endeavor to provide a portion of the fund out of the reserve fund so that not only the work may continue but the 200 engineers, draftsmen and architects, or the so-called 'white-collar men,' may continue to be employed upon this work until Feb. 15, 1934."

City Planning Work

"The City Planning Board has been working for a period of two years in anticipation of a programme similar to that which has been determined upon by the federal government and are prepared to provide work at once for 100 architects, engineers and draftsmen."

"In every case, technically trained men will be used. The City Planning Board's programme is a comprehensive plan anticipating the development of the city during the next century. This plan would embrace slum removal, highway construction, port development, sewer, water and traffic regulation and housing."

"This work can be started immediately when approval is received from the federal government."

"Additional engineers, architects and draftsmen can be employed in a supervisory capacity to the number of about 100 in the supervision of the construction and work programmes that have been determined upon by the public works department, the park department, the department of schoolhouse construction, public buildings department and the hospital department."

Park Dept. Work

"The Park Department programme contemplates the employment of 1000 men embracing reclamation, grading, construction of parks and playgrounds and recreation, and the establishment of 15 wading pools in various sections of the city for children. The park department programme likewise makes provision for concrete steps the entire length of the Strandway, ballistics, tree planting and a plaza extending from the bridge at Columbia circle to Castle Island, with provision within the plaza for tables and chairs, trees and shrubbery and permanent walks for a distance of more than two miles."

"The Park Department likewise makes provision for a permanent roadway the entire length of the Strandway, a road more than two miles in length with a width of 40 feet. The Park Department also contemplates the reclamation and grading of Tenean Beach, Savin Hill Beach and the various parks throughout the city, including the employment of 150 men for the extension and completion of the golf course at West Roxbury."

Work on Streets

"The Public Works programme provides for the resurfacing and the placing of a smooth surface top on some 250 streets and alleys throughout Boston and upon this portion of the Public Works Department programme, 900 men will be employed."

"The School Department and the Public Buildings Department have agreed to submit their programmes not later than Saturday at 12 noon and between these three departments it is estimated that 1000 men will be required, mostly mechanics, painters, carpenters, masons, plumbers, roof-fitters and heat-ings engineers, as well as electricians."

work straightening out roads and grades in Lynn Woods.

He said that by employing men at 50 cents an hour about $500 would be needed for the project he had outlined and that such employment would lift a great burden from the welfare list.

PLAN TO PUT 700 TO WORK IN QUINCY

A conference of department heads of Quincy will be held this morning to make provisions for the employment of men in projects to be started as soon as the city receives the $80,000 it has asked for under the federal public works programme loan, Mayor Charles A. Ross announced last night.

The money will be used on streets, sewers and drainage. Of the some 100 families on welfare, members of about 20 are capable of working. It is expected that most of these will be taken off the welfare lists and put to work.

ORDERS LIST OF MEDFORD UNEMPLOYED

Mayor John B. Burke, of Medford, who has been in Washington for the past few days, returned yesterday for the public works programme. He prepared a list of the unemployed in Medford requiring repairs to the city's infrastructure.

$80,000 Chelsea Fire Alarm Headquarters

In Chelsea it is planned to construct a fire alarm headquarters on part of the cost of this building will be $80,000 and it is hoped to have federal funds to help erect the structure. The plans for the building will be prepared by Charles A. Conkling, the city engineer, and will be submitted to the State administrator for approval.

$1,400,000 BRIDGE OVER SAUGUS RIVER

In Revere one of the largest undertakings under the national recovery act will be the construction of a new bridge across the Saugus River, to be erected at a cost of $1,400,000, and of which the federal government will pay about one-fourth.

Malden to Study Needs Before Asking Funds

Mayor John D. Tierney of Malden and other city officials will confer today on the advisability of securing funds from the State civil works administration for public works in Malden, he said last night. A careful study of necessary public works must be made before any request for funds is made, Mayor Tierney said.

$12,000,000 to Be Distributed—Communities Consider New Projects

Cities and towns relieved of welfare burdens by federal grants for civil works projects will be required to use part of the savings to put more men to work. This was revealed yesterday as state whipped programs take shape for presentation to the Massachusetts civil works board.

The civil works board is expected to exercise close supervision over welfare expenditures. Communities which object to the supervision will not receive any part of the $12,000,000 which it is estimated Massachusetts will obtain from the federal government.

NOT A PRECEDENT

No precedent will be established by this close scrutiny of welfare projects and expenditures. The state emergency finance board—from which the membership of the civil works board was drawn—now approves the budgets of certain Massachusetts communities which have borrowed from the state, and also has engaged in the welfare phase of government by distributing quantities of meat and wheat sent here by the national government.

Gov. Ely and Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts civil works board, yesterday sent telegrams to mayors, selectmen and welfare agents of the state asking them to attend a meeting Monday at 11:30 A. M. at the Gardner auditorium in the State House.

The civil works idea will be explained by the Governor and Chairman Bartlett. Application blanks will be available and the leaders will be asked to tell where the project is to be, the number of men to be employed and the cost including labor and material.

Both men will point out that the estimated Massachusetts allotment of $12,000,000 from the national civil works fund of $400,000,000 will not be sufficient to keep men at work until Feb. 15, as desired by President Roosevelt, unless the leaders co-operate by using some welfare money to continue the work.

NO FAST RULE

For many projects where the cost of labor and materials is about equal, the civil works board will provide the labor and the city or town the materials. There will be no hard and fast rule, but the communities will be expected to provide at least 50 cents for each dollar of the federal grant, if financially able.

That the state will ask an allotment was pointed out that many artisans would be given employment.

Mayor George E. Dalrymple of Haverhill, who attended the Washington conference, visited the civil works board yesterday and said he would ask $25,000 for sewer construction. In Haverhill later in the day he conferred with Alderman James M. Costello, head of the Haverhill welfare department, regarding elimination of delays. Fully 150 men could be put to work Monday, the mayor said, and 500 in all if certain projects are approved.

Mayor Dalrymple would use city welfare funds for the work also. The Haverhill projects include wading pools, swimming pool, skating rink, extension of the water system to outlying districts, installation of new fire hydrants, general improvements of the park system, repairs to school and fire houses and improvement of roads in rural territory.

Town Manager H. H. Everett of Mansfield telegraphed the board that the town has projects ready which will require 80 men to complete.

A conference of Quincy department heads was called for this morning by Mayor Charles A. Ross of that city. His projects total $680,000, but some are included in the public works program. Most of the civil works projects of Quincy are street repairs and sewer drainage.

A new highway in Lynn to connect the Salem and Newburyport turnpikes, to provide work for 500 men, was advanced by Mayor Fred J. Manning of Lynn after a conference with City Engineer Frank E. Gowdy. Extension of Market street, from Broad street to Nahant road, is another project of the mayor.

Outside Massachusetts executives were getting programs together. Gov. Louis J. Brann of Maine told The Herald last night that he plans to use the federal money to build a small bridge, erection of a small schoolhouse, continuing the water works or sewer system, mosquito elimination, and similar items. We intend to engage in those projects which have an element of permanency."

Gov. Brann had not been notified of the amount his state will be allotted, but he felt it would be more than $800,000.

SOMERVILLE ALDERMEN AGAIN OPPOSE PROGRAM

Balk at $1,500,000 Works Project Favored by Murphy

The Somerville board of aldermen, meeting for the fourth time this week and under a threat to be called into session every night in the week in the future, again refused last night to approve a public works program totalling $1,500,000, which Mayor John J. Murphy would like to put in motion before his successor takes office in January.

Mayor Murphy before last night's meeting threatened to "expose" the board of aldermen if on that occasion it refused to make the necessary appropriation which would make Somerville eligible for state and federal assistance in the program.

The opinion expressed by a majority of members of the board is that it is no time to approve such a program when a new mayor is to take office in six weeks. The board has approved 14 projects totalling $1,500,000 but has held back on appropriation of the sum necessary to receive the balance from the state and federal governments.

2 SPRINGFIELD PROJECTS APPROVED

[Special Dispatch to The Herald]

SPRINGFIELD, Nov. 17.—The federal government today approved two major public works projects in Springfield toward which it will contribute a total of $222,000. The first is the widening and improving of Boston road, at a cost of $196,000 to be paid entirely by the federal government, and the second is the Technical High school addition, for which the government will grant $96,000, representing 50 per cent. of the labor and material costs.

GLOBE - Nov. 19 GIVE THOUSANDS WORK TUESDAY

Start on $12,000,000 Government Gift

Boston to Have 3500 Positions, Nearly 100,000 in State

Slashing through all red tape, officials in Washington and Massachusetts yesterday completed a set-up of machinery which will permit thousands of men to start work Tuesday morning on the $12,000,000 civil public works program authorized by the Federal Government for Massachusetts. Nearly 100,000 unemployed men will be put to work under this emergency plan.

The $12,000,000 allotted to Massachusetts is an outright gift and it is expected it will take only a few hours to approve some of the plans which will be presented for Massachusetts. Board of Civil Works tomorrow afternoon during the conference it will measure to provide work for the unemployed is comparable only with wartime measures.

First Those on Relief Work

No city or community will have to advance a penny in order to get their share of the gift. Unskilled labor will be paid 50 cents an hour and skilled artisans will receive $1.20 an hour.

The $12,000,000 will be distributed as follows:

The sum of $9,000,000 will be allocated to the various cities, towns and counties in proportion that their population bears to the population of the entire State.

The sum of $3,000,000 will be distributed according to the proportion of the total relief case load of the State that each city and county carries.

A telegram received in Boston yesterday directs that workers shall be selected as follows:

First—Those now engaged in relief work, regardless of the percentage of the total allotment this may reach.

Second—Additional direct relief cases up to 50 percent of the total allotment.

Third—All additional employees to be selected through the reemployment service the Federal and State Government has already set up.

$3,000,000 Boston's Share

Unemployed men, who are not on welfare lists, are advised to register at the State or Federal re-employment offices in their city or town.

The Massachusetts Board of Civil Works is headed by Joseph W. Bartlett, and includes State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley and William B. Cox.

Mayor Curley announced yesterday that a total of $3,000,000 of the $12,000,000 would be expended in Boston and that some 3500 workers would be given employment in Boston. He said that hundreds of men would be put to work this week, or on Tuesday if the projects he will present are approved tomorrow.

"The Hospital Department has asked for 400 men, such as painters and plumbers," the Mayor said last night.

"The Public Buildings Department has asked for 500 men, including many roofers. The School Department needs at least 200 men. These projects are ready immediately. We will have these or many of them, at work this Barlett's secretary, Miss Lorraine M. Crause, sent telegrams yesterday to heads of the welfare boards of all Massachusetts communities, notifying them that they are appointed, ex-officio, local agents of the board. They will be charged with putting men to work, primarily from their welfare rolls. They will handle no money.

At the same time when were sent to all Mayors and chairmen of boards of aldermen, as well as the welfare boards, requesting their presence at a meeting at the state house on Monday at noon, at which the plan will be outlined and application blanks for aid will be distributed.

The plan is not as yet perfected, due to technical difficulties, but, as explained by chairman Barlett yesterday, this is essentially the substance of the whole matter:

Outlines of Plan

The money, amounting to approximately $200,000 in this state, is a gift—not a loan—from the federal government.

Through the Civil Works Administration, which is the law by which Mr. Barlett's board will be officially known, this money is to be distributed as equitably as possible, to the various communities of the state.

Then men to be employed are to be recruited, for a while at least, from the welfare rolls of the individual communities. Unskilled laborers will be paid a minimum of 50 cents an hour; skilled labor will be paid a minimum of $1.20 an hour.

Chairman Barlett emphasized that these figures are not flat and final except that they are the least amounts that will be paid. How much higher wages may be paid to some workers is not yet established.

To Cut Red Tape for Speed

An attempt is to be made to distribute this money as equitably as possible. At the meeting on Monday, which will be addressed by Governor Joseph R. Ely, the chairman will tell the various community heads that the money is to be spent on public works, and that all works proposed must be authorized by his board.

Subsequent authorization from Washington is technically necessary, but chairman Barlett announced that he grants ready to cut red tape to the point where actual work will start as soon as his board gives permission. After that, telegrams will be despatched to Washington to notify federal authorities of the amounts of money involved.

Mayors and other community heads who want part of this sum of money are to be given application blanks at the meeting. If they have projects in mind at that time which meet with the favor of the board, they may be able to actually put men to work the following day.

As previously stated, Barlett expects at least one city to be so prepared. He declined to name the community or to give details of its plan.

Questions to Be Answered

Each mayor and selectman is to be asked to come to Monday's meeting prepared to answer the following questions:

1. How many men are on the welfare rolls in your community?

Ely Calls Conference

To explain this, a conference of state department heads was called yesterday by Governor Ely, who instructed Secretary Robert F. Bradford to outline the plan. The department chiefs will be asked to submit applications early in the week.

Plenty of confusion was evident yesterday in various parts of the state as Mayors in some places misunderstood the scheme. There were some who stated they were not interested because they did not understand that the money is a gift from the government, and not a loan.

City Solicitor Edmund L. Twomey advised Mayor Richard M. Russell of Cambridge that he considers the whole plan "illegal" on the grounds that it violates the civil service laws.

Chairman Barlett's only reply to this was: "Too bad!"

WORKS FOR BOSTON

Mayor Curley Says 3000 Men Could Be Put to Work Here in From an Hour to a Week by the Authorization of Projects Already Decided Upon

Mayor Curley announced last night, after an all-day conference with city department heads, that Boston could put 3000 men at work on the government's public works programme, within an hour to a week from the receipt of authorization from Washington.

"These men will include 'white collar' workers, as well as craftsmen and laborers, with a large percentage supplied from the public welfare rolls," Boston may expect a quota of $2,000,000 from the state's allotment of $12,000,000 in the emergency public works programme, the Mayor said, and of this amount, he believes the city should ask a matter of duty in co-operation with the federal administration contribute a tenth, or some $200,000, for which a loan may be sought at once to provide tools and equipment for the work projected.

On the scale of wages to be paid, the Mayor said that the ruling of the State administrator of the programme will govern.

Of the 3000 men for whom work will be sought by the city, under authority to be sought through the State administrator and Washington, the Park Department will provide for 1000, the Public Works Department will provide for 1000, and the School Construction, Public Buildings and Hospital Departments could provide for the remaining 1000 men.

Work Not Likely for 10 Days

It is not believed that authorization to put them to work will be received for 10 days, the Mayor said. This employed in the drafting of a check system of assessment for the city of Boston. For the past 18 months, 100 engineers, draftsmen and architects have been employed at this work and the funds immediately available for the remainder of the year will be exhausted on Dec. 2.

"Provided the federal government is willing to make a contribution towards this work, I shall endeavor to provide a portion of the fund out of the reserve fund so that not only the work may continue but the 200 engineers, draftsmen and architects, or the so-called 'white-collar men,' may continue to be employed upon this work until Feb. 15, 1934.

City Planning Work

"The City Planning Board has been working for a period of two years in anticipation of a programme similar to that which has been determined upon by the federal government and are prepared to provide work at once for 100 architects, engineers and draftsmen.

"In every case, technically trained men will be used. The City Planning Board's programme is a comprehensive plan anticipating the development of the city during the next century. This plan would embrace slum removal, highway construction, port development, sewer, water and traffic regulation and housing.

"This work can be started immediately when approval is received from the federal government.

"Additional engineers, architects and draftsmen can be employed in a supervisory capacity to the number of about 100 in the supervision of the construction and work programmes that have been determined upon by the public works department, the park department, the department of schoolhouse construction, public buildings department and the hospital department.

Park Dept. Work

"The Park Department programme contemplates the employment of 1000 men embracing reclamation, grading and development of parks and playgrounds and cemeteries and the establishment of 15 wading pools in various sections of the city for children. The Park Department programme likewise makes provision for concrete steps the entire length of the Strandway, balustrades, tree planting and a plaza extending from the bridge at Columbia Circle to Castle Island, with provision within the plaza for tables and chairs, trees and shrubbery and permanent walks for a distance of more than two miles.

"The Park Department likewise makes provision for a permanent roadway the entire length of the Strandway, a road more than two miles in length with a width of 40 feet. The Park Department also contemplates the reclamation and grading of Taneau Beach, Savin Hill Beach and the various parks throughout the city, including the employment of 150 men for the extension and completion of the golf course at West Roxbury.

Work on Streets

"The Public Works programme provides for the scarifying and the placing of a smooth surface top on some 200 streets and alleys throughout Boston and upon this portion of the Public Works Department programme, 500 men will be employed.

"The School Department and the Public Buildings Department as well as the Hospital Department have arranged to submit their programmes not later than Saturday at 12 noon and between these three departments it is estimated that about 1000 men will be required, mostly mechanics, painters, carpenters, masons, plumbers and gas-fitters and heating engineers, as well as electricians."

1000 IN CAMBRIDGE

Plans Ready to Start Work as Soon as Federal Money Arrives—Number Given Work May Reach 2000, Mayor Says

Cambridge is prepared to put from 1000 to 2000 men to work on public works projects as soon as the federal money is received by the city, Mayor Russell stated yesterday afternoon. A public works programme of $500,000 has been worked out by the planning board and approved by the Mayor and City Council, and the planning board is ready to submit additional plans if more money is forthcoming, the Mayor said.

The projects which the Mayor said can be launched immediately, are the modernization of the sewer system by installing a complete system of "storm sewers"; the enlargement of water mains, mainly in North Cambridge, and the widening and reconstruction of Concord avenue, between Alewife Brook Parkway and the Belmont line.

"Few of the 'white collar' class can hope to benefit by the public works programmes as limited by the federal stipulations," the Mayor said. "They will have to take off their white collars if they hope to get work, as most of it will be of the manual kind," the Mayor commented.

LYNN WORKS

Mayor Manning Says He Has Projects Ready to Employ 1000 Men

Lynn has plans to put 1000 men to work immediately if the necessary money for public projects can be obtained from the federal government, night, Mayor J. Fred Manning stated last night.

He announced he could put 500 to 600 men to work carrying out some of the sewerage and surface drainage, a survey of which he had already made.

Another 300 could be employed putting to rough grade such proposed thoroughfares as Parkland avenue to connect Walnut street and Lynnfield street, westerly of Pine Grove cemetery, other proposed streets in the Indian Hill area near Lynn Woods. He figured another batch of 200 can be put to work straightening out roads and grades in Lynn Woods.

He said that by employing men at 50 cents an hour about 1000 men would be needed for the summer he had outlined and that such employment would lift a great burden from the welfare rolls.

PLAN TO PUT 700 TO WORK IN QUINCY

A conference of department heads of Quincy will be held this morning to make provisions for the employment of 700 men in projects to be started as soon as the city receives the money it has asked for under the federal public works programme from Mayor Charles A. Ross announced last night.

The money will be used on streets, sewers and drainage, of the some 100 families on welfare, members of about 1000 families of workers. It is expected that most of these will be taken off the welfare lists and put to work.

ORDERS LIST OF MEDFORD UNEMPLOYED

Mayor John H. Burke, of Medford, who has been working to get a list of the unemployed in the city, by telephone, has secured a list of 1000 names of unemployed men in the city, and a list of 1000 names requiring relief.

$80,000 Chelsea Fire Alarm Headquarters

In Chelsea it is planned to construct a fire alarm headquarters on part of the Chelsea City Hall lot. The probable cost of this building will be $80,000 and it is hoped to have federal funds to help erect the structure. The plans provide for the use of welfare workers on this construction job, of course skilled and technical men will be required to do the electrical work, which is to be carried on under the direction of City Electrician Edward J. McMahon.

$1,400,000 BRIDGE OVER SAUGUS RIVER

In Revere one of the largest undertakings under the national recovery act will be the construction of a bridge across the Saugus River, to be erected at a cost of $1,400,000, and of which the federal government will pay about one-fourth.

Malden to Study Needs Before Asking Funds

Mayor John D. Devere of Malden and other city officials will confer today on the advisability of securing funds from the State civil works administration for public works in Malden, he said last night. A careful study of necessary public works must be made before any request for funds is made, Mayor Devere said.

MELROSE TO EXTEND SEWERAGE SYSTEM

Extensions in the sewerage system through the southern section of Melrose and the covering of several open brooks will be the opening moves of a programme designed to put welfare recipients to work, Mayor Robert A. Perkins announced last night. The plans to request about $300,000 for these projects and will take full advantage of the federal offer, he said.

ROAD REPAIRS AND PARK IMPROVEMENTS

Road repairs and public park improvements will be the first items considered in the task of putting welfare recipients back to work under the State civil works administration's programme, Mayor Michael C. O'Neill said last night as he began consideration of the problem.

Mayor Curley, back from Washington yesterday, called a conference, which was attended by the board of assessors, Walter V. McCarthy, executive secretary of the welfare department; Park Commissioner William P. Long, Public Works Commissioner Christopher J. Carven, Budget Commissioner James McGuire, City Auditor Rupert S. Carven, Miss Elizabeth Herlihy, secretary of the city planning board, and Chairman Theodore A. Glynn, John O'Callaghan and Charles F. Hogan of the street commission.

At the end of the conference the mayor issued a statement in which he said that Boston can put 3000 men to work at once. Funds to pay 100 engineers, draftsmen and architects engaged in a new assessing system for Boston will run out Dec. 2 and the mayor plans to keep the men if given money by the federal government and hire an additional 100 from the reserve fund to speed the work.

The park department would take 1000 men for work embracing reclamation, grading and developing parks, playgrounds and cemeteries, and the establishment of 15 wading pools in various sections of the city for children.

He plans concrete steps for the South Boston strandway, balustrades, tree planting and a plaza extending from Columbia circle to Castle Island, with provision within the plaza for tables and chairs, trees and shrubbery and a permanent walk of two miles in length.

Also a permanent roadway the length of the strandway. Other reclamation projects would be started at Taneau and Savin Hill beaches and various parks, and the employment of 150 men to complete the West Roxbury golf course.

The public works program of the city provides for the scarifying and smooth surfacing of 250 streets and alleys of Boston, this work to utilize 900 men. With an additional 100 required for work of extending water mains now dead-ended. The school and public works department will have their programs ready to report to the mayor by noon today. It is estimated they will require at least 1000 men, Mayor Curley asked that the civil works board set the rate of pay to prevent squabbling.

Chairman Frank A. Goodwin of the Boston finance commission urged that repair work on public buildings, discontinued for reasons of economy except in emergency cases, be resumed. He pointed out that many artisans would be given employment.

Mayor George E. Dalrymple of Haverhill, who attended the Washington conference, visited the civil works board yesterday and said he would ask $25,000 for sewer construction. In Haverhill later in the day he conferred with Alderman James M. Costello, head of the engineering department. Gov. Louis J. Brain of Maine told The Herald last night that he plans to use 20,000 men. The Governor has called a conference of city and town officials of eastern Maine for tomorrow, and for western Maine Monday, at which the civil works program will be discussed. He continued:

"We will have to concentrate on the most available projects, which may be the building of roads, construction of a small bridge, erection of a small schoolhouse, continuing the water works or sewer system, mosquito elimination, and similar items. We intend to engage in those projects which have an element of permanency."

Gov. Brann had not been notified of the amount his state will be allotted, but he felt it would be more than $800,000.

SOMERVILLE ALDERMEN AGAIN OPPOSE PROGRAM

Balk at $1,500,000 Works Project Favored by Murphy

The Somerville board of aldermen, meeting for the fourth time this week, and under a threat to be called into session every night in the week in the future, again refused last night to approve a public works program totalling $1,500,000, which Mayor John J. Murphy would like to put in motion before his successor takes office in January.

Mayor Murphy before last night's meeting threatened to "expose" the board of aldermen if on that occasion it refused to make the necessary appropriation which would make Somerville eligible for state and federal assistance in the program.

The opinion expressed by a majority of members of the board is that it is no time to approve such a program when a new mayor is to take office in six weeks. The board has approved 14 projects totalling $1,500,000 but has held back on appropriation of the sum necessary to receive the balance from the state and federal governments.

2 SPRINGFIELD WORKS PROJECTS APPROVED

(Special Dispatch to The Herald) SPRINGFIELD, Nov. 17.—The federal government today approved two major public works projects in Springfield toward which it will contribute a total of $292,000. The first is the widening and improving of Boston road, at a cost of $196,000 to be paid entirely by the federal government, and the second is the Technical High school addition, for which the government will grant $96,000, representing 30 per cent of the labor and material costs.

First Those on Relief Work

No city or community will have to advance a penny in order to get their share of the gift. Unskilled labor will be paid 50 cents an hour and skilled artisans will receive $1.20 an hour.

The $12,000,000 will be distributed as follows:

The sum of $9,000,000 will be allocated to the various cities, towns and counties in proportion that their population bears to the population of the entire state.

The sum of $3,000,000 will be distributed according to the proportion of the total relief case load of the State that each city and county carries.

A telegram received in Boston yesterday directs that workers shall be selected as follows:

First—Those now engaged in relief work, regardless of the percentage of the total allotment this may reach.

Second—Additional direct relief cases up to 50 percent of the total allotment.

Third—All additional employees to be selected through the reemployment service the Federal and State Government has already set up.

$3,000,000 Boston's Share

Unemployed men, who are not on welfare lists, are advised to register at the State or Federal re-employment offices in their city or town.

The Massachusetts Board of Civil Works is headed by Joseph W. Bartlett, and includes State Treasurer Charles F. Hurdley and William B. Coy. Mayor Curley announced yesterday that a total of $3,000,000 of the $12,000,000 would be expended in Boston and that some 3500 workers would be given employment in Boston. He said that hundreds of men would be put to work this week, or on Tuesday if the projects he will present are approved tomorrow.

"The Hospital Department has asked for 400 men, such as painters and plumbers," the Mayor said last night.

"The Public Buildings Department has asked for 200 men, including many roofers. The School Department needs at least 200 men. These projects are ready immediately. We will have these many of them, at work this

OFFICIALS SPEEDING UP WORKS

Cities and Towns Can Have Projects Considered Tomorrow

Those cities and towns in Massachusetts that fail to have at least a percentage of their unemployed men working within a few days under the new federal civil works programme can look to their officials for the answer—probably failure on their part to draft speedily a programme that meets with the approval of the State Civil Works Board.

SPEEDING UP PLANS

This was the feeling yesterday of officials directing the activities of the new $12,500,000 civil works programme in this State as they worked together in cutting red tape and setting up the machinery for putting $7,000 men in this State back in the ranks of the wage earners.

They pointed out that the objective is to put unemployed men back to work—and without delay, and that in order to facilitate this the federal government has authorized the slashing of considerable red tape. The initiative must be taken by the officials of the municipalities of Massachusetts.

Plans were completed last night for the meeting at the State House tomorrow noon of all the Mayors, welfare officers and town heads of every community in the State. At this meeting will be the officials of the State Civil Works Board, Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman; Charles F. Hurley and William E. Coy, as well as Governor Ely.

Ready to Consider Projects

Both the Governor and Chairman Bartlett will outline what transpired at the Washington conference, the duties of the newly created board and what is expected of the city and town heads.

The meeting will then be thrown open for the city and town officials to place before the board their proposed projects in their respective communities. Officials stated that it is more than probable that those projects which are clearly and concisely drawn, and obviously acceptable to the board, may be approved at this meeting.

This would permit of the hiring of many of the unemployed Tuesday, so that by Saturday such men would have approximately a week's wages coming to them.

Mayors Discuss Works

Vote That Only Those on Welfare Lists on Nov. 16 Would Be Selected for Relief Work

The Mayors' Club of Massachusetts, in one of the sessions of its history at the Parker House, yesterday discussed the administration programme to put 57,000 men to work in this State this winter.

It voted to make clear that, while the first quota of relief work will go to men taken from city and town public welfare lists, only those who were on such welfare lists prior to Nov. 16 shall be given the relief employment.

This was to prevent a rush to the already overburdened welfare rolls, in the popular idea that only by being on such rolls could the new emergency work be procured.

The Mayors' Club was called into special session to discuss the Civil Works Administration project, as affecting cities and towns. And discussion became so heated that something of a warlike discussion of the issue it was.

The principal argument was over the question of whether the new work should be given to men on welfare lists or to men on the city and town public welfare lists. The argument was over the question of whether the new work should be given to men on welfare lists or to men on the city and town public welfare lists.

ning of Ely and Mayor Richard M. Russell of Cambridge retired to a corner to confer in relative privacy.

To Wait for State House Meeting

Much of the session was in secret, with the mayors receiving an outline of the government's plans as brought back from Washington by Mayor Casassa. At its conclusion, discussion continued with the upshot that many mayors decided to wait for tomorrow's conference at the State House, when State Civil Works Administrator Joseph W. Bartlett will explain the provisions of the Civil Works enterprise to mayors and selectmen from all Massachusetts cities and towns.

Mayor Curley of Boston participated in the discussion for a time, but left early for another engagement. It was explained that there will be a federal agency in each city and town to supervise the selection of men to be put to work on relief projects between now and Feb. 15.

The fear that a general and erroneous idea that only welfare men could get work would lead to a rush to welfare rolls, increasing them as much as 50 per cent in some estimates, led to the adoption of the city's resolution making it plain that only men on welfare prior to last Thursday will be eligible.

BOSTON COULD PUT 3500 MEN TO WORK

The city of Boston can make work available for 3500 men—or 500 more than was estimated Friday night—Mayor Curley announced at city hall yesterday, if the projects are approved. The work, if and when the Civil Works Administration starts it here, will include all classes of men, from the "white collar" type, through the crafts and trades, to the common laborer, the Mayor said.

He received more detailed reports from the departments of school construction, public buildings and hospitals, specifying in more complete detail the character of the jobs to be made. These included, in these departments alone, carpenters in 15 school buildings, painters in 73 school buildings, electricians in 30, plumbers in 31, roofers in 25, steamfitters in 30, masons and laborers in 49, besides similar trades in public buildings and hospital structures. There was also listed work in refitting furniture, plastering, lawns and grounds, elevator repairs, iron work, curtain repairs, cleaning buildings with acid, glazing, and relief firemen and engineers.

The Mayor said that the work for 2500 men in Boston was sufficient to keep them employed from the moment it was authorized by Washington, in Feb. 15, the present date of the expiration of the Civil Works programme.

10,000 TO GET JOBS IN WEEK

State Works Board Is Waiting Only for Cities to Act

ORGANIZATION READY TO LAUNCH PROJECTS

Federal Plan to Be Outlined at Today's Conference

With the complete personnel of the State Civil Works Administration organized and Governor Ely personally prepared to launch the work, indications were last night that 10,000 men at present unemployed will be working in various parts of Massachusetts by the end of this week.

Communities have already completed plans for various projects, and will be ready to ask for authorization to go ahead with them at once. The board is ready to grant all such requests at once, taking them in order, and granting authorization as soon as the members of the board are satisfied that the projects are worthy.

Chairman Bartlett has stated that every effort will be made by his board to act fairly, in order that every city or town which wants some of the governmental gift for a worthy project or projects will be accommodated.

Prime Object

The prime object of the board is to get as many unemployed men to work as possible, in view of the fact that no work is guaranteed beyond Feb. 15, and because of the advent of cold weather. Governor Ely's address will be the principal feature of the meeting of mayors and selectmen today, and it was intimated yesterday that he will mince no words.

Though he himself declined to make any statement as to just what he will say, it was learned that he will probably place direct responsibility for early action under this new plan on the heads of the various communities.

Nothing official as to specific projects is forthcoming before this afternoon, but it is known that several cities are ready to start work immediately, soon as authorized.

Springfield and Worcester, for instance, already have men from their welfare rolls at work on city projects. These men will continue to work, it is expected, but they will be transferred from the welfare lists to the Civil Works payroll. This does not mean, necessarily, that any new men will go to work at once in these cities, but it does mean that a large part of the cities' welfare burden will be lifted for the time being, and they will be able to devote the savings to other subjects.

97,000 in Few Weeks

Haverhill has a $25,000 sewer project already planned, and though an official prediction is authorized, the possibility is strong that it will be approved this afternoon and men will go to work on it tomorrow, or Wednesday at the latest.

A total of 97,000 men will go to work under this new plan within a few weeks, possibly within three weeks, Chairman Bartlett was unable to make any definite prediction last night as to just how soon all the recommended projects will be authorized.

It was pointed out that in those cases where men are now working on welfare projects, their transfer from city or town welfare rolls will result in an increase for all. The minimum amount to be paid to all workers for this work will be 50 cents an hour for unskilled labor and $1.20 an hour for skilled labor.

Ely Urges Speed as Jobless Meet

Boston Will Get
$2,533,500 Share

Chairman Bartlett announced that the State Civil Works Board had prepared a list of estimated allotments totaling $8,452,900 to various cities and towns. In response to the request of Mayor Lawrence P. Quigley of Chelsea, the Civil Works chairman read the list of the different cities as follows:

Boston	$2,533,500
Brockton	173,000
Attleboro	65,600
Beverly	66,800
Chelsea	140,900
Fall River	316,900
Fitchburg	133,800
Haverhill	153,000
Holyoke	146,400
Lawrence	197,900
Lowell	263,500
New Bedford	292,300
Revere	104,900
Springfield	449,000
Worcester	542,600
Waltham	115,000
Quincy	200,200
Northampton	67,500

will supervise the program to be carried out in Massachusetts under the National civil works program to provide employment for 4,000,000 men throughout the country.

Seated with the governor at the speakers' table, behind huge piles of blue forms which are to be distributed among the city and town officials, filled out by them and returned to the civil works board for approval, were Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the State Civil Works Board, and his associate, State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, Mayor James M. Curley of Boston, and the chief executives of virtually all cities in this vicinity were present to hear the program explained by the governor and Chairman Bartlett.

The governor emphasized the importance of immediate action to take advantage of the Federal funds which will be allotted to Massachusetts and which, it is estimated, will amount to $12,500,000 on the basis of employment to be provided for 57,000 persons now without jobs. The governor appealed to the city and town officials to face the task generously and without petty bickering over details. It was the desire of both the Federal and the State governments, he declared, "to cut red tape and provide jobs as quickly as possible."

The governor said there were bound to be some inequalities in carrying out the plan, but he urged the representatives of the various cities and towns to give their utmost co-operation to make the program successful and "to carry the people safely through the coming winter." The governor pointed to the necessity of choosing projects to be undertaken under the civil works program which, "in the minds of those called upon to do it, will mean work worth while."

In opening his address, the governor spoke briefly of the conference of governors and mayors which he attended in Washington last week when the civil works program was announced. He described the conference as an "old-fashioned town meeting" for the purpose of formulating plans for relieving unemployment and explained that the mayors and selectmen of Massachusetts had now been called together to further the program.

The governor said he had "no fault to find with putting into effect a national program of public works," pointing out that the inauguration of public works on a large scale required much time for planning and preparation. Under a general public works program, he explained, it would not have been possible to put men to work before winter, so the administration had decided to take $400,000,000 from the Federal public works fund and make it available to communities throughout the country so that communities could use the funds on local projects without delay and work could be provided for persons on the welfare rolls.

A census of the welfare lists, the Governor said, showed that more than 350,000 persons in Massachusetts were receiving financial assistance and approximately 106,000 working men were "on the dole." It was the object of the civil works plan, the Governor said, to put as many of these men to work at once. The Government, he said, had not granted Massachusetts a fixed allotment of funds, but would provide sufficient money to give work to 97,000 in this State.

"I hope a large percentage will be working before the week is over," the Governor said.

It was his understanding, the governor continued, that one-half of the 97,000 to be given employment throughout the State would be taken from the welfare

While Governor Ely was urging a gathering of 1200 mayors, selectmen and other officials of the Commonwealth to make every effort to place 100,000 unemployed men at work, under conditions made possible by the Federal civil works program, and telling them to cut red tape so as to expedite matters, thousands of hopeful but somewhat confused jobless men swarmed about the State House, Boston's city hall and municipal buildings of other communities, thinking that immediate relief was coming.

A crowd estimated to number from 1500 to 2000 milled about the State employment office, on Congress street. Fully 2000 others flocked to the State House, apparently in the belief that the work for 100,000 men would be distributed there.

At City Hall Annex there were at least 500 unemployed men gathered in the search for gainful employment, evidently under the impression that Boston's allotment of work would be given out at that point.

At Lowell, 2500 unemployed men swarmed about the office of the high-an projects, he explained, must be done by day labor and not by contract, and must be submitted to the civil works administrator, who, in turn, will submit them to the State civil works board for approval.

The work would be thirty hours a week, except for administrative and supervising forces and no person under sixteen would be employed. The rate of wages would be fifty cents an hour for unskilled labor and $1.20 an hour for skilled labor. The Boston office of the United States Veterans' Bureau will be the disbursing agency for the funds allotted to Massachusetts.

He announced that the State civil offices in the Ford Building, Ashburton place, where the members will receive the applications of the communities.

Curley Speaks

Mayor Curley was the first of the mayors present to express any views regarding the proposed civil works program. He pointed out that under the regulations from Washington no part of the money to be allocated could be used for removal of snow, ashes or garbage, and that the character of the work would be limited to repairs of buildings, park improvements and similar projects.

He expressed the opinion that these restrictions would make it impossible to carry out major street or sewer construction, and would confine the work to minor projects. He said he felt that the widest latitude should be permitted the communities and was informed by Chairman Bartlett that the State Board would give consideration to any projects the mayor had planned, and would grant authority for them if they were warranted.

Senator Joseph A. Langone of Boston suggested that some of the funds be used for hospital construction. He declared that every city and town should have a municipal hospital and should not be dependent upon private hospitals. Chairman Bartlett explained that the Civil Works Board had no authority to approve hospital building projects. When Senator Langone attempted to speak further, he was interrupted by others seeking the floor, and he remarked, "I ex-

They pointed out that the objective is to put unemployed men back to work without delay, and that in order to facilitate this the federal government has authorized the slushing of considerable real tape. The initiative must be taken by the officials of the municipalities of Massachusetts.

Plans were considered last night for the meeting at the State House tomorrow noon of all the Mayors, welfare officers and town heads of every community in the State. At this meeting will be the officials of the State Civil Works Board, Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman, Charles F. Hurley and William E. Cox, as well as Governor

Ready to Consider Projects

Both the Governor and Chairman Bartlett will outline what transpired at the Washington conference, the duties of the newly created board and what is expected of the city and town heads.

The meeting will then be thrown open for the city and town officials to place before the board their proposed projects in their respective communities. Officials stated that it is more probable that those projects which are clearly and concisely drawn, and obviously acceptable to the board, may be approved at this meeting.

This would permit of the hiring of many of the unemployed Tuesday, so that by Saturday such men would have approximately a week's wages coming to them.

Mayors Discuss Works

Vote That Only Those on Welfare Lists on Nov. 16 Would Be Selected for Relief Work

The Mayors' Club of Massachusetts, in one of the warmest sessions of its history at the Parker House, yesterday discussed the administration programme to put 50,000 men to work in this State this winter.

It voted to make clear that, while the first quotas of relief work will go to men taken from city and town public welfare lists, only those who were on such welfare prior to Nov. 16 shall be given the relief employment.

This was to prevent a rush to the already overcrowded welfare rolls, in the popular idea that only by being on such rolls could the new emergency work be procured.

The Mayors' Club was called into special session to discuss the Civil Works Administration project, as affecting cities and towns. And discussion became so heated that something of a struggle developed by the time it was ended.

The principal argument was over the government's plan to allot the work on a certain population and need basis and give the Civil Works Administration the discretion of splitting up the work for the cities and towns in accordance with his own information of local necessity. Opponents of the proposition adhered to conviction that the Washington proposition for this State on a population and need basis, should carry right through to the municipalities without change.

The discussion became so hot that at one point, when the confusion of voices grew so loud that quiet discussion was difficult, Mayor George J. Bates of Salem, Mayor J. Fred Mann-made three proposals to the board: (1) that the government should select buildings, primarily in the slums, for the use of the unemployed; (2) that the government should select buildings for the use of the unemployed; (3) that the government should select buildings for the use of the unemployed.

The Mayor said that his work for 250 men in Boston was sufficient to keep them employed from the moment it was authorized by Washington to Feb. 15, the present date of the expiration of the Civil Works program.

they are 100 per cent ready to receive applications for funds from communities which want to share in the government gift and put men to work.

"At 11:30 in the morning, we will meet the Mayor and the chairman of boards of selectmen at the State House. We will outline the government plan, as it was outlined to us at Washington. Application blanks for money will be ready. It will then be strictly up to the Mayor and the selectmen," Chairman Bartlett announced last night.

"We stand ready to accept and act on applications as soon as that meeting is over, and to work to hours a day at it until this whole work is under way."

It was learned that a number of communities have already completed plans for various projects, and will be ready to ask for authorization to go ahead with them at once. The board is ready to grant all such requests at once, taking them in order, and granting authorization as soon as the members of the board are satisfied that the projects are worthy.

Chairman Bartlett has stated that every effort will be made by his board to act fairly, in order that every city or town which wants some of the governmental gift for a worthy project or projects will be accommodated.

Prime Object

The prime object of the board is to get as many unemployed men to work as possible, in view of the fact that no work is guaranteed beyond Feb. 15, and because of the advent of cold weather.

Governor Ely's address will be the principal feature of the meeting of Mayors and selectmen today, and it was anticipated yesterday that he will mince no words.

Though he himself declined to make any statement as to just what he will say, it was learned that he will probably place direct responsibility for early action under this new plan on the heads of the various communities.

It was the object of the civil works plan, the Governor told the city and town officials, to put as many as possible of these men to work at once. The Government, he said, had not granted Massachusetts a fixed allotment of funds, but would provide sufficient money to give work to 97,000 in this State.

"I hope a large percentage will be working before the week is over," the Governor said.

It was his understanding, the governor continued, that one-half of the 97,000 to be given employment throughout the State would be taken from the welfare lists in the different communities, and the others from the rolls of the Federal employment agency. The governor told city and town officials that they should submit their projects to the State civil works board as quickly as possible, and "when they're approved hear that's all the approval they need."

Governor Ely explained that he and his official family had nothing to do with the selection of the men to be employed under the plan, and that such choice would rest with the agents of the Federal Government. In each community, who will be the heads of the welfare departments appointed as local civil works administrators.

"The responsibility rests upon us now that the opportunity has been offered," the governor said. "We are facing this task with the stern mandate to stick to it so that 97,000 men will be put to work in this State at once. I beg of you do not raise technicalities in your drive for a proper share of work. I trust that you will face the situation generously and with respect for objections that may be raised to your individual wishes, and that you will not allow yourselves to become embroiled in questions of policy. Try to select jobs that are worthwhile."

The governor said the State had a number of worthwhile public works projects on which it might be possible to place a large number of men immediately and that they would be taken from the welfare lists wherever possible. The governor was vigorously applauded when he concluded his address, with an appeal for the enthusiastic co-operation of all the city and town officials.

Reads Regulations

Chairman Bartlett then read the regulations promulgated by the Federal authorities for providing "regular work at regular wages for unemployed persons able and willing to work." He explained that the chairmen of the local boards of public welfare would be appointed as local civil works administrators.

The civil works board will take over as of today, he said, local projects, meeting with the conditions of the plan on which men from the welfare lists were employed. He emphasized that the only persons to be given employment at present were those who were on the welfare or soldiers' relief rolls Nov. 15. If they are all provided with work before Dec. 1, employment will be provided to persons applying through the Federal employment service.

"But first we must get those on the welfare lists to work," Chairman Bartlett said. "The board is willing to work morning, noon and night to carry the program through. We do not intend, however, to be rushed off our feet, causing the wasting of public money."

Chairman Bartlett pointed out that the projects submitted to the board by the city and town officials must be of such type that they could be undertaken at once and completed by Feb. 15.

All projects, he explained, must be done by day labor and not by contract, and must be submitted to the civil works administrator, who, in turn will submit them to the State civil works board for approval.

The work would be thirty hours a week, except for administrative and supervising forces and no person under sixteen would be employed. The rate of wages would be fifty cents an hour for unskilled labor and $1.20 an hour for skilled labor. The Senator Joseph A. Loring of Boston suggested that some of the funds be used for hospital construction. He declared that every city and town should have a municipal hospital and should not be dependent upon private hospitals. Chairman Bartlett explained that the Civil Works Board had no authority to approve hospital building projects. When Senator Loring attempted to speak further, he was interrupted by others seeking the floor, and he remarked, "I expected to have at least five minutes. Don't get too rough. I still have a vote in the Senate and you might want my help some time." He then walked out of the auditorium.

Mayor John J. Murphy of Somerville, inquired regarding the policy of the board in matters other than labor. Chairman Bartlett explained that cities and towns receiving funds were expected to furnish material and equipment for the projects under the plan. Mayor George J. Bates of Salem asked if the appropriations of funds by the local communities was a prerequisite to obtaining an allotment, and he was informed that it was not.

Cities and towns which have no money to pay for material necessary will be provided with the necessary funds if the projects meet with the approval of the Civil Works Board. Mayor John C. Mahoney of Worcester, in submitting application for $242,000 to be expended for civil works in that city, said he was ready to begin the program tomorrow morning. He was the first mayor to submit an application at the meeting today.

WORK TO BEGIN IMMEDIATELY

Officials Urged to Take Full Advantage of Program

Amid scenes that made history in Massachusetts State House, Gov. Joseph B. Ely this noon rallied the local officials of the 355 cities and towns of the Commonwealth to join in a great crusade in turning the new offer of Federal relief into immediate jobs for the State's unemployed.

The great hall of Gardner Auditorium would not hold the press of public officials who had responded to the over-Sunday summons to come in and learn how to turn their welfare lists into Federal payrolls.

The procedure as the Governor described it, is direct and immediate. City and town officials can get final authorization from the State House upon presentation of "worth while projects" and can begin work immediately with the Government underwriting the payroll from today.

The Governor placed the responsibility squarely upon local authorities to take immediate and full advantage of the Government's program.

State's Quota 97,000

In a plea that reached passionate eloquence, Gov. Ely asked all local officials to put their utmost enthusiasm and energy into this great national effort that for the first time undertakes to cut all red tape and make immediate jobs for 4,000,000 jobless, of whom 97,000 are estimated to be the Bay State's quota.

Following the Governor, Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the new Civil works board for this State gave the local officials up-to-the-minute information on how the works project are to proceed.

All work relief enterprises now in force in any city or town may be transferred as of today to the Federal payroll, just by the filling of form.

There are relatively few such projects in Massachusetts.

The Governor made it loudly plain to the public officials that politics is out of this civil works project.

The first half of the jobs to be filled, he explained, must come of welfare and soldiers' relief lists.

The second half are to be filled through the Federal Reemployment Service, which under Dr. Quimby, the Federal Building, for many weeks has been establishing agencies to recruit unemployed for new work projects as fast as they are developed.

"This means that you will have nothing to do with selecting the men to get the jobs," the Governor told the city and town officers.

Basic for Allocating Funds

The basis of allocating the Federal funds, the local officials learned, will be 75 percent on the basis of population and 25 percent on the basis of welfare load.

That is, $9,000,000 will be allocated according to the size of the community as the maximum which it may seek in presenting worthwhile projects.

Another $7,000,000 will be allocated according to the proportion of the community's welfare load to the total welfare numbers in the State.

Gov. Ely declared that there are the same program.

"Do Not Intend to Be Rushed"

Chairman Bartlett was greatly applauded by the city and town officials when he ended his explanation of the civil works program with a statement, "This board is willing to work morning, noon and night to carry out this program. But we do not intend to be rushed off our feet with projects to waste public money."

He insisted that all projects, to receive an appropriation, must be "real," and said that on all these Federal works jobs must be what he called "force" labor, that is, that there could be no contract jobs.

Mr. Bartlett said the Veterans' Bureau here in Boston will be the Federal Government's agent for disbursing payrolls, and that the terms of employment would specify a minimum wage of 50 cents an hour, and a work-week of 30 hours.

"You can rest assured," he concluded, "that for any project started this week, or started this morning, funds will be available for the payrolls next Saturday night. If there is any hitch, the State Emergency Finance Board will use its funds."

300 CROWD CAMBRIDGE CITY HALL FOR JOBS

More than 300 men crowded into Cambridge City Hall this morning applying for work under the Federal loans for public works.

Five clerks took the names of the men and placed them on file.

JOBLESS STORM CIVIL SERVICE DEPT. OFFICE

State House Corridors Filled With Unemployed Seeking Information on Work

Mayors and Selectmen filled the State House corridors this morning, long before the hour set for their meeting with the new Civil Works Commission in Gardner Auditorium, to find out just what of the "civil works money" they can count on under the Federal Government's new program to relieve the pressure on welfare lists, and just how to handle their end of the new job program.

Two hours before the scheduled hour for the meeting, the auditorium was filled with officials waiting the word which had been promised by Gov. Ely and Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the new commission for this State.

The unemployed themselves were as quick on the trigger as the town and city officials. By 10 o'clock there were more than 300 unemployed persons who had taken direct action by applying to the State House without waiting for the local machinery of their home towns to be set up.

Storm Labor Division

Several hundred unemployed stormed the office of the labor division of the State Department of Civil Service. Another large crowd was on hand at the office of the State Emergency Finance Board.

The throng at the Civil Service Department increased the usual Monday morning gathering to unheard of proportions. Fifty or more were there to file their initial applications for employment as laborers under the Civil Service regulations.

With the additional number seeking work from the State Civil Works Commission there was a crowd that completely filled both the corridors in the vicinity of the Civil Service Department's offices.

Officials of the Civil Service Department had broadcast through the corridor that they had nothing to do with the new program and that announcement would probably be made during the day by Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the Civil Works Commission. Half a hundred accepted this statement as final but many others continued to remain.

At the office of the State Emergency Finance Board there were approximately 150 persons on hand. At the executive offices scores appeared. They were directed to the Gardner Auditorium where clerks were at work preparing the application forms.

Many Town Officials

The organized town officials of the State came in strong, determined that the cities should not get the lion's share of the new Federal aid.

Pres. Axel Zetterman of the Selectmen's Association of Massachusetts, came early to the State House, and declared that he was on hand to protect the towns. "There is just as much unemployment in the towns," he said, "as in the cities, if not more. We, of the towns, are not going to stand for any attempt to shove us aside in favor of the big cities, in the allocation of this new Federal money."

Chairman Bartlett and his Civil Works Board went into conference with Gov. Ely, to get decisions on the State's policy in handling the new $12,000,000 works financing, before going to the auditorium to give this information to the waiting city and town officials.

White Collar Men, Women, to Have Jobs

State and City Making Provisions for Handling These Classes

Million Checks Here Saturday

Newly Employed Will Not Have to Wait for Pay

Dr. Payson Smith, State commissioner of education; Dr. Arthur W. Gilbert, State commissioner of agriculture, and Mayor James M. Curley of Boston today simultaneously revealed plans for putting white collar workers back into the ranks of the employed.

Women are also included in the provisions for emergency work although there is no specific allotment of funds for them, or any enumeration of jobs on which they could be employed.

Mrs. Lois Rantoul, who has been connected with the Trade Union League, has been appointed director of women's activities within the Federal emergency relief administration. The appointment was made by John F. Scully, State director of emergency relief, and Mrs. Rantoul entered upon her duties today at 15 Ashburton place.

She will establish contact with all agencies in the State interested in creation of employment for women. Her office will become a clearing house for women looking for work.

Dr. Smith said that he was working on two plans through which he hopes to be able to provide employment for between 1200 and 1500 of the "white collar class" under the civil works program. The commissioner was not prepared to make public the details of the plans but expected to do so within two days. He had been making arrangements under the old public works program for benefiting unemployed teachers on the welfare lists before the new civil works program was inaugurated.

Dr. Gilbert announced after a conference with county agricultural agents at the State House that 1500 men to be employed in thirteen counties of the State would begin work tomorrow on apple pest control.

Some cities had the plans so well advanced that they could begin work this morning; others report that they will be ready tomorrow. Before the end of the week thousands of men and women will have been transferred from the relief list to the civil works list, and will be earning their own bread.

The workers themselves are as much aroused over the prospects as are the public officials who in their own communities are responsible for the care of the unemployed, to give them work or food and shelter. Thousands of unemployed in Boston were up early this morning and reported at the places where they expected to get orders to go to work.

Herbert H. Barraclough, disbursing officer in Boston of the United States Veterans' Bureau will be in charge of the payments out of the Federal fund. He will be the sole authority here on the handling of the fund, but will have no actual cash in Boston. On his requisition to Washington a fund will be placed to the credit of Massachusetts, and he will blank Civil Works Administration checks are being printed for use in Massachusetts, so that every worker will be paid by check each week, for about eleven weeks, if work is provided that long.

To assist him in the issuance and distribution of the checks Mr. Barraclough will have an assistant disbursing officer in every city and town where there is a job. In most places the city or town treasurer will be designated to serve in that capacity, and they will be notified by telephone or telegraph today to come to Boston tomorrow for a meeting with Mr. Barraclough, and perhaps members of the Civil Works Board, at the State House. This meeting will be held at noon, and Mr. Barraclough will explain the payment system to the assistant disbursing officers, all of whom will be bonded in amounts from $5000 to $25,000, according to the size of their emergency payrolls. Every check will be signed by Mr. Barraclough and by the local disbursing officer, and will be issued to the name of the worker.

Most of the money is to go for labor, and as little as possible for material; but whatever material must be used will be paid for out of the same Federal fund, by Mr. Barraclough.

Mayor Charles A. Ross of Quincy pointed out today that there are 8000 unemployed in his city, so that the $200,000 thus far allotted to Quincy out of the civil works fund will not go very far. But work will begin at once. Tomorrow 150 men will be put to work on parks and playgrounds, to improve them. By the end of the week 300 to 400 will be at work, and within ten days about 700 men will be given jobs.

The disbursing officer for the city will be Roland Broberg, the welfare commissioner.

Mayor J. Fred Manning of Lynn applied to the Civil Works Board today for funds to pay 900 men who are at work repairing roads, improving the parks and working on public buildings in return for welfare assistance. Lynn has been tentatively allotted $29,400 under the civil works program.

Other applications received today were from Stoneham for $29,000 for the laying of water pipes, providing for 32,000 man-hours of work; Foxboro, $2800 to provide 1800 man-hours on forest and road improvements; Stoughton, $20,000 to provide 6700 hours of work on sewers and various small projects.

Curley Plan Too Big for Cash at Hand

By Forrest P. Hall

Though Mayor Curley has plans in mind for a civic works program that would require three times the amount of money he will be able to secure from the Federal Government in order to put men at work without delay, he will be limited to $2,500,000 and will try to submit his proposals to Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the Massachusetts Civil Works Administration during the day.

In this program the South Boston Strandway improvement is the biggest item and the next largest is the repair of public buildings. To extend the bathing facilities along Dorchester Bay, build concrete steps leading from the roadway to the beach, plant more trees and shrubbery and construct a "Prado" from Columbus Circle all along the Strandway to the L street bathhouse, the city will need upwards of $500,000, although estimates have been as high as $1,000,000. It is understood that this particular project is favored because of the possibility of employing a large number of laborers and thus balancing the situation as respects general employment. The white collar men and skilled artisans will find employment in the repair of public buildings, particularly the Boston Public Library; in finishing the block system for the assessing department and in installing a new card system at the library.

But there are many street and parkway proposals awaiting the mayor's approval. In the public works department scores of streets are nearly ready for contract labor under the old system and these will be done, if done at all now, by the welfare forces under the supervision of the department engineers. The street commission is at work on a program of new streets, some of which are in blueprint stages.

When the department heads, hastily summoned into conference late yesterday afternoon, left the mayor's office during the evening the program had been merely scratched. It may be possible to submit it in piecemeal, thus permitting the beginning of work in South Boston before the end of the week. There were so many requests from the departments that the mayor was impeded with the desirability of doubling the number of men originally figured.

The new figure was set at 6000, even though the mayor realized that $2,500,000 would not go far with such a number at work.

The park department requires 2500 men, and, like the Public Works Department, is likely to ask for the services of men it has used all summer on various work, men who have been well trained under their foremen. The Public Works Department will be given 2000 men for street surfacing. The assessing department will have 200 architects, engineers and draughtsmen for the block system, now two-thirds finished.

If the mayor goes through with the suggestion of Chairman Frederic H. Fay of the city planning board that a force of 100 men and women be recruited to make a comprehensive plan of Boston improvements for the next hundred years, he may not be able to secure a competent force from the welfare lists. The school department can use, as estimated, 200 men for work on grounds and buildings; the hospital department 200 men for general repair work; the public buildings department, 300 men; the library department 100 men and women and the fire department 100 men.

$500,000 Allotted as Big Relief Plan Gets Under Way With a Rush—Cambridge and Lowell Start Projects This Morning and Will Put Hundreds to Work—500 More to Get Employment Tomorrow in Worcester

MAYORS AND SELECTMEN AT BIG CONFERENCE
In the Auditorium at the State House was filled yesterday for the big discussion on civil works projects. This was made as Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett was speaking. State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley and Governor Ely sat behind him.

to start on Saturday. It has been reported that veterans' bureaus would make the payments. Some action by veterans' and labor organizations looking toward veterans' preference and preference for members of labor unions may be asked, according to word at the State House.

Belmont Man Engineer for Board

Announcement was made during the evening of the appointment of John J. Fitzgerald of Belmont as engineer for the board. Mr. Fitzgerald, sitting in on the conference, advised the board as to costs and other pertinent matters. The Cambridge project will give work to 580 men. A substantial amount of money will be contributed by the city for the purchase of supplies and equipment.

Construction of four playgrounds in Newton at a cost of $121,300 was approved.

Work to be done in West Springfield, mainly on sewers, will cost $25,000 and provide employment for 250 men.

For Apple Pest Control

For apple pest control in the State department of agriculture, the board approved $207,512, giving work to 1500 men. Plans were presented, yet to be approved, calling for the expenditure of $200,000 in mosquito control work; $200,000 for dairy farm sanitation and $97,000 for European corn borer control.

When the board ended its work for the day at midnight it was estimated that more than $500,000 in construction projects had been approved. No definite figure could be secured as to the total number to be employed as the result of today's action, but the figures will run into several thousands.

The last action taken by the board was the despatch of a communication to Washington, asking for the sending of $1,012,000, the proceeds of which will be used in meeting wage payments during the first two weeks of work.

The board will resume its meeting this afternoon.

Throng of Unemployed

then on, the meeting, the first allotment was made to Worcester.

The board accepted the Worcester application with only minor modifications, both of which Mayor Manning declared he will apply. These had to do with the estimate of gravel and the suggestion that the engineering work be done by city engineers.

Rush to Get Projects Approved

All through the remainder of the afternoon and far into the night, city and town officials submitted their projects and received approval or rejection. Outside the board's offices, in the State House, the corridors were crowded with officials who wanted to get approval immediately. Some of them were from towns in the western part of the State, and others from cities near by, but all were anxious to get their allotments and get the work started immediately. From the enthusiasm shown by these officials, members of the board were certain that many thousands will be back to work in the State before the end of the week.

Estimated allotments to the cities have been worked out, and will be made provided the city officials submit their projects and receive approval. Chairman Bartlett emphasized in his talk with individual officials as well as in his address at the general meeting that there would be no discussion of technicalities and that if a project merited approval, it would be given the approval immediately so that there need be no delay in starting the actual work.

He pointed out that the necessary payrolls for the men put to work this week under the civil works plan will be ready by Saturday night, and that if the funds are not forthcoming through the channels set up under the plan, they will be provided by the State Emergency Finance Board.

Ely for Swift Action

In his address to the city and town projects submitted to the board, the city under the plan and the city under the plan.

And after authorization has been given, the city will take care of the project. Chairman Bartlett emphasized that the plan is not a welfare project, but a project which may employ 500 men.

Explaining the main government's program to the new local civil works board, he said that the board is to select the projects and the city will provide the funds.

"If we find the project follows the rules laid down, we will approve it. If we do not, we will not approve it. If we do not approve it, we will not approve it."

Any projects which are approved will be put to work last night. The city will provide the funds and the city will provide the funds.

BY JOHN GRIFFIN

With a minimum of words and a maximum of action, the civil works programme for Massachusetts, aimed at the almost immediate employment of 97,000 men, swung into swift movement yesterday and lasted through the night.

Before the night was out more than $500,000 was allotted and arrangements completed for putting 1300 men to work this morning in Cambridge and Lowell and 500 to work in Worcester tomorrow morning.

Red tape was swept aside as the civil works board, in charge of Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett, explained

WORK FOR 4236 MEN IN BOSTON PROGRAM

Cost to Be $1,328,000—Plan of Park Department May Make More Jobs

Mayor James M. Curley and heads of departments completed their program of civil works late last night. Today it will be submitted to chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the board in charge of civil works throughout the State.

Boston's part of the program to be submitted today calls for employment of 4236 men at an estimated cost of $1,328,000, distributed as follows:

General paint-up, clean-up, etc., of the City Hospital, 552 men to be employed at a cost of $350,000.

Public Buildings Department of 47 city and county buildings, 224 men, $350,000.

Public Works Department, reconstruction of 100 streets and alleys, 575 men, $150,000.

Grading, surfacing and draining, 102 new streets, 800 men, $272,200.

Repair and paint Longfellow, Meridian-st., Blakemore-st bridges and remove decayed timber and piling of the Summer-st., Dorchester-av., Northern-av., Dover-st., Broadway and Warren-st bridges, 105 men, $57,000.

Water mains in 10 streets in West Roxbury, Hyde Park and Dorchester, 150 men, $79,345.

Cleaning Canterbury, Shepherd and Stony Brooks, Tenean Creek, and repairs to the pumping stations on Moon Island and Calf Pasture, 180 men, $45,000.

Grading, filling, playgrounds and parks, 1400 men, $250,000.

Block system in Assessing Department, 200 men (no cost estimate).

above are put to work, with the new opportunity to work under the civil works program. The public works program is an entirely different matter.

In spite of pessimistic warnings from authorities, that they did not expect the money for the C. W. P. to last through the welfare and soldier's relief lists, the men refused to be discouraged, and crowded into the agency in three long lines. Those with the proper residence certificates were tabulated, and put on file, to await Dec 1, when they hope to know how many of them will have openings.

The Salvation Army fed the throngs of hopeful men at noon today, as they stood in line.

In addition to its regular program the Park Department will later submit a plan for Strandway improvement to give employment to 600 to 1000 men, at a cost of $500,000.

only a week in the past for Welfare Board orders for necessities. Today these same men started to work a full week on a permanent basis and they will be paid in cash.

Mayor Manning went to Boston today with additional projects in mind for which he will ask the approval of Chairman Bartlett. When he returns, if he obtains approval, he will begin giving out employment to additional men. The first men taken for this work will be those who have been on the welfare lists as of and up to Nov 16. On Dec 5 work will be given to others on the welfare lists.

City Treasurer Frank Trumbull, acting with the purchasing department, made arrangements for the immediate purchase of tools for the workers including axes, pickaxes, shovels and wheelbarrows so that these will be on the jobs ready for the workers to start in immediately.

The adjoining town of Nahant has 13 men on its welfare lists and its Federal allotment is $1000. Its project is a road grading job and the unemployed will be started at this work.

The Selectmen of Nahant are in conference today with Chairman Bartlett seeking approval for their projects.

According to the estimates of Lynn authorities, the Federal allotment for Lynn of $229,400, at an average wage of $20 a week, will keep Lynn's unemployed men working for 26 weeks.

Members of the Welfare Board and Soldiers' Relief Board declare that 2.1 the men on their lists can be kept working six days a week under this allotment.

At intervals from time to time now it is anticipated that additional unemployed men will be put to work until all who are out of employment are fit for and are seeking work.

NEWTON FIRST TO START JOBS

NEWTON, Nov 21—Newton was the first city under the new Civil Works program.

It was announced at the office of Mayor Sinclair Weeks this morning that 100 men were already at work and that another 100 would be on the job this afternoon.

It is expected that 400 will be working within two days and that 500 will be working by Saturday. This morning men were being sent directly to the Gold Spring Playground, Newton Center, and put to work. Workers are being called as rapidly as possible.

This afternoon a second contingent was sent to the Thompsonville Playground. Other approved projects include the Nevada st., Wellington lot, Auburndale and Edmunds Park Playgrounds.

The total allotment to Newton is $161,300, and it will take care of 850 men for the specified period. The welfare department has tools on hand for more than 200 men and additional equipment is being secured.

Newton's immediate operation of the plan was made possible by the fact that a number of similar projects have been under way for some time in this city.

1000 TO GET CAMBRIDGE JOBS

That Number Tomorrow
Of Welfare List

Cambridge officials worked until midnight last night in an effort to get things in readiness to put men to work in its reconstruction projects. By tomorrow morning the city will be able to handle 1000 men from the welfare list. Probably that number will not be put to work immediately, but the $306,300 allotment to the city can take care of that many men until February.

The men will start working tomorrow morning on building a new playground on Coffins Pit and widening Concord av from Alewife Brook parkway to the Belmont line. Ten feet will be sliced off Concord av on the Fresh Pond side of the avenue, and also a sidewalk with edgestones will be constructed. A pavement of six-inch concrete covered with asphalt will be laid.

Around the new playground will be built an 8 1/2-foot fence. Edgestones will be placed on a sidewalk on the north side, and Alpine st on the east side will be rebuilt and a sidewalk placed here. The playground will be one of the finest in the city. A pond formerly occupied the site which has been filled in.

Enthusiasm among the people of the city ran high this morning as they applied for work at City Hall. Men's faces beamed with smiles as they came out of the employment office with orders to report to work in the morning. The men will work five days a week and six hours a day. The rate of pay has not yet been exactly determined. The Street Department, which is directing the work, will confer with the Welfare Department today on that matter.

QUINCY TO PUT 700 TO WORK

City's Program to Start Within Week

QUINCY, Nov. 21—Within the next week, 700 men who are now on the welfare list of the city will start back to work, some of them for the first time in many months. The Massachusetts Civil Works program got under way in this city today.

The spokesman for the city was Mayor Charles A. Ross, who this morning addressed hundreds of unemployed men in City Hall at an early hour. The program and its purpose was explained by Angelo P. Blizozero, Commissioner of Public Works. The announcement that men on the welfare lists were to return to work in large numbers by next week was hailed with enthusiasm.

Over the week-end heads of city departments had been preparing a program which will keep the unemployed busy for months to come. Among the first to report was James N. Muir, superintendent of the School Department. The unemployed men who will return to work are skilled and experienced workers, who will make necessary repairs to school buildings.

Others are to be employed in the extension and replacement of the sewer system, while more men will be utilized in the clearing of woodlands.

Projects totaling $10,000 were approved yesterday by the board. Today was devoted to settling the executive and administrative machinery in motion so the men can return to their tasks with all possible speed. By tomorrow it was estimated that 150 men will be at jobs.

The administration of the program has been left to Roland Broberg, welfare commissioner. Mayor Ross stated this morning that as new projects are needed to keep men at work, Broberg will present them for approval which he believed will be but a matter of hours.

Making a plea for the home owners and tax payers who are without jobs, the Mayor said that he hoped to find some solution to this angle within the next few weeks. Under present restrictions, men from the welfare lists only can be employed, but it is the aim of local officials that the scope of the program be broadened to include other worthy cases.

WORK BEGUN ON STATE HIGHWAY

In Cambridge to Pleasant
St in Arlington

Work on the first stretch of a new State highway from the Alewife Brook parkway in Cambridge to Concord has been started. This first section is about a mile and a half long and runs from north of the bridge over the tracks of the old Massachusetts Central Railroad and follows the Cambridge-Arlington-Belmont line to Pleasant st in Arlington.

There the new section stops for the time, it being the idea of the Massachusetts Highway Commission to do it in sections, and complete them as it goes along. This new section is probably one of the most expensive parts of the new roadway, for at Pleasant st, in Arlington, an underpass will be built under the now existing highway. Two houses, one on Pleasant st, in Belmont, and other on moving at, in Arlington, will be removed.

A long stretch of Spy Pond must be filled in and here there is an interesting problem. Engineers found that there were 12 to 20 feet of mud along the proposed section to be filled, and the filling sinks about as fast as it is put in. The filling is coming from the excavation made for the Pleasant st

HALF NEW JOBS NOT OFF WELFARE

Administration is the employment of 4,000,000 persons by Dec. 15. Two million of these persons receiving relief on Nov. 16, either as work relief or direct relief, are to be employed by direct transference to Civil Works projects on or before Dec. 1.

"On or after Dec. 1, or prior to this date if the relief quota has been transferred and employed by the Civil Works Administration, all applications for employment will be made through the local employment agencies designated by the United States Employment Service."

"All Placements After Dec. 1"

Under "Procedure for securing workers" it is stated: "Civil Works projects begun before Dec. 1 shall first secure their workers from persons on relief rolls, if qualified and available. If not qualified and available, such placements will be made through the National Reemployment Service."

"All placements after Dec. 1 will be made through the National Reemployment Service."

Not all of these instructions have been received by Chairman Bartlett of the State Civil Works Board. No quota of applicants to be taken from relief rolls has been specified by the Federal Civil Works Administration for Massachusetts.

BY JOHN GRIFFIN

The Civil Works Board clamped down hard yesterday on city officials who expect to junk their plans for borrowing under the NRA public works programme and substitute plans for getting free grants from the civil works administration. The first victim was the city of Somerville, when the board refused to approve projects involving $193,152 until the city takes a definite stand on whether it will carry out its public works programme of nearly $1,000,000 on the basis of 70 per cent as a loan and 30 per cent as a grant from the federal government.

erville's case, the board of aldermen voted to present a programme under the NRA project, but since the presentation of the programme, the aldermen have taken no action. Chairman Bartlett explained.

Some to Get Paid Today

"They should first vote on the authorization of the loan before asking us to approve projects technically against the regulations," he asserted. A tremendous amount of work was accomplished by the Civil Works Board yesterday, and before nightfall money for payrolls in the cities where approved projects have been started had arrived at the Veterans Bureau. Checks have already been sent to some of the cities and towns which have fulfilled the requirements, and pay will be given to some workers in Boston and Cambridge today, provided the payrolls are certified.

Approve Jobs for 6000

Before the close of the day, projects calling for the expenditure of nearly $2,000,000, and for the employment of approximately 6000 men and women were approved. Three members of the board, and three others deputized to assist, handled the applications and made rapid progress.

Further accomplishment in progress. Mayor Curley, in a dramatic meeting with Chairman Bartlett, received approval of projects calling for the expenditure of $1,167,614 and the employment of 2345 men, and almost virtual assurance of approval of his Strandway project.

JOBLESS MELEE AT CITY HALL

Somerville Aldermen
Pass Up Meeting for Banquet

Incensed because 11 members of the Somerville Board of Aldermen were at a turkey supper at the Hotel Commander in Cambridge, given to Mayor-elect James E. Hagan, and that their own troubles were not being given consideration, 500 unemployed men engaged in a wild melee in Somerville City Hall last night.

ONLY 10 PRESENT

The Board of Aldermen had been expected to take long delayed action to provide work for 100 men. The unemployed were on hand at 7 o'clock to learn what the word would be.

But when the board met, only 10 members were present. Twelve are necessary to make a quorum.

It was declared that vain efforts were made to get some of the absent Aldermen to come to the City Hall to take action on the public works proposition.

Blasts Missing Members

The Aldermen present waited until 9 o'clock. Meanwhile, George J. Moran, president of the Board of Aldermen, took the floor to deliver a blast at his absent colleagues.

"They are attending a banquet while the unemployed of the city walk the streets," he declared.

It was when the aldermen started from the aldermanic chamber that the trouble started.

A number of the men shouted at Vice-President John A. Deane.

Fists Fly

Within a few minutes there was bedlam, with fists swinging.

It was declared that some of Denning's followers were present in the corridor and resented remarks. However, later, Denning denied emphatically that anyone had struck him or had made any threat to do so.

Just who was hit was a mystery late in the night.

The men will work five days a week and six hours a day. The rate of pay has not yet been exactly determined. The Street Department, which is directing the work, will confer with the Welfare Department today on that matter.

QUINCY TO PUT 700 TO WORK

City's Program to Start Within Week

QUINCY, Nov. 21.—Within the next week, 700 men who are new on the welfare list of the city will start back to work, some of them for the first time in many months. The Massachusetts Civil Works program got under way in this city today.

The spokesman for the city was Mayor Charles A. Ross, who this morning addressed hundreds of unemployed men in City Hall at an early hour. The program and its purpose was explained by Angelo P. Bizzozero, Commissioner of Public Works. The announcement that men on the welfare lists were to return to work in large numbers by next week was hailed with enthusiasm.

Over the week-end heads of city departments had been preparing a program which will keep the unemployed busy for months to come. Among the first to report was James N. Muir, superintendent of the School Department. The unemployed men who will return to work are skilled and experienced workers, who will make necessary repairs to school buildings.

Others are to be employed in the extension and replacement of the sewer system, while more men will be utilized in the clearing of woodlands.

Projects totaling $10,000 were approved yesterday by the board. Today was devoted to setting the executive and administrative machinery in motion so the men can return to their tasks with all possible speed. By tomorrow it was estimated that 150 men will be at jobs.

The administration of the program has been left to Roland Broberg, welfare commissioner. Mayor Ross stated this morning that as new projects are needed to keep men at work, Broberg will present them for approval which it is believed will be but a matter of hours.

Making a plea for the home owners and tax payers who are without jobs, the Mayor said that he hoped to find some solution to this angle within the next few weeks. Under present restrictions, men from the welfare lists only can be employed, but it is the aim of local officials that the scope of the program be broadened to include other worthy cases.

HULL WAS ALLOTTED ABOUT $5000

That Not Much Aid With 300 Men Out of Work

HULL, Nov. 21.—Town officials who attended the meeting yesterday at the State House learned that a little more than $5000 would be allotted to this town for public works. Selectman Henry J. Stevens, voicing the sentiment of the board, stated that the small amount would not help the unemployment situation here much. He said that Hull had more than 300 men out of work, most of them heads of families.

The officials of Hull felt that the distribution of public money should be based on the valuation of the communities, but they were told yesterday it would be allotted on the basis of population. From a financial viewpoint, Hull is required to pay the third largest amount of taxes to the county and State of all the localities in Plymouth County, being exceeded only by Brockton and Plymouth. Hull's expenditure in the summer season mounts high, owing to the seasonal increase in population, and as a public safety measure it is necessary to maintain an adequate fire and police department the entire 12 months.

Through the efforts of Executive Council Joseph B. Grossman and the other local State officers of this district, a request has been made to Commissioner, State Public Works, to provide funds for the removal of the stranded schooner Nancy, ashore at Surfside, and Mr. Lyman will hire the local unemployed in its removal.

William W. Reddie, chairman of the local Welfare Board, has been designated as unemployment administrator of the new Civil Works Board and applicants are asked to register with him for what work will be granted under the allotted $5000. It was intimated this morning at the office of the Selectmen that the money would be used to complete the drain at Waveland already begun by the town.

SOUTHEAST GALE WARNING ON NEW ENGLAND COAST

WASHINGTON, Nov. 21 (A. P.).—The Weather Bureau today issued the following storm warning:

Advisory 10:30 a. m. Southeast storm warnings ordered Sandy Hook to Eastport, Me. Disturbance of marked intensity moving eastward over Lake Region will be attended by increasing southeast and south wind, becoming strong, probably reaching gale force at times tonight.

WORK BEGUN ON STATE HIGHWAY

In Cambridge to Pleasant St in Arlington

Work on the first stretch of a new State highway from the Alewife Brook parkway in Cambridge to Concord has been started. This first section is about a mile and a half long and runs from Alewife Brook parkway at a point north of the bridge over the tracks of the old Massachusetts Central Railroad and follows the Plainridge-Arlington-Belmont line to Pleasant st in Arlington.

The new section stops for the time, it being the idea of the Massachusetts Highway Commission to do small sections and complete them as it goes along. This new section is probably one of the most expensive parts of the new roadway, for at Pleasant st, in Arlington, an underpass will be built under the now existing highway. Two houses, one on Pleasant st, in Belmont, and other on Spring st, in Arlington, will be removed.

A long stretch of Spy Pond must be filled in and here there is an interesting problem. Engineers found that there were 12 to 20 feet of mud along the proposed section to be filled, and the filling sinks about as fast as it is put in. The filling is coming from the excavation made for the Pleasant-st underpass. One drawback seen by many in this proposed highway is the crossing of Lake at about where the icehouses were in Arlington. Here traffic lights will probably be installed by the State.

The entire roadway when completed will have cost about $2,500,000 and the section now being built is expected to cost in the vicinity of $500,000. The land takings are estimated at $500,000. The work is being pushed ahead rapidly, but this work does not call for much hand labor and big machines are at work with motor trucks hauling the dirt away.

Easy Grade Over Heights
After leaving the Pleasant st section at the Arlington-Belmont line, the roadway will go up over the so-called Belmont Hill section of Belmont, along the Arlington Heights line, at about six percent grade. Then the roadway will skirt along the boundaries of the Arlington Golf Club and eventually meet the old Concord Turnpike between Waltham and Lexington, near Spring st, in that town, where the crossing will be an overpass. The roadway runs through much vacant land and will open up a large area along its route.

At the Concord line the road will bypass the center of the town. Two new bridges will have to be built across the E. & M. R. R. tracks and one over the Sudbury River. It is estimated that the entire job will take two years to complete.

Great advantages are looked for from this new roadway, especially in Arlington. The through-traffic through Route 2 will be diverted over the new roadway, thus taking off Massachusetts av. in Arlington thousands of automobiles that now pass through the town center daily.

BARSTOW WIDOW GETS MOST OF $1,150,676

NEW YORK, Nov. 21 (A. P.).—Mrs. Bertha K. Barstow of Sharon, Conn., receives the bulk of a $1,150,676 estate left by her husband, George E. Barstow, who died Nov. 17, 1932. It was shown in a transfer tax appraisal filed today.

The residuary estate going to his widow is after deduction of trust funds and bequests to 15 relatives and legatees totaling $115,000, and a bequest of $10,000 to the Federation of Agencies Caring for Protestants, Inc.

Among the bequests are three of $10,000 each to his son, George E. Barstow, and two daughters, Elizabeth B. Long of Memphis, Tenn., and Margaret B. Blodgett of Fishkill, N. Y.

HALF NEW JOBS NOT OFF WELFARE

Administration is the employment of 4,000,000 persons by Dec. 15. Two million of these persons receiving relief on Nov. 16, either as work relief or direct relief, are to be employed by direct transference to Civil Works projects on or before Dec. 1.

"On or after Dec. 1, or prior to this date if the relief quota has been transferred and employed by the Civil Works Administration, all applications for employment will be made through the local employment agencies designated by the United States Employment Service."

"All Placements After Dec. 1"

Under "Procedure for securing workers" it is stated: "Civil Works projects begun before Dec. 1 shall first secure their workers from persons on relief rolls, if qualified and available. If not qualified and available, such placements will be made through the National Reemployment Service."

"All placements after Dec. 1 will be made through the National Reemployment Service."

Not all of these instructions have been received by Chairman Bartlett of the State Civil Works Board. No quota of applicants to be taken from relief rolls has been specified by the Federal Civil Works Administration for Massachusetts.

But Mr. Bartlett expects that the work will divide approximately half and half between welfare and non-welfare persons. He pointed out this morning that the provision "if qualified and available" will limit the welfare persons to be employed. An inspection service will see to it that local officials are using only men able to work.

Must Depend on Local Registration

The first men to be put to work would necessarily come off the welfare lists, for Dr. Quincy has yet to get his State-wide machinery established for receiving applications from unemployed. His field staff yesterday was only three men. These he has increased by securing the services of other men experienced in placement work.

It was clear by this noon that in most of the smaller communities, where no Federal or State employment agency is established, Dr. Quincy will have to depend largely upon the local registration of unemployed which in most cases have been handled by local public officials or by privately organized unemployment committees.

Dr. Quincy's telegram, sent to Mayors and welfare chairmen, reads: "Civil works administration provides 50 percent of employed on civil works projects to be taken from lists not on welfare through National Reemployment Service. Such service will be set up in your community provided you secure approval of projects before Dec. 1. Advise applicants for work to wait setting up of this service. Also please advise local newspapers of these facts. Under no conditions should applicants leave community for registration."

Fall River City Hall Crowded

Dr. Quincy realizes the necessity for speed in establishing complete local organization for registering applicants. This morning the Mayor of Fall River reported that he was swamped with applicants in the City Hall, and had no instructions from the Federal Reemployment Service about receiving applications. Dr. Quincy promised that within two days a local application bureau will be established.

In Boston the State Employment Agency at 100 Congress st. is acting as the Federal Service agent to receive applications.

LIST OF STREETS TO BE REPAIRED

The Boston programme of works approved yesterday by the Civil Works Board included the repairing of 62 streets, added to the 102 streets approved earlier in the week. The new list of streets is: Athens street (South Boston), Dresser, Bolton, Bowen, Silver, Tudor, Gladstone, Orient avenue, Waldemar avenue, Montmorency avenue, St. Andrew road, Baywater, Marginal, Decatur, Caldwell, Lincoln, Eden, Essex, Perkins, Washington (Charlestown), Union, Dorrance, Arlington avenue, Beecham, Beach (Charlestown), Lyndboro, Tremont (Charlestown), Chestnut, Beach, Essex street and Harrison avenue (city proper), Hyde Park avenue, Wood avenue, West, Baker, Victory road, Tenean, Kenrick, Everett, Chestnut Hill avenue, Lincoln (Brighton), Terrace street, Texas, Prentiss, Hillside, Leverett, Virginia, Port Norfolk, Walnut (Dorchester), Almont road, Freidan terrace, Hilltop, Gallivan Boulevard, Trull and Bullard streets.

erville's case, the board of aldermen voted to present a programme under the NRA project, but since the presentation of the programme, the aldermen have taken no action, Chairman Bartlett explained.

Some to Get Paid Today

"They should first vote on the authorization of the loan before asking us to approve projects technically against the regulations," he asserted.

A tremendous amount of work was accomplished by the Civil Works Board yesterday, and before midnight money for payrolls in the cities where approved projects have been started had arrived at the Veterans' Bureau. Checks already been sent to some of the cities and towns which have fulfilled the requirements, and pay will be given to some workers in Boston and Cambridge today, provided the payrolls are certified.

Approve Jobs for 6000

Before the close of the day, projects calling for the expenditure of nearly $2,000,000 and for the employment of approximately 6000 men and women were approved. Three members of the board, and three others deputized to assist, handled the applications and made rapid progress. Further accomplishment is expected over the week-end, for the board decided to sit today and tomorrow to examine applications and make approvals.

Mayor Curley, in a dramatic meeting with Chairman Bartlett, received approval of projects calling for the expenditure of $1,150,676 and the employment of 215 men, and also secured assurance of approval of his Strandway project.

Airport on Governor's Island

The Mayor also received an unexpected pleasurable shock when Chairman Bartlett informed him that there is a good chance of the Governor's Island airport project, long a dream of the Mayor, getting federal funds.

The chairman, after an agreeable meeting with the Mayor in which compliments were mutually exchanged, waited with a dramatic pause at the close, and then said, "Let me read you a telegram I have just received."

The telegram, from E. L. Vidal, director of aeronautics of the Department of Commerce, was as follows:

Network of Airports

"Aeronautics branch of Department of Commerce is prepared to construct a national network of airports in co-operation with the civil works administration, States and municipalities. Sites must be owned or leased by State or municipality. Plan also includes improving existing inadequate fields. Civil works administration work must be underway in two weeks."

"Your co-operation by urging municipalities in your State to acquire and submit sites to aeronautics branch immediately is requested. Further request that you send a representative to Washington immediately to discuss programme for your State."

Mayor to Go to Capital

Immediately Mayor Curley brought up the subject of the Boston airport, explaining that it has been filed out to within 100 feet of Governor's Island and that he had before urged the government to complete the connection between the island and the airport. The government could put 5000 men to work there, he said. Chairman Bartlett asked if the Mayor could go to Washington immediately and the latter asked for a day or two to prepare.

"This is a big thing," Bartlett said. "Can you go yourself?" The Mayor replied that he would go and take several department heads with him. It was decided that Lieutenant Francis P. Kendall of Holden, attached to the 1st observation squadron of the 26th

NEW PROJECTS IN BOSTON APPROVED

Boston projects approved by the Civil Works Board yesterday included the following:

Public buildings repair, $336,000 for 450 men.
Hospital improvements, $328,589 for 553 men.
Street work, $275,659 for 900 men.
Fire station improvements, $35,970 for 76 men.
Health department projects, $16,600 for 43 men.
Retirement board projects, $3475 for 15 women.

These brought the total Boston allotments approved up to $2,116,780, calling for the employment of 5586 men and women.

AWARDS TO DATE TO EMPLOY 13,175

Large Share of $12,000,000
Grant to Be Sought for
State Projects

A major share of jobs on civil works projects undertaken by the metropolitan district commission will be given to unemployed residents of Boston not on the welfare list. It was announced last night by Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts civil works board.

The announcement came after a conference between Chairman Bartlett and David B. Keniston, chairman of the metropolitan district commission, during which the commission was allotted $215,000 to hire 1080 men for work in Greater Boston.

The pressing problem of how to take care of Boston's unemployed was thus partly solved by Bartlett, who ruled that if Keniston wanted to allot more than the usual share of jobs to Boston residents he would not object. Also, it indicated that the state itself will seek a large share of the estimated $12,000,000 fund. Gov. Ely feels that the state should take at least $2,000,000, the chairman said.

An important project which will affect every dairy farmer in the state and result in better quality milk for the Massachusetts consumer, was approved by Chairman Bartlett. He awarded the state department of agriculture $201,092 to hire 1063 men to spray, clean and whitewash dairy barns throughout the state.

HARD PRESSED FARMERS
Commissioner Arthur W. Gilbert of the agriculture department said that hard-pressed farmers could not comply with health regulations and were being barred from the Massachusetts market.

With the barns cleaned, the regulations would be complied with and the farmer, with better milk, would be allowed to sell in Massachusetts markets.

A check of the figures yesterday revealed that the state civil works board, which has been in existence just a week, has awarded in three days a total of $4,088,137 to provide work for 13,175 men throughout the state.

Yesterday, Chairman Bartlett deputized Robert F. Bradford, assistant secretary to Gov. Ely, and John J. Fitzgerald, engineer to the board, to assist him and State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley in passing on applications. Working at top speed, the four men passed on a large number of projects, among which were:

WELLESLEY—60 men—$10,000 to drain South swamp.
ATTLEBORO—122 men—$20,381 for highways and rail removal.
BELMONT—160 men—$27,784 for sewer work.

Men off List Planned by Board

Projects. Within a week 2000 men will be at work in Worcester, mostly on street projects.

Late in the afternoon Chairman Bartlett announced that the board can pay half the cost of materials. Previously the board had tried to get the cost of materials to bear this expense, but this contribution to the success of the civil works program, but this could not be done in every case. The cost of the materials, however, will be closely checked by the board.

UNION QUESTION
The highly controversial union question was thrust into the foreground during a conference between Chairman Bartlett and James T. Moriarty, president of the Massachusetts branch of the American Federation of Labor and Alfred Ellis, Jr., president of the Boston Building Trades Council.

Moriarty wanted Bartlett to issue an order giving union men preference in the civil works projects. He held that the act which created the public works fund—from which the civil works fund—of $400,000 was drawn by President Roosevelt as an emergency measure to create employment—provided that contractors were to obtain union workers from the unions, and, upon failure of the unions to assign men within 24 hours, then get the men elsewhere.

"The act provided that union men were to be given the preference," said Moriarty. "We have told our men not to register for civil works jobs, because we felt the act safeguarded them. We felt that the city or town engaged in a project is a contractor within the terms of the law, and union men should be given preference."

Chairman Bartlett replied that he had nothing to do with the assigning of men, and that the federal re-employment service would have to decide the question. He referred the union leaders to Col. W. S. Quinby, who is head of the service in Boston. Moriarty and Ellis intend to see Quinby and if they cannot obtain his approval for a union preference will endeavor to bring the matter to the attention of authorities at Washington.

Atty-Gen. Homer Cummings has ruled in favor of union men, they contended, and as the money comes from the same fund the ruling should apply.

Yesterday, Mr. Coy completed his organization to handle the financial end of the civil works program. He designated city and town treasurers as assistant disbursing officers who will be limited to making payments for payrolls and for non-personal services. There are 1,000,000 blank checks ready for distribution, so that there will be no delay in paying out the money.

All expenditures in cities and towns will be certified by the civil works certifying agent, who will be the chairman of the welfare board for the community. This will be true generally but changes will be made in certain cases.

Seeks Film Career

MURIEL WINDOW
Once a Follies girl, she went to Hollywood recently in her own plane. With her was an air-minded parrot. She said a film contract brought her west.

The disbursing officers will be bonded and the state board has arranged to bond the men for $5000 each, lowest sum obtainable with one company. This will expedite matters considerably, it was said. Checks will be made out in triplicate, one for the payee, one for the state civil works board, and the third for the office of H. H. Barraclough, special disbursing agent of the board. Mr. Barraclough is the disbursing officer of the Boston office of the veterans administration.

While Chairman Bartlett and other men passing on civil works projects were urging the community leaders to set aside sums for "white collar" workers, particularly women, Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, who was appointed head of the women's division of the CWA for this state, made her first appointment.

She named Mrs. Cornelia G. McMahon of Brighton as director of the Boston unit of her organization. Mrs. McMahon is a member of the board of welfare commissioners of Boston, and recently was a candidate for the Boston school committee. Later, Mrs. Carol L. Chase of Cambridge was named to a similar post in that city.

Boston department heads conferred to a late hour last night working on civil works projects cheered by the thought that the first batch of men engaged on civil projects in the city had begun working earlier in the day at the Hyde Park golf course, Franklin Park, Franklin field, and the East Boston airport.

Mayor Curley, who was asked to plan on 10,000 jobs in Boston to be divided among welfare recipients and their unemployed relatives, said he would not employ them on welfare projects, but would give them the money to do so.

It is the purpose of this project to give employment to approximately 10,000 men in cleaning, spraying and whitewashing these barns. This will give added protection to the supply of our cities and towns and will aid in preventing the spread of disease in our dairy herds. It is proposed to have 150 work units of six men each, one man charge, equipped with spraying materials and equipment necessary to clean the places. Each group will be assigned to a locality and farmers contacted by telephone or personal visit. Those who do not do the work done it will sign a letter indicating they have had the opportunity to receive this service.

Commissioner Gilbert of the agriculture department told of the plight of farmers, hard pressed for money and losing money because they could not comply with health regulations, in a communication to Chairman Bartlett. The letter follows, in part:

Many dairy farmers have been receiving a price for their milk during the last few years, that is less than the cost of production and, necessarily, they have been unable to use the most acceptable methods for providing a clean and sanitary place for the production of high quality milk.

Many of these farmers, in making curtailments on different items relating to the management of dairy farms, have neglected to clean and spray the places where the dairy cows are kept and have neglected to whitewash the walls at regular periods in order to bring about the sanitary conditions for the production of clean milk.

$15,000 IN BONDS

Relatives Seek to Recover Them in Court Fight

[Special Dispatch to The Herald]
PROVIDENCE, Nov. 23.—Mrs. Honora J. Cooper, late of Providence gave bonds worth $15,000 to Pierre J. Morin, best friend and very kind to her.

This testimony was given in superior court before Judge Alexander Churchill today by James J. McGovern, attorney. Relatives and heirs of the estate are asking Judge Churchill to return the bonds of the estate, because they charge, Morin became wrongfully possessed of the bonds while he was Mrs. Cooper's chauffeur.

Morin asserts that he never was employed by the late widow, but that he was keeping company with her intending to marry her when his financial status improved. He said that Mrs. Cooper had given him the bonds as a gift, while they were riding in his car.

McGovern stated today during his testimony that Mrs. Cooper had sent for him on Oct. 7, 1932, the day before her death and informed him that she wanted to make a will. While asking her questions relative to her property McGovern said Mrs. Cooper told him that she had given Morin the bonds because she thought him one of her been very kind to her. She also willed to Morin her house and furniture and the residue of her estate. The estate is valued at more than $40,000.

WALMSLEY IS CALLED IN OVERTON CASE

Mayor Joint Leader with Huey Long Of New Orleans Machine

NEW ORLEANS, Nov. 23 (AP).—Seeking more data on the expenditures and activities of the forces behind the election of Senator John H. Overton, the investigating Senate committee sitting here today issued a subpoena for Mayor T. Semmes Walmsley, head of the old regular Choctaw organization and, with Senator Huey P. Long, a joint leader of the local Long-Walmsley political machine.

The subpoena, for the mayor followed appearance on the witness stand of Mrs. Hilda Phelps Hammond, millitant chairman of the women's committee of Louisiana, which is seeking to oust both Long and Overton from the Senate.

She charged the Senate committee with neglecting the financial end of the campaign, demanding that both Long and his political treasurer, Seymour Welks, be recalled to give more facts on expenditures and insisted that

BOWKER LEAVES STOCK TO 25 EMPLOYEES

N. Y. Publisher Left Most of Estate To Widow

NEW YORK, Nov. 23 (AP).—Twenty-five employees are bequeathed stock in the publishing firm of R. R. Bowker and Company under the will of its late president, Richard Rogers Bowker, which was filed today for probate.

Bowker, who died on Nov. 12, at his home in Glendale, Mass., directed that his widow, Mrs. Alice M. Bowker, receive a life income from the residue of his estate, amount undetermined. The will leaves three shares of stock, with a par value of $100 each, to 10 employees with at least 10 years service each; two shares to each of seven employees with five years service; and one share each to eight employees with two years service.

The Laurel Hill Association and the Stockbridge Library Association, both of Stockbridge, Mass., share in the residue after Mrs. Bowker's death. Among specific bequests was one of $250 to Martin Dooley, of Glendale, Mass., who also receives personal effects.

HARD PRESSED FARMERS

Commissioner Arthur W. Gilbert of the agriculture department said that hard-pressed farmers could not comply with health regulations and were being barred from the Massachusetts market.

With the barns cleaned, the regulations would be complied with and the farmer, with better milk, would be allowed to sell in Massachusetts markets.

A check of the figures yesterday revealed that the state civil works board, which has been in existence just a week, has awarded in three days a total of $4,088,137 to provide work for 13,175 men throughout the state.

Yesterday, Chairman Bartlett deputized Robert F. Bradford, assistant secretary to Gov. Ely, and John J. Fitzgerald, engineer to the board, to assist him and State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley in passing on applications. Working at top speed, the four men passed on a large number of projects, among which were:

WELLESLEY—60 men—$10,000 to drain South swamp.
ATTLEBORO—122 men—$20,381 for highways and rail removal.
BELMONT—160 men—$27,784 for sewer work.

men, and that the federal re-employment service would have to decide the question. He referred the union leaders to Col. W. S. Quinby, who is head of the service in Boston. Morlarty and Ellis intend to see Quinby and if they cannot obtain his approval for a union preference will endeavor to bring the matter to the attention of authorities at Washington.

Atty.-Gen. Homer Cummings has ruled in favor of union men, they contended, and as the money comes from the same fund the ruling should apply.

Yesterday, Mr. Coy completed his organization to handle the financial end of the civil works program. He designated city and town treasurers as assistant disbursing officers who will be limited to making payments for payrolls and for non-personal services. There are 1,000,000 blank checks ready for distribution, so that there will be no delay in paying out the money.

All expenditures in cities and towns will be certified by the civil works certifying agent, who will be the chairman of the welfare board for the community. This will be true generally but changes will be made in certain cases.

While Chairman Bartlett and other men passing on civil works projects were urging the community lead to set aside sums for "white collar workers, particularly women. Mrs. L. B. Rantoul, who was appointed head of the women's division of the CWA for this state, made her first appointment.

She named Mrs. Cornelia G. McMahon of Brighton as director of the Boston unit of her organization. Mrs. McMahon is a member of the board of commissioners of Boston, a recently was a candidate for the Boston school committee. Later, Mrs. C. L. Chase of Cambridge was named to similar post in that city.

FIRST PAY FOR WORKS PROJECTS

Thousands More Must Have Jobs—Fund to Aid Teachers

BY LESTER ALLEN

Over half of the $12,000,000 assigned to Massachusetts for re-employment of 97,000 men and women has been apportioned, it was learned last night, but to date only 24,197 men have been assured of employment in the many community projects examined and approved by the board.

In the six days that the State Civil Works Board, headed by Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett, has been sitting, $6,889,039 has been allotted to the cities and towns, and yesterday 632 men received pay checks totalling $976.

Chairman Bartlett, is to go on the radio today to explain the aims and methods of CWA. Massachusetts led the States in being first to put through payroll under the works plan, for at noon yesterday 183 men were being paid off at Brookline Town Hall with Matthew McNelly, assistant town treasurer, acting as disbursing agent for the government. Gardner, ran a close second with the payroll being handed out about 1 o'clock to 76 workers and Gloucester paid off during the afternoon to 99 workers.

Herbert H. Barracough, disbursing agent for the Veterans' Bureau, worked all day yesterday with his staff and until late last night approving the payrolls for many cities and towns as they came to the Postoffice building. The Springfield payroll for over 200 men was paid over to Cornelius Phillips, superintendent of streets and engineering, Springfield, last, as he received a batch of checks for civil works employees from H. H. Barracough at the Federal building yesterday.

intendent of streets and engineer of Springfield, late yesterday afternoon, part of it was distributed last night. Although the check for $1,612,000 was expected to be sent from Washington to pay off Massachusetts CWA workers, at the last moment a telegraphed authorization to pay was sent to Barracough, who is acting as the government's disbursing agent, and he, in turn, will distribute it to assistant disbursing agents, in the large majority, treasurers of cities and towns.

Stagger Plan of Pay Days

An order was also sent from Washington yesterday by Corrington Gill, director of statistics and accounts of the Civil Works programme, to William E. Coy, member of the Massachusetts Civil Works Board, to adopt a stagger method of paying off to relieve the extra burden placed upon the State disbursing agent, in this case Barracough and his staff. The stagger plan will have a pay-day every day in the week with cities and towns in various sections of the State all having a different payday. The order from Washington also commanded that no CWA worker should go longer than seven days at any one time without a payday.

The instant recognition of the CWA plan of employment was revealed yesterday with the announcement of employment applications by the State employment offices in Boston which are handling registration for Boston jobs under CWA. From Nov. 1 until Nov. 15, when CWA was announced, 150 men applied for jobs. And in the weeks since Nov. 18, 10,000 men have filed their applications in the three Boston offices, located at 189 Congress street, the South Amory and on Nashua street.

From Nov. 1 to Nov. 15, 500 women filed applications for jobs, and during the past week 150 have applied for work. M. J. McCartin, director of the State employment service, stated last night that his offices, manned by 100 workers, were swamped, but he believed the peak of the pressure of applications had been passed and that within a few days every unemployed person in Boston will have been registered.

Striving to place the unemployed white collar worker in a job, as well as his brawnier brother of the unskilled and manual labor classifications, each delegation that conferred with Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett at the State House yesterday was specifically instructed to formulate some plan to include white collar workers.

The State Department of Education, with its educational plan, solved the problem of unemployed school teachers, all of whom are off the welfare lists, but who have been waiting for two to three years for employment. Commissioner of Education Payson Smith conferred with Chairman Bartlett on a plan and secured approval for the expenditure of $25,000 a month to provide work for unemployed school teachers.

The teachers will be put to work forming day and night classes in occupational subjects, foreign-born classes in general subjects, rehabilitation work and classes in general educational subjects for all adults. Out of the $25,000 appropriation $10,000 is to be used for nursery classes to be run in conjunction with the regular school systems. The teachers to be employed by this project will be drawn from the available lists of unemployed teachers now on file at the Department of Education. It is estimated that at least 100 teachers are unemployed in Massachusetts, the majority of them graduates of Massachusetts normal schools, who have not been placed since their graduation in a teaching post.

Relatives Seek to Recover Them in Court Fight

[Special Dispatch to The Herald]

PROVIDENCE, Nov. 23—Mrs. Honora J. Cooper, late of Providence gave bonds worth $15,000 to Pierre J. Morin, auto mechanic, because "he was her best friend and very kind to her."

This testimony was given in superior court before Judge Alexander Churchill today by James J. McGovern, attorney. Relatives and heirs of the estate are asking Judge Churchill to return the bonds of the estate, because they charge, Morin became wrongfully possessed of the bonds while he was Mrs. Cooper's chauffeur.

Morin asserts that he never was employed by the late widow, but that he was keeping company with her intending to marry her when his financial status improved. He said that Mrs. Cooper had given him the bonds as a gift, while they were riding in his car.

McGovern stated today during his testimony that Mrs. Cooper had sent for him on Oct. 7, 1932, the day before her death and informed him that she wanted to make a will. While asking her questions relative to her property McGovern said Mrs. Cooper told him that she had given Morin the bonds because she thought him one of her very kind to her. She also willed to Morin her house and furniture and the residue of her estate. The estate is valued at more than $40,000.

Mayor Joint Leader with Huey Long

NEW ORLEANS, Nov. 23 (AP)—Seeking more data on the expenditures and activities of the forces behind the 1932 election of Senator John H. Overton, the investigating Senate committee sitting here today issued a subpoena for Mayor T. Semmes Walmsley, head of the old regular Cretshaw organization and, with Senator Huey P. Long, a joint leader of the local Long-Walmsley political machine.

The subpoena for the mayor followed appearance on the witness stand of Mrs. Hilda Phelps Hammond, militant chairman of the women's committee of Louisiana, which is seeking to oust both Long and Overton from the Senate.

She charged the Senate committee with neglecting the financial end of the campaign, demanded that both Long and his political treasurer, Seymour Weiss, be recalled to give more facts on expenditures and insisted that

To Widow

NEW YORK, Nov. 23 (AP)—Twenty-five employees are bequeathed stock in the publishing firm of R. R. Bowker and Company under the will of its late president, Richard Rogers Bowker, which was filed today for probate.

Bowker, who died on Nov. 12, at his home in Glendale, Mass., directed that his widow, Mrs. Alice M. Bowker, receive a life income from the residue of his estate, amount undetermined.

The will leaves three shares of stock, with a par value of $100 each, to 10 employees with at least 10 years service each; two shares to each of seven employees with five years service; and one share each to eight employees with two years service.

The Laurel Hill Association and the Stockbridge Library Association, both of Stockbridge, Mass., share in the residue after Mrs. Bowker's death.

The problem facing Chairman Bartlett and his associates now is to spread the $5,129,961 remaining to be apportioned before Dec. 15, the last day for approval of work projects, so as to provide for over 72,900 jobs. Chairman Bartlett stated last night that he confidently expects to have the $5,000 quota of unemployed men and women in Massachusetts working at jobs by Dec. 15.

He was not concerned over the comparatively small number of jobs lined up by the expenditure of over half of the $12,000,000 works fund for Massachusetts. "It will all come out even," he said. "We expect to hit the mark exactly."

It was believed, however, that more money is to be forthcoming for Massachusetts, owing to the number of unemployed who must be provided with work. No indication was given yesterday that additional funds are to be provided, but it was stated by all the members of the Civil Works Board that despite the expenditure of half the fund with seemingly slight results, the projects approved have been designed to employ more men as time goes on.

The projects—the reconstruction and widening of a section of Concord av and converting of Colran's Pitt into a playground—are already under way with more than 800 men on the payroll. For this project, construction of new larger water mains in North Cambridge, costing $50,000, has been approved and 200 additional men start work on Monday morning. The balance of $17,626 is left available for other projects. Mayor Russell said that he would urge the approval of the State Emergency Finance Board to use this sum to alleviate distress among unemployed Cambridge women. He said he would have cloth made by obtaining from Federal Government and that it would be employed women who had been put to work making garments for the recipients of public welfare aid.

notification that the city council had passed loan orders for Boston's share. The program follows: $1,000,000 for reconstruction of streets; $1,000,000 for reconstruction and replacement of sewers; $350,000 to replace the Brookline avenue water main; $1,000,000 for a new West Roxbury high school; $1,000,000 for a new intermediate school in South Boston; $1,500,000 for a new building at Boston City Hospital, and repairs and alterations to existing buildings.

Mayor Curley has prepared an additional program which will use up the $10,000,000 allotted. No mention of the Huntington avenue subway was made in the supplementary program.

CIVIL WORKS PROJECTS

No mention was made yesterday, also, when the civil works program was presented by Boston of the Strandway project sponsored by Mayor Curley which seems to have struck a snag. Chairman Bartlett approved the following civil works projects:

$8720 to hire 22 men to repair voting booths; $7260 to hire 44 men to consolidate tax accounts; $19,003.25 to hire 33 men for general repair work at the Suffolk county courthouse; $2805 to hire 16 men to consolidate vital statistics; $58,897 to hire 110 men to grade roads and repair buildings on Long Island.

Similarly he held up a project submitted by the city planning board to hire 471 persons at a cost of $123,360 to make an intensive study of the city relative to slum clearance, rehabilitation of run-down areas, modernization of buildings, zoning laws, mortgage maps, rentals and characters of buildings, housing accommodations and other data.

He explained that the state housing board, through its chairman, Sidney T. Strickland, had presented a project to employ 200 engineers, architects, landscape engineers, clerks and draughtsmen for a similar study in Boston, Worcester, Springfield, Fall River, Holyoke, Lawrence, Lowell and Haverhill. Whether the state board or the city planning board can do the better job in this city will be decided at a conference soon.

GRAFTON COMPLAINT

Residents of Grafton complained that Wilfred F. Prue, chairman of the board of public welfare and local civil works administrator in that town, had refused to give out jobs until the recipient had promised to trade at a certain store. Mr. Prue denied the charge vehemently to State Treasurer Hurley, who handled the matter, and Mr. Cleary will visit the complainants in Grafton today.

Mayor Charles S. Ashley of New Bedford appeared with projects before Chairman Bartlett. Bluntly, the chairman told him that approval would be given projects to provide work for 1000 to 1200 men but "the quota is 2000 workers for New Bedford." The disinclination of the mayor to disrupt the labor market in New Bedford by paying more than prevailing wages for skilled labor nearly caused a halt in the proceedings, but Chairman Bartlett

State CWA Employees Will Be Paid Today

State employees will be paid today at the state treasurer's office from 1 to 5 P. M. and city and town officials who have been using the outer office will not be allowed to congregate there this afternoon.

Special arrangements will be made to handle the community leaders, it was announced by State Treasurer Hurley. Projects are being considered at rooms 249 and 427. Only large projects, or those involving matters of policy, are being referred to Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett, State Treasurer Hurley and William B. Coy, all sitting in the treasurer's private office.

settled matters by establishing 60 cents an hour rate for semi-skilled labor. Again, Chairman Bartlett reiterated his stand that more work must be provided for those who managed to stay off the welfare lists but are in need of a job.

"You've got to put 2000 men to work pretty soon, regardless of cost," he told on the question of material. "I should like to have your next batch of projects presented Monday." Chairman Bartlett suggested that CWA workers be assigned to the administrative end of the projects. "Forget it," thus the chairman advised the mayor when the matter of civil service was brought up. Mayor Ashley agreed to present the projects. Ashley feels that savings on welfare will permit him to buy his city's share of the materials.

DIRECTOR FOR MILTON

G. F. Moulton in Charge of Federal Re-employment

George F. Moulton, Milton attorney and former school committeeman, was appointed federal director of re-employment for Milton by the Norfolk county federal re-employment director, John Scott, Jr., of Quincy, yesterday. Moulton, who lives at 58 Plymouth avenue, East Milton, was formerly a trust officer of the Harvard Trust Company in Cambridge, and was on the Milton school committee from 1925 to 1931, serving as chairman during the last year of his term. He is a town meeting member and is moderator of the East Congregational Church of East Milton.

Assurance that the more than 200 persons who registered last week with the town unemployment committee before the federal blanks and machinery were available will not lose was made by Moulton on taking up his new duties. Such persons, he said, will keep their positions in the order of applicants and may re-register on the proper blanks in the near future.

The Milton board of selectmen will meet tonight to take up the various projects submitted to them under the civil works program. Milton has been allowed $36,000. Local projects totalling about $60,000 have been suggested, and from these a number will be selected and submitted later this week to Joseph Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts civil works board.

been allotted $7000 by the civil works administration for the construction of new quarters on the site of the present building in Bassett square. About 50 men, all to be enrolled from Chelsea's welfare and unemployed lists, will be given work starting Friday and lasting for about 10 weeks.

With the government's $7000, the post is spending $3500 from its building fund. Virtually all of the money will go toward wages, as the new quarters will be the reconstructed mess and recreation hall now on the Chelsea Naval Hospital grounds. The hall will be torn down and then reconstructed, but more modernized.

The building now occupied by the post and to be torn down was that used

UNLIMITED JOBS FOR BAY STATE

Mistaken Idea Only $12,000,000 Quota for Work Here

BY JOHN GRIFFIN

An army of 35,000 men and women marching happily from the dreary depths of unemployment to a variety of jobs, increased payrolls and sales records in every city and town, the practical wiping out of the welfare lists in scores of municipalities, and the steady flow of money amounting to $7,000,000 into the communities throughout the State, form the principal chapters in the record of the Civil Works Board handling the programme in this State.

NO LIMIT

Yesterday, for the first time since the programme was initiated, the board, badly in need of rest after sessions through days, nights and Sundays, took a day off. But the steady handing out of funds and employment of people will be resumed this morning and carried on with a new impetus that is expected to find every city and town and every tax-paying body, including counties and some school committees, putting people to work.

There is no set limit for any community seeking funds. Although it is generally believed by municipal officials that $12,000,000 is the maximum quota for the Massachusetts cities and towns, this belief was engendered because such a figure was mentioned as a tentative allotment, and the fact is that there is no limit yet placed on the amount.

If Massachusetts communities present enough legitimate projects before Dec. 15, the money will be provided to take care of them, Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett said last night. This State may get only $12,000,000 but that will be because not enough projects have been developed. But it is believed possible by Chairman Bartlett that at least $20,000,000 will be forthcoming from the government if the cities and towns can spend it in legitimate projects.

Chairman Bartlett said that unless the 56 towns which have not yet applied come through with projects soon, the money they might have had will be shared by other cities and towns which are alert to the possibilities.

Jobs for 97,000

The board has emphasized repeatedly that the main thing is to get 97,000 persons to work in this State. More than one-third of that number have already been put to work.

Many of the Mayors and Selectmen are finding it difficult to line up projects that fall within the provisions of the CWA. The projects must be useful and must be completed by Feb. 15, or if not definitely completed by that time, must be of such a nature that the work done up to that date forms a usable and useful property.

Even if the 97,000 are enrolled on jobs before Dec. 15, there are an additional 25,000 jobs to be filled by federal projects in this State under the Civil Works programme, according to an interpretation of Robert Kelsa, field representative of the Civil Works Administration, who has just completed a survey of the work done here.

Federal Census in 1934 Under Consideration

Objects Are to Get Line on Population Changes and to Furnish Jobs

By Oliver McKee, Jr.

Special to the Transcript:

Washington, Dec. 2.—Another census may be taken by the Federal Government in 1934. The Civil Works Administration is studying plans for a new national inventory, in order to provide jobs, and to give Federal officials a picture of the changes in population and industry that have taken place since 1930. The estimated cost, about $10,000,000, is considered a drop in the bucket in comparison with huge grants voted for the recovery program. Ordinarily it would be 50¢ before another national census would be made.

The advantages urged for a census in 1934 is that it would provide data about population changes during a period of depression, and the changes in the relationship between country and city, and agriculture and industry. A census will provide temporary employment for several hundreds of thousands of enumerators, statisticians, etc., and would reach a class of workers that have been especially affected by hard times.

Migration Between City and Farm

Government experts already have given much thought to the problem of rural-urban migration and national welfare. Understanding among these authorities is O. E. Baker, of the Department of Agriculture. In his chapter on agricultural and forest land, part of the study "Recent and Prospective Changes in the United States," Dr. Baker reached the following conclusions: "Of these things we may be sure: that the soil resources are being depleted and often wasted, that there will be further progress in agricultural production, that there will be notable regional and local shifts in production, that a decreasing proportion of the population engaged in full time farming will be able to produce plenty for everyone in the nation (event, and both public and private action will be necessary to solve the vast problems of land utilization, and that the family farm and individual initiative will remain characteristic features of American agriculture."

In his presidential address before the Association of American Geographers, delivered in December, 1932, and revised in a reprint issue in April of this year, Dr. Baker reviewed in some detail his observations on the subject of rural-urban migration. The depression, he points out, has reversed the old trend of migration from farm to city; in 1932 there were a net migration to farms of over half a million. If we add to this the estimated excess of 468,000 of births over deaths on farms in 1932, farm population would seem to have gained during the year about one million. This he said, is a trend so marked for upwards of a century in favor of urban migration has been sharply reversed.

America Grown From the Soil

"The American Nation," he reminds us, "has sprung out of the soil. Less than a century ago about three-fourths of the people lived on farms; now the proportion is only about one-fourth. But many of those who now live in the cities were born and reared in a rural environment. The urban civilization of the United States, with its magnificent capitalist system of production, has grown out of a rural civilization having a family system of production, and has derived from this rural system no small part of its sustenance. That 'rugged individualism' in economic life which has recently been marked the American system is largely the outgrowth of the democratic rural family system, which, in turn, has developed under the influence of free land and frontier life."

The regional distribution of population increase will show marked changes, if urban unemployment remains widespread and if the farm population becomes "frozen" on the farms. On this point Dr. Baker prophesies: "Urban population will decline, within a few years, unless there be immigration from abroad, and if the present net migration from the cities persists, the decrease in urban population which apparently occurred during 1932 will continue."

South Likely to Gain Most

The increase of population will tend to be in the more densely settled farming areas, notably in the States south of the Potomac and Ohio rivers. This will be owing, first, to the fact that about 60 percent of the migration from rural to urban areas during the decade 1920-1930 was from the Southern States and that the migration to the farms is now and hereafter will continue to be composed mostly of these migrants returning "home." The increase in population in the South will be rapid, secondly, in the fact that the high rate on southern farms is high, and a migration to the cities causes a rapid natural increase of population will set in.

"The excess of births over deaths, as well as any migration from the cities, would also result in an increase of population in the corn belt in the wheat regions, and even in the rural sections of the Northeastern States. The decrease of population will occur mostly where the birth rate is low, which is unique in the cities nearly everywhere, and will, therefore, be most evident in the densely urban States of the Pacific Coast unless the extensive migration from eastern cities is resumed and of the Northeast, including Ohio, Illinois, and Missouri. But unless migration from these cities is heavy, the increase in urban population will be small and will be only some of the cities during the next decade since it will require a net migration of over a million to be replaced by a rising birth rate."

Dr. Baker favors the further decentralization of industry, continued suburban development, and a rapid growth of the village population of the nation. The village, he believes, offers a solution of many of our population problems. Based on these and related questions, he has outlined for next year's census if the Administration decides to proceed, the part of the civil works program.

GRILLING JOB, BUT WORTH IT

Here's a Pen Picture of Man Who Is Giving Money Away to Put Men to Work

BY JOHN GRIFFIN

A Real Dictator

He doesn't know yet whether he has done, and is doing, things that may eventually bounce back at him and bring him plenty of work. And, further, more, he doesn't seem to care. He was given a job to do, told that he is, for these particular purposes, the United States government. In a sense, he is no more nor less than a benevolent dictator.

This man is one who was little known to the average citizen of Massachusetts. His name, until a few weeks ago, was seldom in the newspapers. But, throughout the Commonwealth, people are saying, "Who is this man Bartlett?" On the strength of what he has shown in a period of only a few weeks, he is, in whispers being passed from one to another in all sections of the State, the next Democratic candidate for Governor.

If Joseph W. Bartlett, lawyer, city solicitor of Newton, chairman of the State Emergency Finance Board, chairman of the State Emergency Public Works Board, and chairman of the Civil Works Board, has any political ambitions, he is keeping them quiet to himself. If he has any political ambitions it is passing strange for he certainly does not act like a politician at least not like the popular conception of a politician.

Works Without Salary

His position as head of the Civil Works Board, which has of late overshadowed the other official responsibilities that are his, was handed to him in a hurry. It pays no salary. It is a patriotic duty. There was a job that had to be done and Joseph W. Bartlett found it dropped neatly in his lap. He could have brushed it aside, but he didn't. He grasped it and held it tight and, though confusion reigned, he plunged into the sector where the going was toughest.

It is conceivable that the job may build him politically. It is just as likely that it will ruin whatever political ambitions he has, if any. Regardless of political outcome, this observer, who has sat in at most of the board's sessions, is convinced that politics are completely and definitely sent from the considerations of the man. He is devoted to the task at hand. He is not a grant favors. He cannot concede anything to political timeliness. He must make some political figures angry. He must call officials to order. He must do one thing, or he will fail. And he is expecting failure.

Glutton for Work

The man is a glutton for work. He starts early in the morning, along with his fellow board members, State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, along with William F. Coe, and he may call it a day at 6 o'clock in the evening, or at 7 o'clock, or he may continue working until midnight. If there is work to do, it must be done, regardless of the hour.

benign faces of a long line of State treasurers look down upon a scene that is far beyond any imaginative financial dreams they ever had.

GIVING MILLIONS AWAY

They are looking at a man, representing the United States government, who is giving away $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 and asking nothing in return. No payment, no interest, nothing except that men and women who need jobs be put to work. It is truly an amazing scene, and one almost expects the portraits on the wall to quiver and tremble in violent protest against the activities that are going on under their very eyes.

Barlett is full of quaint New England phrases, which roll from his tongue in amazingly apt description of a problem. He has the happy faculty of simplifying a problem so that it can be expressed almost in a word. An example of this was his statement to one Mayor who presented a rather indecisive programme and hemmed and hawed over making decisions on contemplated projects.

Fish or Cut Bait

"Look here," Bartlett demanded, "you'll have to fish, cut bait, or go ashore." Sheepishly the city official grinned and soon took his departure. A few days later he returned with his projects in ship-shape order and received ready approval.

Let us sit right down at the table with the civil works chairman. The city engineer, commissioner of lighting and streets, and the fire commissioner of a certain Greater Boston city enter the room through a door held open by a key. The chairman nods at their introductions, and immediately asks for their applications. The papers are placed in front of him and he goes over them rapidly.

"Here is one for resurfacing of a street. In your opinion, Mr. Engineer, does that work have to be done? Will it stand behind it with your reputation?" Will your city stand the expense of materials? All right, approved.

The approved project is tossed to the secretary to be recorded, and the next application is taken up. Here is a doubtful one. "I'll have to pray over this one," Bartlett says. "Call me up tomorrow. There is a legal angle that must be thrashed out."

Must Dig Up More

Next, "This one looks all right. Approved."

Next, "Nothing doing on this one." Finally all have been either approved or turned down. "Now," asserts Bartlett, "the total number of men who are going to put to work under these projects is 1600."

With some pride the officials agree, but their satisfaction is short lived. For Bartlett says, "Well, think up some more projects. You've got to put 2000 to work in your city. This is a programme of putting people to work. Use your imagination and get some more projects in here as fast as you can."

The officials mutter a mild protest about money. "You get the projects and the United States government will get you the money," the chairman declares. "Your job is to provide work. We'll give you the money."

The officials retire and a new group arrives. Similar questions are shot at them, and a rapid scratch of a pencil gives them thousands of dollars to spend on payrolls. Patiently, Bartlett tries to explain that they should not try to spend their projects down, that they should bring in every project they can think of that comes within the rules and regulations of the civil works administration.

Hard Putting Ideas Over

It is difficult to get the idea over. The mayors have been so used to hearing protests over the spending of money on public works that they simply cannot conceive of a plan which insists upon them spending all the money they can find. For Bartlett hammers it into them, but he is confronted by an appalling lack of imagination.

One would think that the mayor of any city would have scores of public projects in mind. For years he has been saying, "If we only had the money we could put people to work." But now, with the money at hand, they find themselves mentally handicapped for

TO CHECK ON WORKS APPROVED

Board to Spend Day in Analyzing Funds Allotted

The Civil Works Board, after approving projects totaling the expenditure of nearly $1,000,000 yesterday and providing work for approximately 5400 men and women, decided to halt the allotment activities for a day and check up on the work already done. Today, the second Sunday in which the work of the board has been continued, will be devoted to an analysis of the situation and a check-up of what has been done to date.

ABOUT $8,000,000

Out of the session today is expected to come definite figures on how much money has been allotted and how many people have been put back to work. It is the first chance the board has had to give time to the work done thus far, as every session has been given over to the quick allotment of funds and speed in getting men and women to work.

It is believed, from general observations of the board's work, that approximately $8,000,000 of the State's tentative allotment of $12,000,000 has been declared, and that more than half of the quota of 5500 persons have been placed in employment. The check today will permit the board to judge future allotments.

Medford Told to Hustle

Before calling it a day the board chairman, Joseph W. Bartlett, admonished representatives of Medford to "get a hustle on." All the projects submitted by Medford were held up because they were not of the type coming under the provisions of the Civil Works programme.

"Medford has got to hustle," Bartlett declared. "They have put only 300 to work and we want at least 1000 jobs provided in that city. Medford is an up-and-coming city and they should have some action."

For the first time since the board started to function, town officials who were appointed officials under the programme arrived to protest against not getting any salary for their work. They were from Grafton. Wilfred E. True, against whom charges of favoritism were filed last week and found unjustified, told Chairman Bartlett that he could receive pay as administrator in Grafton, and tried to resign.

To Work Without Salary

True refused to allow him to resign and True finally agreed to take the job without salary. He is also chairman of the board of public welfare in that town and receives a salary for that job.

One of the largest projects approved was that of the Metropolitan District Commission, calling for the employment of 375 men and the expenditure of $140,000. This approval increased the number of civil works employees hired through the commission to 2200. The new work will be done in the Blue Hills, the upper Charles River district, the Middlesex Fells, Revere Beach and Old Colony Parkway. It also calls for cleaning out the mud in Fellsmead Tond, Malden.

To Wipe Out Apple Pests

Another large project which received approval was one of the State Department of Public Works to employ men on small jobs along the State highways in all sections of the State. The project entails an expenditure of $161,000 and the employment of approximately 700 men.

The State Department of Agriculture received approval for the employment of 24 additional men in the eradication of apple pests throughout the State. The expenditure authorized was $3,000, which brings the allotment to date to that department up to some $30,000 and brought the total number of men at work to more than 1000.

Pay Day Tomorrow

Dr. Arthur W. Gilbert, commissioner of agriculture, appeared before the board with a project calling for the employment of 150 men at an expenditure of $25,000 for the digging of water holes outside of hydrant areas of the towns. The object is to provide facilities for fire fighting in farm houses and buildings located on the outskirts of communities. The plan will be studied further before approval is given.

Three hundred men and women employed in Boston under the civil works programme will receive their first federal week's pay tomorrow morning. City Treasurer Edmund L. Dolan announced last night. When only 77 working as white-collar workers in the library and park department were paid off on schedule yesterday, the other 200 raised a ringing protest. Finally it was explained that because payrolls were made out in duplicate instead of triplicate, the pay was held up until tomorrow.

Delay in Getting Tools

Horatio Nelson, in charge of the civil works employment section at Young's Hotel, explained that only 377 men and women had been at work long enough to receive a full week's pay. As to the number of people already at work under the programme, he could offer no estimate, explaining that the statistics would not be tabulated until Tuesday or Wednesday.

Delay in placing thousands, he said, was due to lack of tools and materials. He expressed confidence, however, that East will have its full quota at work before Dec. 15.

FIRE AT EASTPORT, ME.

EASTPORT, Me., Dec. 2 (AP)—Fire today destroyed a two and a half story sardine factory owned by the Booth Fisheries Company, at an estimated loss of $100,000.

Giving Money for Jobs

But such is the swiftness of change in these hectic days that the scene around the table appears almost normal. It could not, of course, have been even partly possible a few short years ago, and it would probably have raised a tempest of protest only a few months ago. The scene presents, as clear as a cameo, a picture that concentrates at the tremendous changes that have taken place in what is only a moment in the life of a nation.

In one swift stroke, the philosophy that gave birth to this scene cut through what was for hundreds of years thought to be an immutable system of individualistic enterprise. That "rugged individualism" about which orators spout furnished the base for the country's greatness. It seemed hardly possible that it could be thrown aside without a protest. But the new conception of government, popularly called the "New Deal," has treated it roughly.

Cutting Red Tape

At this table, the gray-haired man represents an ideal that also seemed impossible of achievement. He is the living refutation of the claim that "red tape" cannot be cut. For a good many years, the American people have been looking hopefully to a cutting of the red tape in civil service, but somehow or other, the tape became a tangle that always trapped those who handled it. Thousands of promises have been given, but few are the men who have succeeded in eliminating what Webster calls "official formality and delay." This man, of course, has not actually achieved freedom of action and the elimination of delay through his own personal work, except to a more or less limited degree. The times made the situation. But he seized an opportunity with that sense of feeling and regard for the situation that is an ingredient of genius. He has expressed, and shown, an utter disregard for the deadening routine formality that acts as a drag to democracies in critical periods.

A Real Dictator

He doesn't know yet whether he has done, and is doing, things that may eventually bounce back at him and bring him plenty of work. And, furthermore, he doesn't seem to care. He was given a job to do, to tell that he is, for these particular purposes, the United States government. In a sense, he is no more nor less than a beneficent dictator.

It is conceivable that the job may build him politically. It is just as likely that it will rule out his political ambitions. He has, it may be said, the political outcome, this observer, who has sat in at most of the board's sessions, is convinced that politics are completely and definitely absent from the considerations of the man. He is devoted to the strict line of his duty and grant favors. He cannot concede anything to political timeliness. He must take some political figures angry. He must call officials to order. He must do these things, or he will fail. And he is expecting failure.

Glutton for Work

The man is a glutton for work. He starts early in the morning, along with his fellow board members, State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley and William E. Coffey, and he may call it a day at 6 o'clock in the evening, or at 7 o'clock, or 8 o'clock. If there is work to do, it must be done, regardless of the hour. At times weariness clouds his face, but he soon bounces back in the limp manner that betrays exhaustion. His eyes are bloodshot and his lower jaw drops. Then he jumps forward with a start, exclaims: "We've got to get people to work," and he once more alerts and ready to action. Patient officials who have spent an hour or two waiting for craft, there should have been a let-down in interest, or at least an emotional letdown, when the Governor left the hall. But Bartlett arose and started a cold, unemotional analysis of the civil works program, interpreting each section and each paragraph of the rules and regulations.

Before a crowd that was as hazy on that subject as any group could be, he answered hundreds of questions, firmly and definitely, yes or no, with no equivocation and no dodging. The amazing result was that this group of men and women, which an hour before knew practically nothing about the subject of civil works, literally stood up and cheered him. Voluntarily and without prompting, they rose in acclaim. And the chairman showed not the slightest indication of pride or any other feeling.

To Work at Once

He went directly from the auditorium to the board's meeting room, and within an hour had approved projects designed to put people to work on the following morning. From that moment on, he and his board have sat almost continually morning, afternoon, night and Sunday, and they have allotted some thing like $8,000,000 and put approximately 60,000 men and women to work.

It has been a remarkable performance, and to those privileged to witness it, a joy. Anyone who likes forthright and unqualified action could not fail to respond to the work of this board. The observer might doubt, however, the ultimate wisdom of the plan, wonder where the money is coming from, and offer similar academic objections, but watching this man do a job that is assigned to him—a most difficult job—the observer would be forced to use superlatives in description.

Bartlett is full of quiet New England phrases, which roll from his tongue in amazingly apt description of a problem. He has the happy faculty of simplifying a problem so that it can be expressed almost in a word. An example of this was his statement to the Mayor who presented a rather indecisive program and hummed and bowed over making decisions on contemplated projects.

Pay Day Tomorrow

Dr. Arthur W. Gilbert, commissioner of agriculture, appeared before the board with a project calling for the employment of 1500 men at an expenditure of $225,000 for the digging of water holes outside of hydrant areas of the towns. The object is to provide facilities for fire fighting in farm houses and buildings located on the outskirts of communities. The plan will be studied further before approval is given.

Three hundred men and women employed in Boston under the civil works program will receive their first federal week's pay tomorrow morning. City Treasurer Edmund L. Dolan announced last night. When only 77 working as white-collar workers in the library and park department were paid off on schedule yesterday, the other 200 raised a ringing protest. Finally it was explained that because payrolls were made out in duplicate instead of triplicate, the pay was held up until tomorrow.

Delay in Getting Tools

Horatio Nelson, in charge of the civil works employment section at Young's Hotel, explained that only 37 men and women had been at work long enough to receive a full week's pay. As to the number of people already at work on the program, he could offer no estimate, explaining that the statistics would not be tabulated until Tuesday or Wednesday.

Delay in placing thousands, he said, was due to lack of tools and materials. He expressed confidence, however, that Boston will have its full quota at work before Dec. 15.

FIRE AT EASTPORT, ME.

EASTPORT, Me., Dec. 2 (AP)—Fire today destroyed a two and a half story sardine factory owned by the Booth Fisheries Company, at an estimated loss of $100,000.

desks, and quiet voices are heard as they go on under their very eyes. There is a rustle of blue prints and other papers. On the walls, the hazy outlines of a map are visible. The observer might doubt the wisdom of the plan, wonder where the money is coming from, and after similar academic objections, but watching this man do a job that is as much a most difficult job—the observer would be forced to use superlatives in description.

Bartlett is full of quiet New England phrases, which roll from his tongue in an amazingly apt description of a problem. He has the happy faculty of simplifying a problem so that it can be expressed almost in a word. An example of this was his statement to one Mayor who presented a rather indecisive programme and hemmed and hawed over making decisions on contemplated projects.

A Real Dictator

He doesn't know yet whether he has done, and is doing, what that man eventually bounce back at him and bring him plenty of work. And, furthermore, he doesn't seem to care. He was given a job to do, told that he was for these particular purposes, the United States government. In a sense, he is no more nor less than a beneficent dictator.

This man is one who was little known to the average citizen of Massachusetts. His name, until a few weeks ago, was seldom in the newspapers. But, throughout the Commonwealth, people are saying "What is the name of that man?" On the strength of what he has shown in a period of only a few weeks, he is, in whispers being passed from one to another in all sections of the State, the next Democratic candidate for Governor.

If Joseph W. Bartlett, lawyer, city solicitor of Newton, chairman of the State Emergency Finance Board, chairman of the State Emergency Public Works Board, and chairman of the Civil Works Board, has any political ambitions, he is keeping them quietly to himself. If he has any political ambitions it is passing strange, for he certainly does not act like a politician, at least not like the popular conception of a politician.

Works Without Salary

His position as head of the Civil Works Board, which has of late overshadowed the other official responsibilities that are his, was handed to him in a hurry. It pays no salary. It is a heroic duty. There was a job that got to be done and Joseph W. Bartlett found it dropped neatly in his lap. He could have brushed it aside, but he didn't. He grasped it and held it tight and, though confusion reigned, he plunged into the sector where the going was toughest.

It is conceivable that the job may build him politically. It is just as likely that it will ruin whatever political ambitions he has, if any. Regardless of its political outcome, this observer, who has sat in at most of the board's sessions, is convinced that politics are completely and definitely absent from his considerations of the man. He is so devoted to the strict line of his duty that he cannot concede anything to political timeliness. He must take some political figures angry. He must call officials to order. He must do some things, or he will fail. And he is expecting failure.

Glutton for Work

The man is a glutton for work. He starts early in the morning, along with his fellow board members, State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley and William D. Coy, and he may call it a day at 6 o'clock in the evening, or at 7 o'clock, or he may continue working until midnight. If there is work to do, it must be done, regardless of the hour.

At times weariness clouds his face, and he leans back in the limp manner that betrays exhaustion. His eyes are bloodshot and his lower jaw drops. Then he jumps forward with a start, exclaiming: "We've got to get people to work!" and he is once more alert and ready for action. Petulant officials who have spent an hour or two waiting for a conference with him start their session by telling how busy they are and how long they had to cool their heels outside. He only smiles and winks at his conferees. The municipal officials who complain do not know what work is, for they haven't watched Bartlett and his board in action.

But they soon find out what speed and decision is. And they learn how tremendously difficult it is to fool an intelligent man who has no axe to grind. They learn what it is to sit down with a good poker player, for Bartlett is the master of the bluff. Let this be understood, we hasten to add the explanation. The board has no personnel but its membership, and naturally has to depend on their knowledge of law, finance, municipal activities and a multitude of other things.

Plays His Hunches

It is physically and mentally impossible for one man, or for three men, to have personal knowledge of all the elements involved in the projects that are submitted, and they have to fall back on the bluff that is so important in the great game of poker. Bartlett is the poker player extraordinary in these matters. He plays hunches, intuition, intelligence and knowledge against the individual desires of applicants, and as a rule, he comes out on top.

Bartlett is additionally gifted with a sense of drama, which is almost a necessity for this particular job. That quality in his makeup was graphically displayed in the first step he took as head of the Civil Works Board. Overnight he called together the mayors, selectmen and other officials from all the 25 cities and towns in the Commonwealth, and got them into the House Auditorium at the State House.

It was a most unusual meeting and one of the most dramatic and significant in the long history of the State.

Cheered by Officials

Standing before more than 1000 municipal officials, he presented Governor Ely, whose task was to dramatize the meeting. With all his characteristic fire and oratory, the Governor issued the call to arms, and then left the meeting. By all the rules of state-

Fish or Cut Bait

Look here, Bartlett demanded. "I'll have to fish, cut bait, or go home." He was speaking to the officials gathered and soon took his departure. A few days later he returned with his projects in shipshape order and received ready approval.

Let us sit right down at the table with the civil works chairman. The city engineer, commissioner of lighting and streets, and the fire commissioner are present. Boston city enters the room through a door held open by a lackey. The chairman nods at their introductions, and immediately asks for their applications. The papers are placed in front of him and he goes over them rapidly.

"There is one for resurfacing of a street. In your opinion, Mr. Engineer, should that work have to be done? Will you stand behind it with your reputation? Will your city stand the expense of materials?" All right, approved. The approved project is tossed to the secretary to be recorded, and the next application is taken up. Here is a doubtful one. "I'll have to pray over this one," Bartlett says. "Call me up tomorrow. There is a legal angle that must be thrashed out."

Must Dig Up More

Next, "This one looks all right. Approved."

Next, "Nothing doing on this one." Finally all have been either approved or turned down. "Now," asserts Bartlett, "the total number of men who are going to put to work under these projects is 100."

With some pride the officials agree, but their satisfaction is short lived, for Bartlett says, "Well, think up some more projects. You've got to put 200 to work in your city. This is a programme of putting people to work. Use your imagination and get some more projects in here as fast as you can."

The officials mutter a mild protest about money. "You get the projects and the United States government will get you the money," the chairman declares. "Your job is to provide work. We'll give you the money."

The officials retire and a new group arrives. Similar questions are shot at them, and a rapid scratch of a pencil gives them thousands of dollars to spend on payrolls. Patiently, Bartlett tries to explain that they should not try to hold their projects down, that they should bring in every project they can think of that comes within the rules and regulations of the civil works administration.

Hard Putting Ideas Over

It is difficult to get the idea over. The mayors have been so used to hearing protests over the spending of money on public works that they simply cannot conceive of a plan which insists upon them spending all the money they can find use for. Bartlett hammers it into them, but he is confronted by an appalling lack of imagination.

One would think that the mayor of any city would have scores of public projects in mind. For years they have been saying, "If we only had the money we could put people to work." But now, with the money at hand, they find themselves mentally handcuffed for ideas.

"You've got to bring in projects," they are told. "You've got to start work that will furnish employment to the people in your city. If you can't do it, we might step in ourselves and do it. But it has got to be done."

Now here is a new problem. A woman enters and she carries a belligerent attitude. Preliminaries are brushed aside and she immediately and sharply demands that the civil works administrator in a certain city be removed from the job. The administrator is a woman, and the complainant declares that she cannot see why this woman should have the position, inasmuch as she already holds a job.

Handling Woman Difficult

The chairman informs the complainant that the woman administrator receives no salary, and immediately the wind goes out of the complaining sails. The chairman is courteous, but the woman is difficult to handle. To every woman is difficult to handle, the story is one of one at the table, the story is one of a neighborhood quarrel and neighbor hood jealousies, but Bartlett gives no indication of what he thinks about it. Under courteous handling, the complainant finally leaves.

Bartlett smiles. "As a matter of fact," he says, "I am going to remove that woman from different reasons."

Through all these activities, Bartlett is making decisions on problems that are put to him by secretaries and others. He appears tireless, but it is obvious that he is under a terrific strain. For a moment, there is a respite before another group is ushered in. Bartlett sticks a cigarette in his lips and before he can move toward a match, a lackey is before him, holding a light to the cigarette.

"Say," he asks, "what am I going to do when I get back to my law office?"

Not General at All

The new group has arrived. It is headed by the Mayor of a nearby city, breezy individual, who keeps calling Bartlett "General." It is "General" Bartlett that, until, finally, this, and "General" that, until, finally, the chairman pauses in his work and devoted to an analysis of the situation and a check-up of what has been done to date.

ABOUT $6,000,000

Out of the session today is expected to come definite figures on how much money has been allotted and how many people have been put back to work. It is the first chance the board has had to give time to the work done so far, as every session has been given over to the quick allotment of funds and speed in getting men and women to work.

It is believed, from general observations of the board's work, that approximately $6,000,000 of the State's tentative allotment of $12,000,000 has been declared, and that more than half of the quota of 50,000 persons have been placed in employment. The check tomorrow will permit the board to judge future allotments.

Medford Told to Hustle

Before calling it a day the board chairman, Joseph W. Bartlett, admonished representatives of Medford to "get a hustle on." All the projects submitted by Medford were held up because they were not of the type coming under the provisions of the Civil Works programme.

"Medford has got to hustle," Bartlett declared. "They have put only 350 to work and we want at least 1000 jobs provided in that city. Medford is an up-and-coming city and they should have some action."

For the first time since the board started to function, town officials who were appointed officials under the programme arrived to protest against not getting any salary for their work. They were from Frampton, Wilfred E. Prue, against whom charges of favoritism were filed last week and found unjustified, told Chairman Bartlett that he could receive pay as administrator in town, and tried to resign.

To Work Without Salary

But refused to allow him to resign. Prue finally agreed to take a job without salary. He is also chairman of the board of public welfare in that town and receives a salary for that job.

One of the largest projects approved was that of the Metropolitan District Commission, calling for the employment of 375 men and the expenditure of $10,000. This approval increased the number of civil works employees hired through the commission to 2200. The cleaning out the mud in Fellsmead Road, Malden.

To Wipe Out Apple Pests

Another large project which received approval was one of the State Department of Public Works to employ men on small jobs along the State highway in all sections of the State. The project entails an expenditure of $16,000 and the employment of approximately 700 men.

The State Department of Agriculture received approval for the employment of 100 men in the eradication of apple pests throughout the State. The expenditure authorized was $35,000, which brings the allotment to date to that department up to some $30,000 and brought the total number of men at work to more than 1000.

Pay Day Tomorrow

Dr. Arthur W. Gilbert, commissioner of agriculture, appeared before the board with a project calling for the employment of 100 men at an expenditure of $25,000 for the digging of water holes outside of hydrant areas of the towns. The object is to provide facilities for fire fighting in farm houses and buildings located on the outskirts of communities. The plan will be studied further before approval is given.

Three hundred men and women employed in Boston under the civil works programme will receive their first federal week's pay tomorrow morning. City Treasurer Edmund L. Delan announced last night. When only 77 working as white-collar workers in the library and park department were paid off on schedule yesterday, the other 200 raised a ringing protest. Finally it was explained that because payrolls were made out in duplicate instead of triplicate, the pay was held up until tomorrow.

Delay in Getting Tools

Horatio Nelson, in charge of the civil works employment section at Young's Hotel, explained that only 377 men and women had been at work long enough to receive a full week's pay. As to the number of people already at work on the programme, he could offer no estimate, explaining that the statistics would not be tabulated until Tuesday or Wednesday.

Delay in placing thousands, he said, was due to lack of tools and materials. He expressed confidence, however, that Boston will have its full quota at work before Dec. 15.

New Civil Works Projects Passed Give Many Jobs

M. D. C. Program Provides for Employment of 973 Men at Cost of $140,354

The State Civil Works Board today approved a large number of projects to be undertaken in cities and towns of the State under the C. W. A., including the program submitted by the city of New-ton to provide work for 554 men at an expenditure of $92,446 and that of the Metropolitan District Commission which would put 973 men to work on projects involving a total cost of $140,354.

Officials of the State board spent the morning in conferring with local officials who sought advice as to the manner in which the projects are to be carried out. The chairman, Joseph W. Bartlett, of the board stated that he would hold a hearing on the application of the city of Spring-field for the approval of projects which will provide employment for 1500 men. The projects approved by the board today follow:

MALDEN PUTTING 310 MEN TO WORK

Jobs for Women Found in Survey and Schools

MALDEN, Dec 5—East Side sewer and drainage projects gave work to 210 men yesterday and 100 more work-ers today. One of the jobs is a sewer on North Broadway to the Melrose line and another sewer is being laid from Salem st via Brentwood st to Lynn st. The Saugus Branch Creek drainage work, starting at Canal st, began this forenoon.

Mayor John D. Devir and Dr. Joseph W. Proctor, chairman of the Public Welfare Board, have planned two more projects, drainage for Hini-ing Field and work at the stone crusher. Officials are also hoping that repairs can be made in the schools and public buildings under the C. W. A. Twenty cadet teachers will be assigned to the public schools this week. Two men and nine women will be engaged by the assessors to survey the houses in the city, making a record of their construction, conveniences and other data.

ADVICE TO BE GIVEN OVER 97,000 Quota

the matter will be settled. If approval is not forthcoming the teachers will be paid from the school reserve fund. In Newton 75 teachers, who found them-selves suddenly with jobs, were told of the change of plans and asked to re-port in a few days.

The chairman last night explained the plan whereby trained social workers will occupy "key positions" in the Boston welfare department to recommend changes which are expected to increase the efficiency of the department. Bartlett revealed that a committee composed of heads of welfare agencies were in charge of the plan, which "may result in the elimination of some personnel" and was drafted to reduce the $1,000,000 a month spending record of the welfare department.

PURCHASING BUREAU

Formation of a purchasing bureau which will buy all the materials that the federal government contributes to further CWA projects in cities and towns throughout the state was an-nounced by William B. Coy, Boston banker and member of the civil works administration. The man to head this bureau, who will have charge of the spending of hundreds of thousands of dollars, will be named today.

A comprehensive and intensive survey of the causes of accidents to be under-taken by experts of Massachusetts In-stitute of Technology was suggested to Chairman Bartlett by Maj. Paul H. Hines. Fully 1000 technicians would be employed on the project which would be the first scientific survey of its kind made, and would be of national import.

Chairman Bartlett and President Karl Compton of Technology will discuss the survey at a conference today. Mayor Curley yesterday deleted the $500,000 Strandway project from the supplementary civil works program he will present to Bartlett's board today. Of the sum named, Boston was to raise $300,000 on a loan order to pay for materials.

Officially, the reason given for the deletion was that funds would not be available in time for the project. Ac-tually, Chairman Bartlett's inspection of the project last week disclosed that it included the scarifying and resur-facing of a fairly good road, and his reaction was such that city officials became convinced the project would be rejected.

A plan to make a state census of all unemployed, suggested to the civil works board by Edwin S. Smith, state commissioner of labor and industries, was referred to Washington officials by Chairman Bartlett, who said that thou-sands of men and women could be put to work in obtaining definite figures on the subject.

Official praise for the civil works board was given yesterday by Robert W. Kelso, field representative of the federal CWA, who expressed his pleas-ure at the manner in which the Massa-chusetts board has acted during its existence. That Massachusetts will have the chance to employ 15,000 more per-sons is, he said, "due to the splendid showing made by the board here."

Walter V. McCarthy, executive direc-tor of the Boston welfare department, issued a statement yesterday explain-ing that his duties as civil works ad-ministrator for Boston slowed up the work of selecting 50 trained social workers, who are to study the system used in the department with a view to suggesting changes. Meanwhile, he said, Miss Catherine Hardwick, dean of Sim-mons College, has been making an in-tensive study and will file recommenda-tions in a few days. "Despite state-ments in the press," McCarthy said, "relations between Chairman Bartlett and the executive director of the welfare department will remain harmo-nious."

Bartlett yesterday explained the plan to reorganize the welfare department as follows:

This will not be an "investiga-tion" of the department, which has been investigated enough, it seems to me. We authorized the employ-ment of more experienced persons to go into key positions for the purpose, not of detecting criminals, but to improve the department. With a tremendous loan on Bos-ton, the necessity of putting into the department persons not well trained because of inability to ob-tain trained people, this plan will aid the management. It is being done with the consent of Boston officials. It will be a help to them. We are not trying to be critical.

In answer to questions, Bartlett ad-mitted that McCarthy might nominate the social workers, but the state em-ployee finance board must approve them before they go to work. The board will be assisted by Roy M. Cushman, direc-tor of the Boston Council of Social Agencies, the Rev. Thomas Reynolds, director of the Catholic Charitable Bureau, and others.

He further revealed that the finance board asked the social welfare heads what could be done to reduce welfare disbursements in Boston, and they recommended the plan being followed. McCarthy and the assisting committee must report regularly to Bartlett re-garding progress. While the plan has not been put into effect, the board al-ready has a representative working in the department "getting acquainted," said Bartlett.

While not primarily "searching for crooks" in the department, the social workers "will not overlook" any found in the department personnel, or among the welfare recipients, the chairman confessed, with a smile.

Referring to the request of Mayor-elect Frederick W. Mansfield, now en-route from Bermuda to Boston, for an opportunity to inspect programs sub-mitted by Mayor Curley, both civil and public works, Bartlett asserted: "I will be willing to entertain the co-operative or non-co-operative efforts of any executive officer of a city." He readily admitted that the statement "is not nothing," but it was indicated that if Mansfield sends official notice of his desire to be present at the civil works hearing today, or the public works hearing tomorrow, the Bartlett board will postpone the hearings as a courtesy. Otherwise, as Bartlett added, "Anything presented by Boston that I can pass on, I will."

Mansfield wishes to examine the $6,000,000 public works program which the mayor will submit tomorrow. So far the board has approved projects totalling $5,850,000 out of an allot-ment of $10,000,000. Of this sum the city must raise $7,000,000 to obtain a free federal grant of $3,000,000.

The highway safety survey advocated by Maj. Hines, a student of highway safety for many years, attracted the interest of Chairman Bartlett. He readily agreed to inviting President Compton of Technology to meet him at the State House today at 4 P. M. to discuss the problem and the manner in which the CWA can help. As outlined by Maj. Hines, the survey would in-clude the following:

A statistical survey of the regis-trar's records; actual investiga-tion and testing of motor equip-ment to determine replacement periods; recommendations for code of instruction and examination for applicants.

A study for educational work among motorists, pedestrians and particularly children; a study of the legal aspects; study of physical as-pects; study of traffic control equip-ment; effect of road improvements on frequency of accidents and effect of lighting on accidents which would mean examination of road improvements for the last 10 years; collateral study of insurance rec-ords; effects of liquor influence on accidents and safety; rules for pe-destrians; study of frequency of ac-cidents; and seriousness, in day and nights.

TRAINED MEN

The survey would mean that trained men would visit principals in accidents to inquire their reactions at the time, how the accident was caused, and to obtain other information necessary for the purposes of the survey, all information gathered to be confidential. Conducted by an institution of the standing of Technology, the survey would attract national attention and be of service to the entire nation, Maj. Hines felt.

The state CWA purchasing bureau, Mr. Coy explained, will buy only those materials which the federal government donates to a city or town for its CWA projects. While the national govern-ment had strict rules regarding adver-tising for bids, the emergency nature of the CWA will be emergency buying. City and town purchasing agents will make their own purchases, but their prices will be checked with the federal government prices.

Several legislators, neighborhood clubs and organizations not connected with city or town governments have sent pro-jects to the civil works board in the belief that the projects can be considered. No projects will be considered unless approved by the civil works adminis-trator for the community, it was an-nounced.

3000 SEEK 1170 CWA

JOB IN SPRINGFIELD

(Special Dispatch to The Herald)

SPRINGFIELD, Dec. 4—More than 3000 thronged the municipal auditorium today to register for the 1170 jobs which will be available under the supplemen-tary civil works program here. Long before the registration office opened the sidewalk outside was lined with ap-plicants. There was a sprinkling of women and large numbers of youths under 21, the latter providing a real problem for the registrars as they lacked the poll tax required to prove residence. In some cases school work certificates were ac-cepted.

ROCKLAND, ME., ELECTS DEMOCRATIC MAYOR

Thurston Wins by Majority of 1075 Votes

ROCKLAND, Me., Dec. 4—Laforest A. Thurston, Democrat, was elected mayor of Rockland today by a majority of 1075 over his Republican opponent, former Mayor Carlton E. Snow. The vote was: Thurston, 2146; Snow, 1071.

HUNTINGTON AVE. SUBWAY DROPPED

Out of Picture, Curley Says, if City's Big Public Works Programme Is Given Approval

BY JOHN GRIFFIN

The Huntington avenue subway, which has been a bone of contention ever since it was proposed by Mayor Curley, is "out of the window," the Mayor announced yesterday, after a conference with Mayor-elect Frederick W. Mansfield and Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State Emergency Finance Board. Mayor Curley and Mayor-elect Mansfield, in their first meeting since the election, agreed that if the public works programme submitted by the city yesterday is approved, the subway project will be abandoned.

$6,000,000 PROGRAMME

The city's public works programme, calling for employment of 400 men and to the expenditure of approximately $6,000,000 in addition to the $5,800,000 already approved, was set before the board in a long session and was the high point of the day. Of as much interest was the session of the Civil Works Board, whose membership is the same as that of the emergency finance board, for the question of employing school teachers on a large scale under the civil works programme appeared to be hearing a head. The Civil Works Board is insistent that teachers be given jobs, but the Washington authorities have held it up. Last night, Commissioner of Education Payson Smith, at the request of Chairman Bartlett, left for Washington to lay the question before Administrator Hopkins.

"There has been such a hue and cry over not employing teachers," Bartlett said, "that I suggested that Commissioner Smith go to Washington and present the case. This board wants to employ teachers under the civil works programme. It is an employment programme. We have continually been told that we are to get people to work. Well, the teachers and professional people have just as much right to jobs as the man digging a trench."

All Surveys Held Up

State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, a member of the board, was even more emphatic than Chairman Bartlett. To go "There is no reason why teachers should not be given employment under the programme," he said, "and I am sure that the board will approve the plan to employ teachers to put teachers and white collar men to work, and we are going to do all we can to get authorization."

An additional snag hit the board when word was received from Washington that all surveys were being held up. According to the members of the board, give Administrator Hopkins, in public address, has approved the idea of projects under the programme. Chairman Bartlett sent a letter last night asking for a definite announcement concerning it. The board was prepared to approve a highway safety survey by Technological, to employ 100 men, when the word holding up the survey was received.

The Boston programme presented to the public works board was heard by Mayor-elect Mansfield without comment, but at the conclusion of the meeting, he requested Chairman Bartlett to allow him a few days to express an opinion on the projects before they are approved. Chairman Bartlett agreed that he should have a voice in the matter and within a few days the Mayor-elect will give his opinion.

Meeting Is Cordial

The meeting of the Mayor and the Mayor-elect was cordial, though restrained. Frequently during the hearing, Mayor-elect Mansfield leaned over to ask Mayor Curley questions about the programme, which were readily answered.

division repair shop at Bristol street, and a new fire alarm repair shop and garage at Warrham street.

Two proposals for the police department called for the construction of a new police station at Rensselaer street and Rensselaer street, and for either a new building for the West Roxbury station or a consolidation of that division and the Jamaica Plain division.

In discussing the sewer projects, Mayor Curley revealed that the Boston Public Library nearly collapsed last year because of conditions under the city square and said that there is still a possibility of damage suits against the city by other property holders in that section. A new outlet for natural powerflow of water there is urged in the proposal.

Deer Island Work

Additional drainage facilities will also be located in the city proper. South Boston, Charlestown, Roxbury, Hyde Park, West Roxbury and Brighton. Mayor Curley told the board that if the street and sewer projects are carried out, the city will be able to eliminate street reconstruction from next year's budget, an item that averages $1,000,000 a year.

The work proposed at Deer Island calls for the construction of an administration unit, a section containing 150 cells, a hospital ward, a receiving building, a mess hall, a kitchen unit and repair shop to the master's house.

At the close of the hearing the Civil Works Board resumed operations and approved a large number of projects presented by Charles F. Hurley, chairman of the State Commission on Administration and Finance, who was designated by Governor Ely as a co-ordinator in the matter of finding jobs. The projects approved will give work to 123 persons at an expenditure of $265,000.

Many Road Improvements

In the work will be the clearing of grounds at the State prison colony at Norfolk and the Bridgewater State farm, the construction of water holes on the outskirts of small towns and villages for the protection of dwellings and farm buildings in outlying districts, and road improvements in Andover, Hamilton, Newburyport, Milton, Florida, Northampton, Charlton, Schioburn, Grafton, Brimfield, Wales, Warren, Oxford, Cohasset, Hancock, Rowley and Newbury.

The board also approved the application of Somerville to employ 136 men in the repairing of municipal buildings at a cost of $29,000, and 150 men for the painting of fire hydrants at a cost of $102 and also approved the construction of a pipe line in Fellsway West employing 180 men.

Candidates received approval of several projects, including one for the employment of 108 men in the sewing of clothing for the use of the poor and old hospitals. Other Cambridge projects which received approval were the placement of wooden bridges of the public library with concrete, alteration of five fire stations, and the widening, cleaning and deepening of Alewife Brook Parkway. These projects involve the expenditure of $90,000 and will provide employment of 230 men.

Start Checkup System

Under the direction of William B. Coy, a member of the board, a check-up system on the accounts of the municipalities in their handling of civil works projects, was started yesterday. Coy is informing them that Charles Cleary and Paul Viano have been delegated to examine records relating to the employment and payment of men under the civil works programme.

The Massachusetts allotment of jobs under the civil works programme was increased 25,000, bringing the number to be given jobs in this State up to 121,750. Immediately upon receipt of the notice to that effect from Washington, the board sent out telegrams to all the municipalities urging them to bring in more projects. To date some 7000 jobs have been provided for by the board.

The employment of 41 men in Middlesex county was authorized and the possibility of work for several hundred in the board of Nathanial Bowditch, a member of the county commission. He presented a programme for cutting brush at Lake Walden and at the Middlesex County Sanatorium in Waltham. "I want to have 100 men employed by Middlesex county by Wednesday of

HAS 18 PROJECTS

Division of Metropolitan Planning Files Programme Totalling $12,000,000 With Legislature.

A three-year highway programme, calling for construction of 18 projects at an expenditure of more than $12,000,000, was recommended to the Legislature yesterday by the Division of Metropolitan Planning.

The programme, with the projects listed in the order recommended by the division, is as follows:

State road continuing the Circumferential Highway from the Worcester turnpike northeasterly through Wellesley, Newton, Weston, Waltham, Lynn, Reading, Wakefield, Lynnfield to Andover street in Peabody. Cost $1,000,000.

State highway from Galen street, Watertown, to Weston avenue, Waltham. Cost $1,000,000.

HUB STREET WORK

Thoroughfares That Will Be Reconstructed Under Curley's Public Works Programme

The Boston streets to be reconstructed under the public works programme submitted yesterday by Mayor Curley are as follows:

From H-mpton to Dudley; Melrose avenue, Dorchester, from Dorchester avenue to Columbia road; Hamilton street, Dorchester, from Holmes avenue to Columbia road; Geneva avenue, from Columbia road to Bowdoin street. From Charlestown, from Mount Pleasant street to Walker street. Milton avenue, from Walker street to Centre street. From

25,000 Jobs More Given Bay State

Government Tells Chairman Bartlett to Put Them to Work

Massachusetts was authorized to increase its quota of unemployed to be given jobs under the CWA program from approximately 97,000 to 121,750 today, by the Federal Government. Announcement of the increase was received by Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts Civil Works board, in a telegram from Harry L. Hopkins, Federal Emergency Relief Administration at Washington, which says:

"You are herewith assigned an additional quota of 25,000, bringing the total number of persons assigned to your State up to 121,750. These additional persons have been transferred to you for assignment to local projects from the unallotted balance of the Federal projects quota for your State. You are directed to place these persons to work immediately."

As soon as possible after receiving the telegram from the Federal administrator, Chairman Bartlett dispatched telegrams to local administrators in all cities and towns of the State, notifying them of the opportunity to put more men to work, and urging them to submit to him additional civil works projects for his approval. The State Civil Works Board already has approved projects to provide employment to approximately 70,000 persons until next February.

"We will provide the jobs in one form or another," Chairman Bartlett said. State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, also a member of the State Civil Works Board, said that the increased quota for Massachusetts would open the way for the furtherance of his movement to provide work for unemployed school teachers. "I am delighted," he said, "now we can give the teachers and the schools an opportunity of enlarging their activities which have been curtailed drastically during the last two years."

Nathaniel Bowditch, Middlesex County commissioner, submitted a program to the Civil Works Board today for the employment of forty-one men in cutting brush at Lake Walden and in the vicinity of the Middlesex County Sanatorium in Waltham, and Chairman Bartlett in giving his approval said:

"I want to have 1000 men employed by Middlesex County by Wednesday of next week. I should like the projects presented by Friday. If you need engineering assistance we will give it to you. By working night and day, you ought to be able to complete plans for additional projects."

The civil works chairman received the assurance of Commissioner Bowditch that efforts would be made to provide 1000 jobs in that county.

Examination of accounts of communities engaged in civil works projects was begun today under the direction of William B. Coy, a member of the State board, with a view to preventing any irregularities whereby persons not on the welfare or unemployed lists would be given work by local authorities. Mr. Coy announced that Charles Cleary of Dorchester and Paul Viano of Somerville, both members of the State civil works administration, had been appointed to make the investigation. He sent a letter to all local civil works administrators directing them to permit Cleary and Viano "to examine such records as they have relating to the employment and payment of men under the civil works program."

The State Civil Works Board today announced its approval of more than thirty additional projects by communities throughout Massachusetts. The most important of these in the vicinity of Boston include: Melrose, grading, 142 men, $48,654; Medford, hospital and library work, 35 men, $6969; Concord, vital statistics, 16 men, $2254; Wilmington, road construction and painting, 26 men, $3537; Essex County, miscellaneous projects, 22 men, $801; Massachusetts Department of Public Health, sanitary engineering, 9 men, $2255; Lynnfield, waterworks, 10 men, $2505; Winchester, waterworks, 25 men, $4971; Watertown, sewer and cemetery improvement, 74 men, $6716; Newton, administrative work, 7 men, $1816; and Needham, drainage, 40 men, $7365.

SAVING OF MILLIONS FOR COMMUNITIES

'Never Mind Money, We'll Find That Somehow,' Is Attitude

Massachusetts' allotment from the federal civil works fund may reach $20,000,000, increasing by thousands the number of jobs to be created and saving communities millions in welfare disbursements, Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the state civil works board, declared last night.

The board, which includes Chairman Bartlett, State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley and William B. Coy, Boston banker, rested yesterday for the first time since they were appointed Nov. 16, the day following a Washington conference at which President Roosevelt revealed his plan to re-employ 4,000,000 men by Dec. 15.

NO DEFINITE SUM

No definite sum has been set as the state allotment from the $400,000,000 federal civil works fund, although it has been estimated that the commonwealth would receive $12,500,000. Chairman Bartlett said. It is the conviction of the chairman that an additional $7,500,000 will be forthcoming, some to be used for federal civil works projects in this state.

While 97,000 has been named as the number of men to be cared for under the civil works program in this state, the federal government project envision jobs for an additional 25,000 or 30,000 men and women. Men working on federal projects will be credited to the town whence they came.

Among the federal projects being considered is one at Ft. Banks, Winchester, where certain repair work will be done, and at Ft. Devens at Ayer. Other federal projects will be presented as soon as possible, Robert W. Kelso, field agent of the federal emergency relief administration, declared in a visit here, to bring the total number of jobs to nearly 30,000.

Unsatisfied with the number or type of projects submitted by cities and towns in the last two weeks, Chairman Bartlett has vigorously told each community leader—and particularly those from cities where the suffering is greatest—not to concentrate on the money angle.

'NEVER MIND MONEY'

"Think of the civil works program in men and women and jobs," he urged yesterday. "Never mind the money, we'll find that somehow. If a project is municipally worthy and provides jobs for people, the federal government will not let you down." In private conversation he has expressed his sincere belief that federal authorities will "find money somehow" if worthy projects are approved.

The stumbling block so far in civil works programs presented by cities has been the costs of materials. Many cities are without so-called "free cash" and to purchase their fair share of the materials means special loan orders which must be passed by the city council or the board of aldermen. This handicap has held up several projects for days.

The advent of the winter season will mean that welfare recipients and unemployed people not on the welfare, who have in the past been engaged in occupations not considered laborious, cannot undertake work for which they are physically unfit.

This fact has caused Chairman Bartlett and his colleagues to emphasize the

MAKING REPAIRS AT EVERETT

Many Jobs Made Possible by Grants to City

EVERETT, Dec. 8.—With Federal funds flowing into the city to put men to work, several C. W. A. projects were under way yesterday. Seventy-five men, with hip rubber boots, started work on four surface drainage outlets which have been in need of repair and extension. They began work at surface drainage outlets near Edith st. Garden st. Spring st. and Elton st. City Engineer Joseph W. Holmes is in charge of the work. A new drainage system will be installed in Glendale Park, within a few days, Mr. Holmes stated last night.

Repairs on all the fire stations are under way. The apparatus has been moved out of the Central Fire Station, while a new concrete floor is being put down. Fire Chief James J. Evans is supervising the work.

Registration of C. W. A. applicants is taking place daily at City Hall. Mr. Holmes stated last night that even with all the Federal money, not all the unemployed can be put to work. Mr. Holmes, Mayor O'Neill, School Committeeman Wilbur J. Rockwood, Supt. of Schools F. A. Ashley, Federal Administrator Rev. Dr. Ulysses S. Milburn and Glenwood Cemetery Supt. James Birtwell visited the State House yesterday and conferred with Joseph W. Bartlett, State administrator.

Mr. Bartlett approved the following plans: Engagement of three clerks to work on a block system in the city engineer's office, road building and water pipe replacement at Glenwood Cemetery, extension of surface drainage system and repairs to bleachers at High School Stadium, general repairs, employing 15 men, totaling $8000, to all schoolhouses; new roof and general repairs at Farlin Memorial Library.

Director Bartlett approved, subject to the submission of a list by Mr. Holmes, the repair of defective sidewalks and tipping curbstones throughout the city. The materials which the United States Government pays for must be bought through the Government purchasing agent, Col. Moss, at Boston.

ASKS $30,600 TO AID TEACHERS

Gov Ely Seeks Relief for 600 Now Unemployed

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 (A. P.)—The Emergency Relief Administration today received an application from Gov. Ely of Massachusetts for $30,600 for relief of teachers in education in his State.

The plan accompanying the application would provide work for approximately 600 unemployed teachers through classes for foreign-born adults, occupational education, occupational rehabilitation of disabled persons, general adult education and nursery schools.

Under the Massachusetts plan, $2000 would be spent for instruction of foreign-born adults, 40 teachers being employed to conduct classes for some 1800 persons. The program would put 50 teachers at work on occupational education for 1600 persons at a cost of $2500.

Three relief workers would be placed in the Boston, Worcester and Springfield districts to conduct occupational rehabilitation work for disabled persons at a cost of $800.

The plan calls for expenditure of $10,000 for general adult education with 250 teachers conducting classes for 12,000 adults. Another $10,000 is set aside for employment of 250 teachers in nursery schools for 12,000 children.

Road Survey and Sewing in Special Class

Ashurance was given Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State Civil Works Board today by Washington that the board has adopted the proper course in carrying out provisions of the public works program and that the present policy may be continued.

There was doubt in the minds of the board members concerning a number of projects submitted for approval. Talking over the telephone today with Harry L. Hopkins, Federal emergency relief administrator, Mr. Bartlett described several projects typical of those which the board has approved. Mr. Hopkins replied that the board was proceeding along the proper lines.

In consequence of the interview there are several projects which the board has held up which will have to be carried out along different lines than those put forth by their sponsors.

An example is the employment of women in sewing projects, a plan now being supervised by Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul. The project will not go through as part of the civil works program but as a civil works service project, the distinguishing being between employment and service.

Relief to Bartlett

Another project which has not been acted upon but which probably will be approved in a modified form is the proposal for a State survey with the purpose of reducing the number of accidents on the highways. This also will be a Civil Works service undertaking. Chairman Bartlett, because of the difficulties encountered in interpreting to just what extent he could proceed, was considerably relieved on the word of assurance which he received today from Administrator Hopkins.

"He told me to stop worrying," Mr. Bartlett remarked, "and I am going to." The chairman, with his associates, State Treas. Charles F. Hurley and James B. Coy, has been working night and day the past several weeks. With the many problems being presented for solution, Mr. Bartlett, after a conference with his associates today, finally decided to put the matter up to Hopkins and secure his opinion.

"I certainly am pleased with the result," he said.

More Boston Projects

The Civil Works Board today gave a hearing to Budget Commissioner Charles J. Fox of Boston a number of additional projects filed by the city. They follow:

Employment of 105 men in the public Buildings Department in general repairs at an expenditure of $61,000; Health Department, 20 workers for cataloging and indexing, $2000; Sewer Department, 20 men for work on water mains and repair of department buildings, $9000; public library, 65 women for cataloging, $13,000.

Dr. Payson Smith, Commissioner of Education, in telephonic conversation with Washington today, stated that the effort being made by the Civil Works Board to secure more employment for school teachers is now under consideration and that an announcement on this subject will probably be made on Monday next.

Curley Withdraws $8,500,000 Subway Plan at Works Hearing

Mayor Curley, after a brief conference with Mayor-elect Mansfield at the close of a hearing at the State House yesterday on the $8,750,000 public works program for the city, withdrew the $8,500,000 Huntington avenue subway project which the state emergency finance board frowned upon.

In approving Mayor Curley's plan to withdraw the controversial subway project, Mansfield made his first move in the conduct of the city's affairs. It was the first time mayor and mayor-elect—bitter enemies in the campaign—met since the election and their meeting was a cordial one.

After various department heads had explained their public works programs, Mayor-elect Mansfield announced that he will study each project and will give his opinion Saturday to Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the state finance board, who has promised to give full consideration to the views of the future chief executive.

The civil works administration, composed of three members of the emergency finance board, met yesterday.

There was doubt in the minds of the board members concerning a number of projects submitted for approval. Talking over the telephone today with Harry L. #### Relief to Bartlett

Another project which has not been acted upon but which probably will be approved in a modified form is the proposal for a State survey with the purpose of reducing the number of accidents on the highways. This also will be a Civil Works service undertaking.

Chairman Bartlett, because of the difficulties encountered in interpreting to just what extent he could proceed, was considerably relieved on the word of assurance which he received today from Administrator Hopkins.

agency finance board, yesterday announced that Massachusetts' quota of jobs has been raised to 121,750, which automatically raises the state's allotment from the federal civil works fund of $40,000,000. The commonwealth's share will be more than $20,000,000, it is estimated.

MANSFIELD-CURLEY

The teachers employment problem, a pressing question in this state, will be presented to CWA officials at Washington by Dr. Payson Smith, state commissioner of education, who was sent to Washington last night by Chairman Bartlett to explain the need for teacher projects here. Unofficial advice from Washington indicates that teacher projects are not within the scope of the CWA but Bartlett desires to advance such work at once.

The proposal to have Massachusetts Institute of Technology, at the invitation of Gov. Ely, undertake a comprehensive and intensive survey of highway safety in this state, is wrapped up in red tape at Washington, it was learned. Washington officials are, at the request of the chairman, endeavoring to ascertain if there is any way the project can be approved.

Mayor-elect Mansfield arrived at the office of State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, where the hearings are being held, at the scheduled time, 3 P. M., but the Boston officials were late. During the interim Mansfield, a former state treasurer, discovered on the walls a picture of himself that he had never seen before.

When Curley and his department heads arrived there was a tense moment while Mansfield and Curley met. A perfunctory shake of the hands, a "How do you do, Mr. Mayor?" and both sat down. Mansfield a little to the rear of Curley. Their relations improved during the hearing and at the end, Curley suggested to Fire Chief Henry Fox a report on consolidations in the fire department which would reduce overhead.

Mayor-elect Mansfield was given a copy of each project application and followed the explanation closely. Mayor Curley kept up a rapid conversation with Mansfield, explaining in detail what each project meant, the while he directed the city department heads in their presentations of projects. During one of the Curley asides, the mayor advised Mayor-elect Mansfield to beware the "tax appeal people." He was heard to describe tax abatement appeal as "the biggest racket, bigger than bootlegging" and urged Mansfield to take strong steps to halt such appeals.

Those present at the Boston hearing were Chairman Bartlett, State Treasurer Hurley, William B. Coy, a Boston banker; Daniel Doherty, Springfield banker; Theodore M. Waddell, director of the accounts division of the state taxation department; all members of the state emergency finance board.

Mayor Curley, Corporation Counsel Samuel Silverman, Walter V. McCarthy, executive director of the welfare department; Simon Hecht, chairman of the public welfare commissioners; Christopher Carven, public works commissioner; Augustus P. Gill of the police department; George Dakin of the sewer department; Daniel Sullivan of the water department; Charles J. Fox, budget commissioner; Fire Chief Henry Fox, Edward E. Williamson, superintendent of maintenance, and Herbert Hickey, secretary of the fire department.

Mayor-elect Mansfield, his brother, Edward Mansfield; John P. McCarthy, a friend, and Francis J. Murray of the Mansfield campaign committee. Copious notes were taken by Mansfield and Murray during the presentation of the various projects.

As outlined, the Boston projects were: $800,000 for the construction of a high pressure water system in the Dorchester district.

$1,000,000 for reconstruction of city streets.

$1,000,000 for surface drainings in various parts of the city.

$450,000 for a new Wayfarers' lodge.

$250,000 for a new police station to replace the present Dudley street and Roxbury Crossing stations.

$300,000 to replace the present station house in West Roxbury or $350,000 for a new station house to replace West Roxbury and Jamaica Plain station houses.

$1,000,000 for new fire houses and fire department buildings.

$800,000 for new buildings at Deer Island.

The list of streets was presented. Commissioner Carven explained that the streets were selected for reconstruction because they are through ways in need of re-surfacing. The sewer program dovetailed with the street program inasmuch as $125,000 worth of sewer projects will be used on the streets named.

The streets to be reconstructed follow: E and W streets, South Boston, from G to Dorchester avenue; Park street, Dorchester, from Freeport to Washington; Freeport street, from Old Colony Parkway to Neponset avenue; George and Clifton streets, Roxbury, from Hampden to Dudley; Melville avenue, Dorchester, Dorchester avenue to Columbia road; Hamilton street, Dorchester; Homes avenue to Columbia road.

Columbia avenue, from Columbia road to Howdoin street; High street, Charlestown, from Monument square to Walker street; Milton avenue, Dorchester, from Woodrow avenue to Fairmont avenue; Gramplan Way, from Savin Hill avenue to Savin Hill avenue; Nonantum street, Brighton, from Washington to Newton street; West Milton street, from Hyde park avenue to Milton line; Readville street, from River street to West Milton street; North street, from Commercial to on, Day square to Revere line; East Boston street, Chelsea street, East Boston street, Brighton, North Beacon street, Washington, River street, from Providence R. R. tracks to Dedham line; Kennington street, from Breed square to Revere line; Gordon avenue, Hyde Park, from River street to Stoney Brook parkway; Minot street, Dorchester, from Adams street to Neponset avenue; Bellevue street, West Roxbury, from Centre street to its end.

The teacher problem, which has been of great interest to State Treasurer Hurley, is now up to Washington officials. Bartlett and Hurley have emphasized their tremendous interest in this class of non-manual workers and expect Washington to back them up. Yesterday, Treasurer Hurley, a resident of Cambridge, approved the following projects for that city which will provide employment for 250 workers at a cost of $90,000:

Sewing of clothing for use by unemployed of the city, to employ 108 women; replacement of wooden floor of public library with a concrete floor; alterations in five fire stations, widening, deepening and cleaning Alewife brook in Cambridge.

Appraised of the increase in the quota for Massachusetts from 97,000 to 121,750, Chairman Bartlett immediately telegraphed cities and towns of the change in quotas and urged that they present more projects. Already 70,000 jobs have been created.

Rebuilding Vassar street from Memorial drive to Massachusetts avenue, 600 men, $165,000.

Laying new sewer main on Vassar street, seventy-five men, $15,000.

Grading the outfield and skating rink at Russell Field, used by the city's high schools, and grading the municipal golf links at Fresh Pond, seventy-five men, $12,400.

Cleaning catch basins and sewers throughout the city, seventy-five men, $14,200.

Classifying and cataloging books in the alcove of the city's public library, eleven men and women, $1500.

The city will seek, also, an additional sum of $103,000 to be used for the resurfacing of Commercial street in East Cambridge.

More than 1000 women engaged in knitting and sewing projects throughout the state, whose jobs were endangered by a ruling from federal civil works administration, will be paid with money from another federal fund, Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts civil works board, promised last night.

The projects will be called civil works service projects and money from the federal emergency relief funds paid out to the women and other women who expected such work but had not actually started, Chairman Bartlett explained.

emergency relief funds the sum of $15,000 has been allocated for two months to this state, but Chairman Bartlett pointed out that the amount is so inadequate to cope with the problem as to be ridiculous. Hopkins promised to study the matter further.

PRESENTS PROJECTS

Mrs. Edwin W. Smith of Westfield, sister of Gov. Ely, appeared before Chairman Bartlett, State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley and William B. Coy, the full board, with projects designed to care for 140 girls in Westfield. Mrs. Smith, who is chairman of women's activities for the CWA in Westfield, was accompanied by Miss Elizabeth Winslow of Westfield. Many of her projects could not be approved because of the Washington ruling, but the board members urged her to submit others. While she was presenting the projects, her brother, Charles Ely, dropped in to see her.

Chairman Bartlett and the board members have been approving projects on instructions contained in Col. Hopkins's address at Washington. The nature of several projects was such that advice from Washington was deemed necessary. Each time, however, that Bartlett telephoned he was hemmed in with restrictions. Yesterday he determined to converse with Hopkins.

"Hopkins told me not to worry and I'm not going to," was Bartlett's first remark at the end of the conversation. Later the chairman explained:

We understood we were to approve work for women in substantial quantities and early in the approval stage we approved a program for knitting which involved 1090 women, to be supervised by the state department of agriculture.

INCLUDES WOMEN

On Nov. 28 instructions were received to the effect that civil works programs that would lead directly to construction work, or indirectly to possible construction work in the future. Quotas already assigned to the state included women.

Being disturbed about the situation I telephoned Col. Hopkins and he told me directly that knitting and sewing projects (on which 2000 women were to have work eventually) for women are not included in the civil works plan.

However, I was told that I could take a program like knitting and sewing if our board, in this case the state emergency finance board that is responsible for the distribution of federal emergency relief money in the commonwealth, so approves. The money to pay the women would then come from federal emergency relief sources, and the work would be called civil works service projects, and be approved as such.

This calls for a halt temporarily on knitting and sewing projects until the emergency finance board can gather data from, or through, John T. Scully, who is our agent in federal relief matters.

BY RELIEF FUNDS

All women at work will be paid through relief funds. A program will be initiated in such amount as the board directs after a study of the situation.

Teachers are not included for the reason that, nationally, the federal emergency relief board decided to allocate to each state separately designated funds to give relief to teachers. Massachusetts got $15,000 for two months, with the promise of more, if necessary.

We have urgently argued extending this work, as we have learned the extent of the teacher unemployment in Massachusetts. We expect further information on this matter by Monday next.

Asked whether projects for women are limited in type and scope, the chairman said:

Most any work for women could be included in the civil works program, but such work as civil works service projects is practically limited to women on a "relief basis." This "relief basis" is narrower than the federal government interpretation so that we expect to take care of people without the careful investigation the state requires.

Regarding the highway safety survey to be conducted by Technology experts, Mr. Bartlett declared:

The Technology survey has been approved as a project the extent of which is to be determined by the civil works administration. We intend to invite the Technology men to talk to the State Board and Morgan

Ryan, the registrar, and Timothy C. Murphy, executive secretary of the public safety department, who is representing Gen. Daniel Needham.

DEFINITE FIGURES

Joseph O'Connell, statistician for the board, last night gave definite figures to Chairman Bartlett as follows:

As of Dec. 6, last, the board had approved 2450 projects giving employment to 80,850 persons. The federal government will pay a wage bill of $13,339,530 and a bill of $13,338,472.51. The total expenditure by the federal government will be $15,337,817.51. Cities and towns will contribute $2,763,882.77. Up to Wednesday the CWA in Massachusetts represents an ultimate expenditure of $18,101,700.58.

Because the federal government has increased the Massachusetts job allotment to more than 121,000, it is believed the Massachusetts cash allotment will be more than $25,000,000 or more than twice the original estimate.

One of the first cities to feel the effects of this liberal increase in allotment of men and women was Worcester. Mayor John C. Mahoney presented projects yesterday which called for em-

A big flood of cash, totaling $17,000,000 has been poured into Massachusetts in less than three weeks by the Civil Works Board. Figures compiled last night show that approximately 85,000 jobs have been authorized if half the time allotted to the board, and $15,000,000 in wages has been put into circulation.

These figures, which exceeded even the most optimistic hopes of the board, comprise perhaps the best showing of any State in the country in the speed of functioning of the civil works program and make it practically certain that the increased allotment of 121,000 men and women will be at work on civil works jobs before Dec. 15.

"We have exceeded our expectations," he said, "that we were to approve work for women in substantial quantities. Early in the approval stage we approved projects for knitting for 1090 women throughout the State, later the Department of Agriculture, after we approved some sewing projects. On Nov. 28, instructions were received to the effect that civil works projects were those directly connected with construction work or leading directly or indirectly to possible construction work in the future."

Quotas already assigned to the State includes women. Being disturbed about the situation, I telephoned Colonel Hopkins and he told me directly that knitting and sewing projects for women are not included under the Civil Works programme, but that I could take care of a programme that if our board, the Emergency Finance Board, which is responsible for federal relief work, can get up a programme of a highway safety survey to be undertaken by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. This may employ 1600 white-collar workers, the details will be worked out at a conference of Technology officials and the members of the Civil Works Board in a few days.

An elaborate programme which is expected to add approximately 2000 persons to the list of job-holders was approved at the sitting last night. The programme was presented by Charles F. Hurley, chairman of the commission on administration and finance, who has been named co-ordinator of the State civil works projects.

State Projects

Budget Commissioner Charles J. Fox of Boston, presented additional projects, including the employment of 106 men in the public buildings department at a cost of $81,000; 20 workers for cataloging and indexing, $2000; 20 men for work on water mains and repair of buildings, $3000, and 63 women for cataloging at the public library, $13,000.

The emergency public works commission submitted its eighth list of public works projects to Governor Ely for executive approval. According to estimates, 20 per cent of the costs will be used for labor. The projects included $364,000 for reconstruction and widening of Wellington Bridge in Somerville, $200,000 for buildings at the Monson State Hospital, construction of a bypass in Lincoln connecting near the Concord-Lincoln line with the new Belmont-Concord highway, and other items in connection, to cost $315,500; construction of a standpipe at the Worcester State Hospital, $36,118; work at the Northampton State Hospital, $32,000; construction of a laundry building at the Northampton State Hospital, $30,000, and reconstruction of the State highway in Ashby and Fitchburg, $167,000.

Governor Ely received word from Harry L. Hopkins, federal relief administrator, that Massachusetts for the third quarter of the year will receive approximately $5,000,000 for the purpose

ASK WORK HELD UP

Municipal Research Bureau Petitions
Civil Works Board to Delay Action on $6,000,000 in Projects Submitted by Mayor Curley Until Next Year

In a letter to the State Emergency Finance Board yesterday, the Boston Municipal Research Bureau asked that a group of public works projects totaling $6,000,000 which were submitted by Mayor Curley Wednesday, be held in abeyance until after the first of the year, and that when a decision is made that the total be slashed.

The bureau held that the total for Boston public works should not exceed $10,000,000. It pointed out that a cash deficit of at least $15,000,000 is already in prospect for Dec. 31 in the city treasury, and delinquent taxes outstanding on that date will be between $25,000,000 and $30,000,000.

The letter, signed by H. C. Loeffler, secretary, was as follows:

Face Big Deficit

"Supplementary public works projects proposed yesterday by city authorities of Boston would increase the $5,500,000 of projects thus far authorized by your board to almost $12,000,000. For the following reasons, the Research Bureau urges an over-all limit of expenditures amounting to $7,000,000; certainly the limit of $10,000,000 promulgated by your board on Sept. 5, 1933, should not be exceeded.

"Tax Delinquencies High. The bureau's extensive memorandum of Aug. 28, 1933, contained a chart showing the progressively worse record of collections with respect to tax levies of recent years. There is attached a revision of this chart as of Nov. 30, 1933, which shows no improvement, despite efforts by city officials to stimulate tax collections. The city is faced with a cash deficit as of Dec. 31, 1933, estimated in excess of $15,000,000. Uncollected taxes on all levies as of that date will amount to from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000. With an uncertain future, Boston's credit structure should not be burdened with any greater addition of debt than the amounts indicated above. The debt service charges which are incurred will run for some 20 years.

Careful Scrutiny

"Insufficient Data. The facts made available about the new programme of Public Works are insufficient to permit of an informed decision. Your board was compelled to lower its fine standards of scrutiny and examination in meeting the emergency requiring rapid action on the relatively small sums involved in Civil Works projects for Boston. Whatever speed may be deemed

Transcript Dec. 8 $3,003,609 More for State Relief

Governor Ely has received a telegram from Harry Hopkins, Federal relief administrator, announcing that $3,003,609 has been allotted to Massachusetts for the third quarter, as partial reimbursement for public welfare expenditures made by the State under the Wagner-Steagall Act. The governor's office, on communicating with the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston today, was informed that $1,802 had already been deposited to State's credit and would be available soon as the governor signed for it. Part of the allotment will be paid to State in two equal parts on Dec. 21 and Jan. 10. The funds will be turned over to the State Emergency Finance Board, of which Joseph W. Bartlett is chairman, to be distributed proportionately among the various municipalities to reimburse them in part for their public welfare expenditures.

85,000 Jobs Already Created in Bay State

With no suggestion of any lessening in its intense effort to complete the program, the Civil Works Board, composed of Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett, State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley and William B. Coy, worked until midnight last night and added thousands of jobs to the list created for men and women unemployed in this State.

Working so fast against time, the board had little time to keep a strict check, and when the compilation was made last night the figures surprised even the board. With a program being worked out to put thousands of women to work on knitting and sewing projects, the total will be considerably enhanced in a short time.

Attracting Attention
A total of 250 projects had been approved up to yesterday morning. These called for jobs for 80,859 men and women, and the expenditure of $13,330,520.30 in wages and $1,998,278.51 of government funds for material. In addition, the cities and towns engaged in civil works projects contributed $2,763,882.77 for materials.

What started as a campaign to put $7,000 persons to work in Massachusetts at an expenditure of $12,000,000 of government funds, has now grown into an effort to put 121,000 to work, with scarcely a limit on the expenditures. Indications that the Massachusetts showing is attracting a lot of attention were given yesterday when Colonel Harry L. Hopkins, federal relief administrator, in a telephone conversation with Chairman Bartlett, told him to keep going and not to worry about technicalities.

The one big snag in the program, which is the employment of women on sewing and knitting projects, appears to be near solution. More than 1000 women are already at work on that program, and although Washington has declared it to be outside the scope of the civil works program, Bartlett believes it will be possible to put the women to work under a civil works service program, to be financed from the funds allotted to the State Emergency Finance Commission, the membership of which is that of the Civil Works Board.

Another vexing problem, that of putting unemployed school teachers to work, remains to be worked out. Those teachers who went to work under projects approved by the Civil Works Board cannot continue, but they will be paid, Chairman Bartlett said. In the meantime, the board is arguing with Washington in an effort to get permission to place teachers under the civil works program.

Explains Situation
Chairman Bartlett, in a statement last night, explained the situation. "We understood," he said, "that we were to approve work for women in substantial quantities. Early in the approval stage we approved projects for knitting and sewing on which 2000 women were to have work eventually."

Regarding the highway safety survey to be conducted by Technology experts, Mr. Bartlett declared:

"The Technology survey has been approved as a project the extent of which is to be determined by the civil works administration. We intend to have the Technology men to talk to the State Highway and Marine

Ryan, the registrar, and Timothy C. Murphy, executive secretary of the public safety department, who is representing Gen. Daniel Needham.

DEFINITE FIGURES
Joseph O'Connell, statistician for the board, last night gave definite figures to Chairman Bartlett as follows:

As of Dec. 6, last, the board had approved 2450 projects giving employment to 80,859 persons. The federal government will pay a wage bill of $13,330,520.30 on a basis of $1.33 per hour. The total expenditure by the programme along that line, to be paid for out of funds given us for federal emergency relief sources, and that that sort of work would be called Civil Works service projects and will receive his approval as such.

Seeking More for Teachers
"It calls temporarily for a halt on the knitting and sewing projects until the Emergency Finance Board can gather data through Director Scully. All women already put to work will be paid through those funds. A programme will be initiated in such amount as we may decide after a study of the possibilities."

"School teachers are not included because the national Federal Emergency Board decided to allocate certain designated funds for the relief of teachers. Massachusetts got $15,000 a month for two months with the promise that there would be more if needed. We are now arguing the need of extending that with information by Monday."

Chairman Bartlett explained that although most any sort of work for women can be included in the civil works service programme, the women employed must be practically on a relief basis.

For White-Collar Workers
He said, however, that the federal government's interpretation of that standard will be broader than the State regulations, and that it will be considerably loosened to allow other women to have jobs.

The report from Colonel Hopkins assured approval of a higher quota of work to be undertaken by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. This may employ 1000 white-collar workers. The details will be worked out at a conference of Technology officials and the members of the Civil Works Board in a few days.

An elaborate programme which is expected to add approximately 2000 persons to the list of job-holders was approved at its sitting last night. The programme was presented by Charles P. Howard, chairman of the commission on administration and finance, who has been named co-ordinator of the State civil works projects.

State Projects
Budget Commissioner Charles J. Fox of Boston, presented additional projects, including the employment of 106 men in the public buildings department at a cost of $9,000; 20 workers for cataloging and indexing, $900; 20 men for work on water mains and repair of buildings, $900; and 63 women for cataloging at the public library, $15,000.

The emergency public works commission submitted its eighth list of public works projects to Governor Ely for executive approval. According to estimates, 29 per cent of the costs will be used for labor. The projects included $84,000 for reconstruction and widening of Wellington street in Somerville; $100,000 for buildings at the Monson State Hospital, construction of a by-pass in Lincoln connecting near the Concord-Lincoln line with the new Belmont-Concord highway, and other items in connection, to cost $15,500; construction of a standpipe at the Worcester State Hospital, $25,118; work at the Northampton State Hospital, $92,000; construction of a laundry building at the Northampton State Hospital, $90,000; and reconstruction of the Ashby highway in Ashby and Fitchburg, $167,000.

Governor Ely received word from Harry L. Hopkins, federal relief administrator, that Massachusetts for the third quarter of the year will receive approximately $3,500,000 for the purpose

ASK WORK HELD UP

Municipal Research Bureau Petitions Civil Works Board to Delay Action on $6,000,000 in Projects Submitted by Mayor Curley Until Next Year

In a letter to the State Emergency Finance Board yesterday, the Boston Municipal Research Bureau asked that a group of public works projects totaling $6,000,000 which were submitted by Mayor Curley Wednesday, be held abeyance until after the first of year, and that when a decision is made that the total be slashed.

The bureau held that the total Boston public works should not exceed $10,000,000. It pointed out that a deficit of at least $15,000,000 in prospect for Dec. 31 in the city, and delinquent taxes outstanding date will be between $5 and $8,000,000.

The letter, signed by H. C. secretary, was as follows:

Face Big Deficit
"Supplementary public works proposed yesterday by city of Boston would increase of projects thus far authorized by the board to almost $12,000,000. Following reasons, the Research Bureau is opposed to such expenditures amounting to the limit of $10,000,000."

"Tax Delinquency—The bureau's extensive study, $8,100,000, contained a program which shows no improvement by city officials to date. The city is in a deficit as of Dec. 31, 1935, of $15,000,000."

"Whatsoever necessary in action projects, these I intend to receive as they are submitted."

Transcript Dec. 8 $3,003,609 More for State Relief

Governor Ely has received a telegram from Harry Hopkins, Federal relief administrator, announcing that $3,003,609 has been allotted to Massachusetts for the third quarter, as partial reimbursement for public welfare expenditures made by the State under the Wagner-Costigan Act. The governor's office, on communicating with the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston today, was informed that $1,501,805 had already been deposited to the State's credit and would be available as soon as the governor signed for it. The rest of the allotment will be paid to the State in two equal parts on Dec. 21 and Jan. 10. The funds will be turned over to the State Emergency Finance Board, of which Joseph W. Bartlett is chairman, to be distributed proportionately among the various municipalities to reimburse them in part for their public welfare expenditures.

The highway safety survey which will be undertaken by experts from Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

advice from Washington, however, that necessary. Each time, however, that Bartlett telephoned he was hemmed in with restrictions. Yesterday he determined to converse with Hopkins. "Hopkins told me not to worry and I'm not going to," was Bartlett's first remark at the end of the conversation. Later the chairman explained: "We understood we were to approve work for women in the apical quantities and early in the apical stage we approved a program for knitting which involved work in the future. Quotas already assigned to the state included agriculture."

INCLUDES WOMEN

On Nov. 26 instructions were received to the effect that civil works programs that would lead directly to construction work, or indirectly to possible construction work in the future. Quotas already assigned to the state included women.

Being disturbed about the situation I telephoned Col. Hopkins and he told me directly that knitting and sewing projects (on which 2000 women were to have work eventually) for women are not included in the civil works plan.

However, I was told that I could take a program like knitting and sewing if our board in this case the state emergency finance board that is responsible for the distribution of federal emergency relief

Teachers are not included for the reason that, nationally, the federal emergency relief board decided to allocate to each state separately designated funds to give relief to teachers. Massachusetts got $15,000 for two months, with the promise of more, if necessary.

We have urgently argued extending this work, as we have learned the extent of the teacher unemployment in Massachusetts. We expect further information on this matter by Monday next.

Asked whether projects for women are limited in type and scope, the chairman said:

Most any work for women could be included in the civil works program, but such work as civil works service projects is practically limited to women on a "relief basis." This "relief basis" is narrower than the federal government interpretation so that we expect to take care of people without the careful investigation the state requires.

Regarding the highway safety survey to be conducted by Technology experts, Mr. Bartlett declared:

The Technology survey has been approved as a project the extent of which is to be determined by the civil works administration. We intend to have the Technology men talk to the State and Federal

Ryan, the registrar, and Timothy C. Murphy, executive secretary of the public safety department, who is representing Gen. Daniel Needham.

DEFINITE FIGURES

Joseph O'Connell, statistician for the board, last night gave definite figures to Chairman Bartlett as follows:

As of Dec. 6, last, the board had approved 2480 projects giving employment to 80,850 persons. The federal government will pay a wage bill of $13,339,330. The total expenditure by the federal government will be $15,337,817.51. Cities and towns will contribute $2,763,882.77. Up to Wednesday the CWA in Massachusetts represents an ultimate expenditure of $18,101,700.58.

Because the federal government has increased the Massachusetts allotment to more than 121,000, it is believed the Massachusetts cash allotment will be more than $25,000,000 or more than twice the original estimate.

One of the first cities to feel the effects of this liberal increase in allotments of men and women was Worcester. Mayor John C. Mahoney presented projects yesterday which called for employments that the Massachusetts showing is attracting a lot of attention were given yesterday when Colonel Harry L. Hopkins, federal relief administrator, in a telephone conversation with Chairman Bartlett, told him to keep going and not to worry about technicalities.

The one big snag in the programme, which is the employment of women on sewing and knitting projects, appears to be near solution. More than 1000 women are already at work on that programme, and although Washington has declared it to be outside the scope of the civil works, Chairman Bartlett believes it will be possible to put the women to work under a civil works service programme, to be financed from the funds allotted to the State Emergency Finance Commission, the membership of which is that of the Civil Works Board.

Another vexing problem, that of putting unemployed school teachers to work, remains to be worked out. Those teachers who went to work under projects approved by the Civil Works Board cannot continue, but they will be paid, Chairman Bartlett said. In the meantime, the board is arguing with Washington in an effort to get permission to place teachers under the civil works programme.

Explains Situation

Chairman Bartlett, in a statement last night, explained the situation. "We are not out of the woods," he said, "that we were approved work for women in substantial quantities. Early in the approval we approved projects for knitting, 1000 women throughout the State, for the Department of Agriculture. After we approved some sewing projects, on Nov. 28, instructions were received to the effect that Civil Works projects were those directly connected with construction work or leading directly or indirectly to possible construction work in the future."

Notes already assigned to the State already women. Being disturbed about the situation, I telephoned Colonel Hopkins and he said knitting and sewing projects for women are not included in the Civil Works programme, but I could take care of a programme that if our board, the Emergency Finance Board, which is responsible for relief work, can get up a pro-

State regulations, and that it will be considerably loosened to allow other women to have jobs.

The report from Colonel Hopkins assured approval of a highway safety survey to be undertaken by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. This may employ 1000 white-collar workers. The details will be worked out at a conference of Technology officials and the members of the Civil Works Board in a few days.

An elaborate programme which is expected to add approximately 2000 persons to the list of job-holders was approved at the sitting last night. The programme was presented by Charles V. Howard, chairman of the commission on administration and finance, who has been named co-ordinator of the State civil works projects.

State Projects

Budget Commissioner Charles J. Fox of Boston, presented additional projects, including the employment of 206 men in the public buildings department at a cost of $61,000; 20 workers for cataloging and indexing, $200; 20 men for work on water mains and repair of buildings, $800; and 63 women for cataloging at the public library, $12,000.

The emergency public works commission submitted its eighth list of public works projects to Governor Ely for executive approval. According to estimates, 29 per cent of the costs will be used for labor. The projects included $84,000 for reconstruction and widening of Wellington Bridge in Somerville, $250,000 for buildings at the Monson State Hospital, construction of a by-pass in Lincoln connecting near the Concord-Lincoln line with the new Belmont-Concord highway, and other items in connection, to cost $15,500; construction of a standpipe at the Worcester State Hospital, $26,115; work at the Northampton State Hospital, $32,000; construction of a laundry building at the Northampton State Hospital, $30,000; and reconstruction of the State highway in Ashby and Fitchburg, $167,000.

Governor Ely received word from Harry L. Hopkins, federal relief administrator, that Massachusetts for the third quarter of the year will receive approximately $3,300,000 for the purpose

ASK WORK HELD UP

Municipal Research Bureau Petitions Civil Works Board to Delay Action on $6,000,000 in Projects Submitted by Mayor Curley Until Next Year

In a letter to the State Emergency Finance Board yesterday, the Boston Municipal Research Bureau asked that a group of public works projects totaling $6,000,000 which were submitted by Mayor Curley Wednesday, be held in abeyance until after the first of the year, and that when a decision is made that the total be stalled.

The bureau held that the total for Boston public works should not exceed $10,000,000. It pointed out that a cash deficit of at least $15,000,000 is already in prospect for Dec. 31 in the city treasury, and delinquent taxes outstanding on that date will be between $25,000,000 and $30,000,000.

The letter, signed by H. C. Loeffler, secretary, was as follows:

Face Big Deficit

"Supplementary public works projects proposed yesterday by city authorities of Boston would increase the $5,500,000 of projects thus far authorized by your board to almost $12,000,000. For the following reasons, the Research Bureau again urges an over-all limit of expenditures amounting to $10,000,000, certainly the limit of $10,000,000 promulgated by your board on Sept. 5, 1933, should not be exceeded.

"Tax Delinquencies High. The bureau's extensive memorandum of Aug. 28, 1932, contained a chart showing the progressively worse record of collections with respect to tax levies of recent years. There is attached a revision of this chart as of Nov. 30, 1933, which shows no improvement, despite efforts by city officials to stimulate tax collections. The city is faced with a cash deficit as of Dec. 31, 1933, estimated in excess of $15,000,000. Uncollected taxes on all levies as of that date will amount to from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000. With an uncertain future, Boston's credit structure should not be burdened with any greater addition of debt than the amounts indicated above. The debt service charges which are incurred will run for some 20 years.

Careful Scrutiny

"2-Inefficient Data. The facts made available about the new programme of Public Works are insufficient to permit of an informed decision. Your board was compelled to lower its fine standards of scrutiny and examination in meeting the emergency requiring rapid action on the relatively small sums involved in Civil Works projects for Boston. Whatever speed may be deemed necessary in acting on Civil Works projects, these Public Works projects should receive the same careful attention as heretofore.

"3-Delay Advisable for New City Administration. Public Works and Civil Works projects which have been approved provide a considerable amount of work. Moreover, the new Congress may provide new funds for additional Civil Works projects. If action on the Public Works projects now pending is withheld for a brief time no harm will be done, and meanwhile the new city administration (which, after all, must carry out the projects) will have been able to get some background on the financial and other problems involved. Finally, time will permit of broader studies for your board before action is taken.

"If your board wishes, the Research Bureau will submit a memorandum presenting such data as can be gathered in the time made available."

Quincy Asks New City Hall and Fire Station

Mayor Charles A. Ross of Quincy announced last night that he is applying for federal funds to build a new City Hall and central fire station in Quincy. The present City Hall building, constructed years ago, according to officials is inadequate for present day needs as a number of the city departments have to be located in offices rented outside the building. The present fire headquarters is not large enough properly to house the apparatus stationed there now. The location of a new station would probably be on Hardwick estate on Chestnut street.

MORE CWA JOBS FOR FALL RIVER

FALL RIVER, Dec. 7 - Fall River's C. W. A. force will be greatly increased in numbers. It was reported today, when skilled workers are assigned to jobs for the first time. Both skilled workers and their foremen will be paid $1.25 an hour. New projects include a clubhouse on the alumni field of the high school and work on the Watuppa Reservation that safeguards the water supply of Fall River. The Watuppa Reservation programme was given approval at the State House this afternoon.

JOBS FOR 101,240 CREATED BY CWA

Projects for Massachusetts
Women to Be Taken Up This Week

$35,000 DISTRIBUTED TO WORKERS HERE

The Massachusetts civil works administration, with a record of having approved projects creating 101,240 jobs in the last three weeks, will begin its final week tomorrow when civil works service projects involving thousands of women are presented to the board.

The first real taste of civil works money was given yesterday in Boston when $35,000 was distributed to 1500 men and women who worked on projects in the city. Because many welfare recipients, whose relief money was shut off when assigned to work had not by Thursday worked a full week, tomorrow, Tuesday and Wednesday will be pay days also.

Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the civil works board was disturbed yesterday when Mrs. Marion E. Wrayton of Newburyport told him that there was dissatisfaction rampant throughout the state because the civil works board had not approved projects for women. He acquainted Mrs. Wrayton with the difficulties confronting his board, and related that the women's civil works service projects do not have to start Dec. 15 or end Feb. 15, as do the CWA projects.

It was with a deal of satisfaction that the chairman released the figures to demonstrate impressively the work done in the last three weeks by the civil works administration, a task that has placed Massachusetts in the forefront of the civil works program nationally. Up to yesterday the board, and its a plan for providing medical, dental and nursing care for welfare recipients. Dr. Chadwick explained that the plan was formulated at a meeting of representatives of the state medical and dental societies, state visiting nurses association, state pharmaceutical association, and state and local welfare agencies.

The fee schedule presented was: Physicians, $2 for house visits, $1 for office calls, and $25 for obstetrical cases, including pre-natal and post-natal care, dentists, $1.50 a visit; nurses, 75 cents a visit. Pharmacists are to sell medical supplies and medicines at approximately cost. The board will act on the plan this week.

Mrs. Wrayton told Chairman Bartlett that she has spent many days and hours attempting to see him, that she had been sent from Miss Lois B. Rantoul, director of CWA women's activities who appointed Mrs. Wrayton CWA director in Essex county, to John T. Scully, federal emergency relief administrator, and to others and finally insisted on seeing Bartlett.

She related the plight of women in Newburyport, several hundreds of whom registered for jobs, and said nothing had been done. She felt that men with power to approve projects should be appointed in each county so that time and money could be saved in getting people to work. Dissatisfaction with the work of the board was widespread throughout the state, she said.

REGISTERS COMPLAINTS

Genuinely amazed at her words the chairman told Mrs. Wrayton that he had not heard a word of complaint.

Created by CWA in Three Weeks

that every official to visit him was perfectly willing to give his time and energy to getting men to work, and all were aware that the civil works board has done more work than any single group in the state to advance the civil works plan.

"Well, I have had complaints," said Mrs. Wrayton. "That's strange," returned Bartlett. "All the officials have been agreeable and eager to co-operate and no complaints." "They haven't had time to think over the projects, to give them the time and thought necessary," she continued. "So far they have had three weeks."

"It's impossible to do it in three weeks," Mrs. Wrayton asserted. "My instructions were to do the impossible in three weeks—to assign 97,000 men and women to work in three weeks, and we have done it," the chairman emphasized.

He then explained that original instructions led him to approve projects for 1000 women, "which we did right away," but later orders forbade further work by women from CWA money. Women projects, however, will be financed with $3,000,000 relief money coming to this state, although they will be known as civil works service projects.

"Mr. Scully will present his plan, or someone will," the chairman continued.

In addition, Dr. Payson Smith, state commissioner of education, will submit his plans to handle the teacher unemployment problem.

HEARD BY HURLEY

The project presented by Messrs. Delano, Kelley and Connolly was heard by State Treasurer Hurley. The project, as outlined, would mean hiring about 200 surveyors, engineers and clerical help to survey locations for railroad links, contours and railroad locations; making up and make-up yards; map break-up and make-up yards; study of similar terminal facilities elsewhere.

The men said they have sent a letter to Joseph B. Eastman, federal railroad co-ordinator, asking his support in furthering the plan for connecting railroad roads in the metropolitan area so that 66 cities and towns would be better served at lower freight costs. The port would also be better by increased business, would also be better by increased business, would also be better by increased business.

Dr. Chadwick's plan to provide medical, dental and nursing care for welfare recipients will undoubtedly be approved by the board, which requests the state health commissioner to recommend the plan. For administrative purposes will be used, six state health districts will be used, each with a health office and supervising nurse.

In each district an additional supervising nurse will be needed, the state supervising nutritionist will be part-time assistant and there will be full-time nutritionist and nurses added to the staff. Health education workers will conduct classes for teachers and be assigned to local groups throughout the state. In all the plan calls for an expenditure of $12,156 the first week and $8156 each additional week. It is hoped in this manner to relieve the strain on professional people who have continued to treat patients unable to pay them, or even purchase the necessary medicines and medical supplies.

Of Westbrook Pegler, Time magazine remarked, "the most pungent wit... the best critical reporting." Pegler's column starts Monday in the Boston Traveler and will appear daily thereafter. Don't miss it.

BEVERLY CITY HALL

REMODELING APPROVED

Special Dispatch to The Herald
BEVERLY, Dec. 9.—A project for remodeling the Beverly City Hall involving $53,000 and employing 120 men was approved by the CWA today.

The remodeling will include the removal of the fourth floor of the building and making it a three-floor structure; the changing over into offices of the hall on the third floor; a new entrance made to the upper floors; the installation of elevators; and the changing into offices of the auditorium.

The additional offices will give much needed accommodations. Estimates have been made and men will be put to work in about a week. The city will supply $10,000 and the government the rest.

Also approved by the CWA was 13 projects of the city electrical department involving $14,000. It is believed that almost all the unemployed electricians in the city will be given employment on these projects.

CWA JOBS FOR 101,204 AUTHORIZED

Payroll of $16,585,959
Now Guaranteed for State

Although functioning only three weeks, the Civil Works Board for this State yesterday went far past the quota originally set for it over a four-week period.

By noon yesterday, jobs had been authorized for 101,204 persons in this State, and a payroll of $16,585,959 had been guaranteed. The original programme of the government called for the local board to approve projects calling for the employment of 97,000 persons and the time limit was set at Dec. 15.

TOTAL FOR STATE, $19,059,186

A total of $19,059,186 has been poured into the State by the federal government, for in addition to the more than $18,000,000 in wages, the board has also authorized the expenditure of $2,177,226 for the materials to be used in Civil Works projects. To this total is added the cost of materials to be purchased from city and town funds, which amounts to $2,212,226.

There was no way to determine exactly how many of these jobs have actually been filled, but when the payroll payments are checked tomorrow, the board will know how many men and women have actually been put to work in the cities and towns throughout the State. It is believed that Massachusetts will be found near the forefront of States engaged in Civil Works projects.

Robert W. Keiss, field agent for the administration, checked the work of the board and declared that it was in splendid shape. In the checking it was brought out that a total of 286 separate projects have been approved by the board.

Work for Women Not Settled

The vexing problem of putting unemployed women to work remained unsolved, but it is expected that within a few days some definite programme will be outlined. Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett declared that the deadline of Dec. 15 on civil works projects does not apply to women who will be employed through the Federal Emergency Finance Board, and that women not on welfare rolls but who are in need of employment will be eligible for jobs.

A concrete plan for the employment of thousands of women will be presented tomorrow by Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, director of the women's division, and John T. Scully, director of welfare relief of the Emergency Finance Board. The programme will be financed by funds originally sent to this State to reduce the welfare burden of the municipalities.

According to Chairman Bartlett, there is $2,000,000 of this Federal money available for the women employment plan. It is in charge of the Emergency Finance Board and that organization will allocate the money to the cities and towns after the plan of Scully and Mrs. Rantoul is approved.

Women already employed on certain civil works projects, such as knitting sewing and teaching, will be paid, Bartlett said, but in the future they will be employed through the plan of the finance board.

Medical and Nursing Services

Dr. Henry D. Chadwick, commissioner of public health, submitted a programme to the Federal Emergency Relief board for providing dental, medical and nursing care in homes of those receiving unemployment relief. The plan includes a schedule of fees which the federal board would pay for the work of doctors, dentists and nurses in such homes.

The schedule calls for $2 for house calls for physicians, $1 for office calls, and $25 for obstetrical cases, including pre-natal and post-natal care; $1.50 for dentists' visits, and 75 cents for nurses' visits. Pharmacists would furnish medicine and medical supplies approximately at cost. The plan will be taken under advisement by the board.

State Projects Approved

Charles P. Howard, chairman of the commission on administration and finance, after receiving approval for a number of projects, said that 2000 jobs have been authorized by the Civil Works Board on State programmes during the past week, and that by tomorrow every job will be filled. The projects presented by Howard and which received approval yesterday called for the employment of 877 men.

percent European tour of George P. Tilton, executive secretary of the Fort Authority.

Others on the list, awaiting approval, are the demolition of old ship hulks on the waterfront, necessitating the hiring of 20 men, minor repairs at Commonwealth piers in East Boston and South Boston, such as painting, etc., also requiring the services of 20 men, and repairing of sea walls around the harbor, for which 40 men would be needed. The clearing up of Castle Island, to improve the approach to the new Donald MacKay Memorial, and removal of unsightly debris on the harbor islands, are other port improvements planned, but not as yet approved.

STILL HOPING FOR WORK FOR TEACHERS

The school committee is still hoping for a new ruling from Washington on the question of re-employing the 40 substitute Boston school teachers who were dismissed at the end of the school service, visited with... charged that the federal service in assign- ing men to jobs, and established a new registration office on the third floor of a fire station. Lary reported to William B. Coy, Boston banker who is the third member of the civil works board, that Mayor John H. Burke of Medford has apparently made good his promise to co-operate with the federal officials, a promise made after Burke and other Medford officials had been ordered to do so by Bartlett Friday.

PRESENTS NEW PLAN

To the state emergency finance board—three members of which constitute the civil works administration—Dr. Henry D. Chadwick, state commissioner of public health, presented a plan for providing medical, dental and nursing care for welfare recipients. Dr. Chadwick explained that the plan was formulated at a meeting of representatives of the state medical and dental societies, state visiting nurses association, state pharmaceutical association, and state and local welfare agencies.

The fee schedule presented was: Physicians, $2 for house visits, $1 for office calls, and $25 for obstetrical cases, including pre-natal and post-natal care; dentists, $1.50 a visit; nurses, 75 cents a visit. Pharmacists are to sell medical supplies and medicines at approximately cost. The board will act on the plan this week.

Mrs. Wrayton told Chairman Bartlett that she has spent many days and hours attempting to see him, that she had been sent from Miss Lois B. Rantoul, director of CWA women's activities who appointed Mrs. Wrayton director in Essex county, to John T. Scully, federal emergency relief administrator, and to others and finally insisted on seeing Bartlett.

She related the plight of women in Newburyport, several hundreds of whom registered for jobs, and said nothing had been done. She felt that men with power to approve projects should be appointed in each county so that time and money could be saved in getting people to work. Dissatisfaction with the work of the board was widespread throughout the state, she said.

REGISTERS COMPLAINTS

Genuinely amazed at her words the chairman told Mrs. Wrayton that he had not heard a word of complaint.

TOTAL FOR STATE, $19,059,186

A total of $19,059,186 has been poured into the State by the federal government, for in addition to the more than $10,000,000 in wages, the board has also authorized the expenditure of $2,472,255 the materials to be used in civil works projects. To this total is added the cost of materials to be purchased from city and town funds, which amounts to $2,316,290.

There was no way to determine exactly how many of these jobs have actually been filled, but when the payroll payments are checked tomorrow, the board will know how many men and women have actually been put to work in the cities and towns throughout the State. It is believed that Massachusetts will be found near the forefront of States engaged in civil works projects.

Robert W. Kelso, held agent for the administration, checked the work of the board and declared that it was in splendid shape. In the checking it was brought out that a total of 238 separate projects have been approved by the board.

Work for Women Not Settled

The vexing problem of putting unemployed women to work remained unsolved, but it is expected that within a few days some definite programme will be outlined. Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett declared that the deadline of Dec. 15 on civil works projects does not apply to women who will be employed through the Federal Emergency Finance Board, and that women not on welfare rolls but who are in need of employment will be eligible for jobs.

A concrete plan for the employment of thousands of women will be presented tomorrow by Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, director of the women's division, and John T. Scully, director of welfare relief of the Emergency Finance Board. The programme will be financed by funds originating in the State to reduce the welfare burden of the municipalities.

According to Chairman Bartlett, there is $2,800,000 of this Federal money available for the women employment plan. It is in charge of the Emergency Finance Board and that organization will allocate the money to the cities and towns after the plan of Scully and Mrs. Rantoul is approved.

Women already employed on certain civil works projects, such as building sewing and teaching, will be paid, Bartlett said, but in the future they will be employed through the plan of the finance board.

Medical and Nursing Services

Dr. Henry D. Chadwick, commissioner of public health, submitted a programme to the Federal Emergency Relief board for providing dental, medical and nursing care in homes of those receiving unemployment relief. The plan includes a schedule of fees which the federal board would pay for the work of doctors, dentists and nurses in such homes.

The schedule calls for $2 for house calls for physicians, $1 for office calls and $25 for obstetric cases, including pre-natal and post-natal care; $1.50 for dentists' visits, and 75 cents for nurses' visits. Pharmacists would furnish medicine and medical supplies approximately at cost. The plan will be taken under advisement by the board.

State Projects Approved

Charles P. Howard, chairman of the commission on administration and finance, after receiving approval for a number of projects, said that 500 jobs have been authorized by the Civil Works Board on State programmes during the past week, and that by tomorrow every job will be filled.

The projects presented by Howard and which received approval yesterday called for the employment of 577 men and women, and the expenditure in wages of $10,611. They included a complete new system of sewage filter beds at the Bridgewater State Farm, which will furnish employment to 700 men and the expenditure of $125,320 in wages, and a repair and painting job at the new artillery and munitions depot at Natick to employ 77 men at a cost of $30,320 in wages.

Other projects included for the State are repairs to State police substations at Rebooth, Monson, Lee and Freetown at a cost of $166 and calling for the employment of 19 men, and work at the Reformatory for Women at Framingham, to employ 40 persons at an expenditure of $424. Eleven men will be employed in repairs at the Taunton State Hospital, which will cost $1500, and 15 men at the Weymouth State Hospital, where $2250 will be expended.

Railroad Work Proposed

State Treasurer Charles P. Hapley, who is a member of the Civil Works Board, heard a project sponsored by the United Improvement Association for the unification of railroad facilities in Boston by the construction of 12 miles of connecting track. The proposal will be sent to Joseph R. Eastman, railroad coordinator, for his opinion before any action is taken by the board.

The Port of Boston is sharing in the benefits of the C. W. A. programme. Several projects proposed by the Boston Port Authority, the city of Boston, and State Department of Public Works have already been approved and work has actually started in some cases, while others are being considered.

One of the things already begun is a survey of all property on the harbor side of the streets bordering on the waterfront, within the Boston boundaries. Captain George P. Lord, marine supervisor of the Port Authority, is directing this survey, which will seek facts regarding ownership and use of his property.

Another of the projects was the conducting of a statistical survey by two men of the port, with a view of building up commerce, and a third was the handling of special foreign correspondence by an experienced girl secretary. The latter is an outgrowth of the work on Friday because no announcements had been made to pay them their salaries under the provisions of the Civil Works Administration.

The teachers were given the temporary positions in all branches of the Boston school system under the original announcement of the Civil Works Administration and when it was subsequently decided that they were not to be included, the school committee agreed to pay them for one week's work from the reserve fund. The certification of this special pay roll was started yesterday and it was expected that the teachers would receive remuneration for their work for one week sometime this week.

Aid for Artists to Be Planned in Boston Today

CWA Committee Is Meeting
at Museum of Fine
Arts

By Albert Franz Cochrane

A movement to aid New England artists who have been hard hit by the depression was started in Boston this afternoon when the regional committee of the Federal Public Works of Art Project, a subsidiary of the C. W. A., met at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts to discuss a program designed to give employment to 2500 artists throughout the United States. A number of artists, museum directors, and others were invited to the museum meeting by Henry P. Taylor, chairman of the New England committee, and of the Worcester Museum of Art. Those urged to attend the meeting were asked to supply the names of artists, paying special attention to those qualified for decoration of public buildings.

Assisting Chairman Taylor in making up this list are Paul J. Sachs, associate director of the Fogg Museum at Harvard, and Edward J. Holmes, director of the Boston Museum, at whose office the afternoon meeting was held. They sent telegrams to directors of all New England museums urging them to Boston this afternoon. Many of those invited were taken by surprise, knowing nothing of the contemplated project, which was started only a day or so ago in Washington. Twenty-five accepted invitations and started for Boston at once.

The program, as announced in Washington, will be under the general supervision of L. W. Robert, Jr., Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and was agreed upon by the War Relocation Authority.

discrimination will be shown. "Our project is two-fold," he said. "First to give employment to as many painters as possible. Second to select from what is thus made available work suitable to recommend to the Government for the decoration of public buildings."

Mr. Taylor also revealed that his committee had obtained from Washington a ruling to the effect that any framed picture could come under the official interpretation of a "mural." A mural is generally considered to be limited to a picture painted directly into the fresh plaster.

Under the new ruling, it will be possible to commission not only small paintings in oils, but etchings, lithographs and other such studies, suitable for distribution to public schools for exhibition and instruction in the various arts. Mr. Taylor believes the larger projects will be few in number, for lack of practice in work on a grand scale has prevented the development of many painters competent of such undertakings.

Denying the suggestion emanating from Washington news sources that Federal buildings are to be turned over freely to every painter who applies for work, Mr. Taylor stated that preliminary employment will take the established form of any competition, the drawing up of entry sketches. This work will be paid for on a salary basis. But the Government, through its committees, will reserve the right to commission or reject such entries.

State to Aid Cities, Towns on Welfare

Usual Assistance Will Be Given, Governor Ely Decides

Cities and towns of Massachusetts will receive the usual financial aid from the State for unsettled welfare cases not withstanding the contribution for welfare relief made by the Federal Government. This was the decision of Governor Ely today after a conference with Chairman Charles P. Howard of the State commission on administration and finance. Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the C. W. A. and Theodore N. Wadell, director of the division of accounts.

The State officials discussed during the conference the question of the State's obligation to reimburse the cities and towns for unsettled welfare expenditures in view of the fact that funds had been made available by the Federal authorities.

"I decided we should make the payment as usual," the governor said. "We a check for $1,500,000 from the Federal Government as half of the third quarterly payment to the State under the Cogan bill, which provided for the partial reimbursement of the States and communities for welfare expenditures.

"This money is more or less free money so far as the budgets of cities and towns are concerned," the governor said. "It has to be handled under the direction of the Federal Government, but it could be used by the State in part to cover our own welfare cases. There will be $1,500,000 more coming in two installments of approximately $750,000 each."

The governor said the State Civil Works board had tentatively approved projects which would increase employment of men and women to 140,000 and that this program if approved by Washington would involve the expenditure of $3,000,000.

Chairman Bartlett said the board was watching instructions as to whether the Federal authorities approved the tentative plans and authorized the expenditure of the $3,000,000 in that manner.

Time Limit Costs Women Job Chances

Moving Up Date Makes It Impossible to Submit Projects

Some Rush Here
at Last Minute

Three from Pittsfield Drive to Boston Through Storm

Failure to get jobs for women was the only reward today of intense last minute attempts of many communities in the State. The failure was due to the order which advanced from tomorrow to this night the time for submitting projects. The order was transmitted to the field on Monday. Many of the 120 women directors were unable to get their ideas to Boston on time. Widespread resentment is expected to follow.

Three determined women returned through the snow storm yesterday afternoon from Pittsfield to Boston, with the return trip in the night facing them, in order to get their work projects for women into the hands of Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul within the time limit set by Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the State Civil Works Board for Massachusetts.

All over the State the women were forced into intense efforts to find for themselves their small part of the employment which is being provided through the Civil Works Administration. Their success depends upon the time they get their projects before Mrs. Rantoul and Mr. Bartlett in approaching the end of the day. Most of them succeeded, but many of them failed, and their work was lost the race.

Scattered among those who failed were women of Grafton, and the women of Provincetown, because they did not get their projects into the hands of Mrs. Rantoul in time to get them into the hands of the State Civil Works Board for the delivery of the work schedules for their districts, only to learn that they were too late.

The women who failed, which, in the matter of financing, comes under the Federal Emergency Relief Administration.

To Seek 25,000 Additional Jobs on CWA Projects

Bartlett Will Ask Hopkins to Approve Program Bringing
Total to 145,000

Because projects which have been approved by the State Civil Works Board call for employment of approximately 145,000 men and women, despite the fact that the allocation for Massachusetts under the Federal C. W. A. program has been set at 121,250 persons, Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State board announced today that he will appeal to Harry L. Hopkins, Federal emergency relief administrator, for the allotment of 25,000 additional positions.

Originally this State was authorized to undertake projects to provide work for 57,000 persons, but recently the Federal officials allowed the employment of 25,000 additional men and women, bringing the total to 121,250. At that time Chairman Bartlett appealed to municipal heads to submit additional projects and as a result so many were presented that the board in approving proposals tentatively has exceeded the allocation. Chairman Bartlett was unable to state what procedure would be followed by the board in the event an additional 25,000 is denied. The State board today approved the following projects:

Easton, eleven men, $1627, addition to concrete on Foundry street; Brockton, twenty-five men, $16,149, shade trees; Millis, 120 men, $25,213, Cedar Swamp park improvements; Easton, fifteen men, $2291, road work and elimination of curve on Highway; Quincy, sixty-seven men, $3781, additional labor on projects already approved; Millbury, twenty-two men, $17,874, road construction and miscellaneous projects; Lynn, fifty-eight men, $8222, grading; Williamsburg, twenty-seven men, $4940, graveling, cleaning, mowing, brush and painting school building; Norfolk County, twenty-one men, $977, building roads; Quincy, thirty-seven men, $6145, pathing and alterations to schools; Northampton, fifty men, $3098, ice on inside of schools; Auburn, ninety-eight men, $23,090, building and grading; Ayer, twenty men, $3094, brush, water and grading; Oak Bluffs, sixteen men, $1170, park work.

WAR DEPT. JOBS HERE FOR 1941

Total of $1,642,151 Is Approved for Civil Works

WASHINGTON, Dec. 13 (AP)—War Department projects, which officials estimated would give employment to 1941 men and involving expenditure of $1,642,151 in Massachusetts, were approved today by the Civil Works Administration.

WITHIN FEW DAYS

Representative McCormack of Massachusetts was informed two hours after making a personal appeal for early approval of the projects that the entire supplementary program of the War Department in Massachusetts had been approved and would be started at once. The War Department, McCormack said, asserted some men would be at work within a few days.

The largest project called for expenditure of $900,000 for repair or replacement of the wharf piling and general reconditioning of the entire wharf and docking facilities at the Boston quartermaster depot in South Boston. This project, officials estimated, would provide work for 12 supervisors, 300 skilled workers, 150 semi-skilled workers and 250 unskilled workers, with work to be started within 15 days.

Another allotment of $25,000 was approved for reconditioning and painting of the first corps area headquarters at Boston, with estimated employment for one supervisor, 10 skilled workers, two semi-skilled workers and three unskilled workers, with work to be started in 10 days.

The Watertown arsenal was allotted $70,042 for three projects.

Four buildings will be repaired at a cost of $25,000, with work for two supervisors, 20 skilled workers, six semi-skilled workers and 11 unskilled men to be started within 10 days. Work of painting seven buildings at a cost of $27,792 will be started within five days with employment for 120 supervisors, 16 skilled workers, 10 semi-skilled workers and 10 unskilled workers, while an additional $7200 will be spent on road repairs with employment within 10 days for six supervisors, 10 skilled workers, 11 semi-skilled workers and 40 laborers.

Nine projects at Fort Devens, totaling $597,907, which Representative Rogers of Massachusetts had advocated in conference with Civil Works Administrator Hopkins, also were approved.

Fort Banks and harbor posts at Boston were awarded $15,720 for improvements, which within 10 days should give work to one supervisor, 10 skilled workers, 10 semi-skilled workers, and 10 laborers.

Aid for Artists to Be Planned in Boston Today

CWA Committee Is Meeting at Museum of Fine Arts

By Albert Franz Cochrane

A movement to aid New England artists who have been hard hit by the depression was started in Boston this afternoon when the regional committee of the Federal Public Works of Art Project, a subsidiary of the C. W. A., met at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts to discuss local ways and means of launching a program designed to give employment to 2500 artists throughout the United States. A number of artists, museum directors, and others, were invited to the museum meeting by Henry P. Taylor, chairman of the New England committee, and director of the Worcester Museum of Art. Those urged to attend the meeting were also asked to supply the names of destitute artists, paying especial attention to those qualified for decoration of public buildings.

Assisting Chairman Taylor in making up this list are Paul J. Sachs, associate director of the Fogg Museum at Harvard, and Edward J. Holmes, director of the Boston Museum, at whose office the afternoon meeting was held. They sent telegrams to directors of all New England museums urging them to Boston this afternoon. Many of those invited were taken by surprise, knowing nothing of the contemplated project, which was started only a day or so ago in Washington. Twenty-five accepted invitations and started for Boston at once.

The program, as announced in Washington, will be under the general supervision of L. W. Robert, Jr., Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and was agreed to by the War Relocation Authority.

"Our project is two-fold," he said. "First to give employment to as many artists as possible. Second to select from what is thus made available work suitable to recommend to the Government for the decoration of public buildings."

Mr. Taylor also revealed that his committee had obtained from Washington a ruling to the effect that any framed picture could come under the official interpretation of a "mural." A mural is generally considered to be limited to a picture painted directly into the fresh plaster.

Under the new ruling, it will be possible to commission not only small paintings in oils, but etchings, lithographs and other such studies, suitable for distribution to public schools for exhibition and instruction in the various arts. Mr. Taylor believes the larger projects will be few in number, for lack of practical work on a grand scale has prevented the development of many painters competent of such undertakings.

Denying the suggestion emanating from Washington news sources that Federal buildings are to be turned over freely to every painter who applies for work, Mr. Taylor stated that preliminary employment will take the established form of any competition, the drawing up of entry sketches. This work will be paid for on a salary basis. But the Government, through its committees, will reserve the right to commission or reject such entries.

PLAN WORK FOR 10,000 WOMEN

Projects in State to Be Submitted Late Today

Projects for the employment of 10,000 women throughout the State under the Civil Works program will be submitted by Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul to Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State Civil Works Board late this afternoon.

Chairman Charles P. Howard of the State Commission on Administration and Finance conferred with Chairman Bartlett today regarding a large number of projects which have been tentatively approved.

A complaint from Newton as to the employment from two lists, welfare and Federal registration, caused Chairman Bartlett to telephone to Newton to hold to the 50-50 rule, making an equal division on employment.

STATE C. W. BOARD TOTAL ON JOBS 114,055

Compilation of figures at the office of the State Civil Works Board today show that the board has authorized the employment of 114,055 men and women throughout the State. The Federal quota, which must be completed by Friday, calls for the employment of approximately 121,000 persons.

The board members, Joseph Bartlett, State Treas. Charles F. Hurley and William B. Coy, feel that the board is now so close to the necessary total that there is no doubt it will be easily reached.

The wage payments to the workers, as of today, have reached $18,320,928, while $2,611,753 will be expended in materials, which, with cities' and towns' contributions of $3,645,014, makes a gross total of $24,777,706.

a check for $1 Government as to the payment of the bill, which would reimburse communities for this money. This money is so far as the are concerned has to be paid by the Federal Government. The Federal Government is not to be paid by the own welfare of the communities. The Federal Government is not to be paid by the own welfare of the communities. The Federal Government is not to be paid by the own welfare of the communities.

Eight O'Clock Limit

Mrs. Rantoul had been instructed that all her projects, with her approval as State director of work for women had to be in Mr. Bartlett's office before Wednesday night. At eight o'clock last night she completed her work on the schedule that had reached her up to that hour and transmitted the approval list to Chairman Bartlett at the State House. This afternoon Mrs. Rantoul paid tribute to the loyalty of her staff members and other women who have worked long hours on this emergency work program to have it ready on time. As it went to Chairman Bartlett, whose approval also is required, it provided work for 6500 women throughout the State, exclusive of the projects in the Boston area and the State projects which did not come under her jurisdiction. Neither does it include the school teachers.

With some of the projects already in progress, under earlier approval, Mrs. Rantoul's office has definitely provided for 9250 women, assuming that all the projects receive favorable consideration in Chairman Bartlett's office.

It became known Monday that the women would have only until last evening in which to submit their projects, which was a shorter time than had been expected, and immediately Mrs. Rantoul telegraphed instructions to the 100 women directors in various parts of the State. For these women to submit projects involved more than a guess as to what could be done in their communities.

They had to have definite projects entered on regulation blank forms, with description of projects, statement of the number of women to be employed and an estimate of cost.

To many of the directors the plan was new. They had been so recently appointed that they had not had time to familiarize themselves with the requirements, and generally assumed that they would have until Friday in which to submit their projects. All day yesterday they rushed their proposals into the office of Mrs. Rantoul. After the books had been closed last night reports continued to come in from cities and towns, only those women, however, who personally delivered their schedules earned it they came within the time limit.

File of Schedules

Today Mrs. Rantoul has a pile of schedules, for many communities, which came too late but which she says she nevertheless will pass upon and forward to Chairman Bartlett. They would bring the quota of these women to the figure of 10,000.

For the Nantucket women there was nothing that Mrs. Rantoul could promise. They came into the movement late, and yesterday telephoned to Mrs. Rantoul for information.

But they had nothing then to offer, and no means of transmitting any rush plan to the Boston office within the time limit. A change has been made in the financing these projects for women. The program for them started in the Civil Works Board, but has been transferred to the Civil Works Service, which, in the matter of financing, comes under the Federal Emergency Relief Administration.

To Seek 25,000 Additional Jobs on CWA Projects

Bartlett Will Ask Hopkins to Approve Program Bringing Total to 145,000

Because projects which have been approved by the State Civil Works Board call for employment of approximately 145,000 men and women, despite the fact that the allocation for Massachusetts under the Federal C. ## Civil Works Schedule Completed Ahead of Time

(Copyright, 1933, by United Press)
WASHINGTON, Dec. 14 (UP)—
In 36 days the civil works administration has put 4,000,000 persons to work, reaching its goal two days ahead of schedule, the United Press learned today.

Disparaging the political aspects of the vast task, observers were agreed that Administrator Harry L. Hopkins had accomplished one of the most momentous pieces of organization work ever done in this nation that prides itself on high-speed efficiency.

Hopkins had assured President Roosevelt that he would have 4,000 men jobless at work by Dec. 16, and climbed to that prediction in the face of doubt of persons who felt it was impossible.

Every State was checked by telephone today and it was found that the campaign had been pushed to a successful conclusion two days short of the time allotted.

To accomplish this, Hopkins spent money at the blinding rate of $40,000 a week. Reaction was instantaneous; his reports shrank. Corner grocers, who had not been paid in months, began to fill their cash registers with the blue government pay vouchers which workers on projects were receiving. Street car and bus receipts in some cities climbed to levels they had not attained since the pre-depression year of 1928. Newspapers added circulation.

List of Projects Submitted by Emergency Public Works Commission Provides for Widening of Several State Highways

The approval of Governor Ely was given yesterday to a list of projects submitted by the State Emergency Public Works Commission. The projects were as follows:

- Widening of State highway from Surrbridge to Brimfield Village, $225,000.
- Reconstruction of State highway in Charlestown, $418,660.
- Resurfacing and widening of State highway from Northampton to Hatfield, $150,000.
- Reconstruction, resurfacing and widening of State highway in Sterling, $500,000.
- Construction of a steel plate girder bridge and approaches in Revere to span the Boston, Revere Beach & Lynn Railroad and the Revere Beach Parkway, $354,020.
- Widening and resurfacing State highway in Essex and Gloucester, $182,000.
- Widening and resurfacing State highway from Worcester to Great Barrington, $135,000.
- Repairs and alterations to the Commonwealth Depot and motor park at Natick, $2,487.
- Construction, equipment and furnishing of a junior inmates' dormitory at the Women's Reformatory, Framingham, $57,474.
- Resurfacing and widening State highway from the end of Pawtucket boulevard in Lowell to the approach of the Tyngsboro bridge, $104,500.
- Reconstruction of State highway at Charlton and East Brookfield, $54,200.

The following projects were approved today by the state civil works board.

EASTON, $10,077, 11 jobs, addition to cemetery on Foundry street; $2,201, 15 men, gravel and elimination of curve.

BROCKTON $16,149, 95 jobs, shade trees.

MILFORD, $25,213, 190 jobs, Cedar street, park improvements.

Thus, by this decision, Massachusetts cities and towns will have an additional $1,000,000—and perhaps more—to aid the unemployed. The Governor announced that he had received a check for $1,500,000 from the federal government as part of the third quarterly installment to be disbursed to cities and towns for anticipated revenue.

The Governor continued:
"The first and second instalments of this money were put into anticipatory revenue. This money is more or less free money so far as the budgets of cities and towns are concerned. The federal government, as you know,

"The money could be spent by the state, in part, to cover our own welfare expenses. There will be another $1,500,000 coming to Massachusetts in the form of payments of $750,000 each."

Of the $3,000,000 allotted to Massachusetts under the so-called welfare reimbursement bill presented by Sen. Costigan, the state received $1,500,000 in payment of the third quarterly instalment. Chairman Bartlett will confer with Washington officials regarding his plans for spending this money.

SOMERVILLE ALDERMAN ASKS WELFARE PROBE

Calls on Durgin to Name Member of CWA Workers

Alderman John M. Lynch of Somerville introduced an order at a meeting of the aldermen last night calling for the presence of Fred E. Durgin, chairman, and the other members of the board of public welfare to appear before the aldermen to explain how many men are employed at the present time on the civic works program. He explained that although the aldermen have appropriated $81,000 for equipment, Durgin has declined to discuss the number of men employed.

A communication from Mayor John J. Murphy, demanding that the extra premium of 5 cents on each $100 worth of insurance carried by the city cancelled. He called to task the national board of fire insurance underwriters for their recent criticism of the Somerville fire department and asked that a committee of aldermen be selected to visit the fire insurance underwriters with a view to cancelling the premium.

Over 4 Million Now Employed on Civil Works

CWA Announces Goal
Reached — 1,500,000 Families Still on Relief

Washington, Dec. 15 (AP)—The Civil Works Administration said today that more than 4,000,000 are now on its payroll. This was the goal set by President Roosevelt, in authorizing use of up to $400,000,000 for direct employment of persons previously on relief rolls. It is expected that Congress will be asked to provide more funds to carry the CWA into the spring months.

Harry L. Hopkins, civil works administrator, told reporters his information showed that the full quota of employment planned for Dec. 15 has been completed. He could not, however, give any definite figures and contented himself with the statement that over 4,000,000 are employed. He paid tribute to State and local civil works administrators and volunteer workers who have devoted their time to the situation for the past month.

Some of the States have not filled their CWA quota but others have exceeded the number they were supposed to employ. Adjustments will be made to level out the situation. Hopkins estimated there still are 1,500,000 families on relief rolls and said the exact number probably will not be known for another thirty days.

39-Hour Week for White Collar Men

Hopkins today made public rules covering the employment of clerical workers. This carries the stipulation that the so-called white-collar workers may be employed up to thirty-nine hours per week at prevailing rates in the individual communities, but not less than the following rates per week:

	Operating	Technical	Inter-	Super-	Super-
	Base	Immediate	Visiting	Visiting	Visiting
Southern zone...	$12	$15	$18	$21	$24
Central zone...	15	18	21	24	27
Northern zone...	18	21	24	27	30

The rates for semi-skilled labor depend upon local custom and are to be set between the wage rate for skilled and unskilled labor unless otherwise provided for by agreements approved by the Public Works Administrations within or through the State.

Efforts to find work for women which will not interfere with jobs for men under the CWA was urged upon President Roosevelt today by Representative Edith N. Rogers (R., Mass.). She said Mr. Roosevelt expressed the hope of greater possibilities in this direction.

Boston Is Given Little in State List of Projects

Item of $164,000 in Today's Grant for Hospital — State
Total Is $2,600,000

Massachusetts projects under the Public Works Administration which received the approval of Washington today, according to the Associated Press, total $2,600,000. In the list is a single project to be undertaken in Boston, that of a small building at the State Hospital.

With the loans and grants approved hundreds of men can be put to work within a few months.

Mayor Curley's friends may be disappointed in reading the latest list of State projects in that none of the mayor's local program appears. The mayor has been in Washington since yesterday morning.

Quincy, Mass., received two loans and grants, one of $339,000 for extension of its sanitary sewer system in Quantum Adams Shore and Hough's Neck district. Work on this project can start in a week and PWA estimated 300 men would be employed eight months. The other was for $159,000 for improvement of storm water sewers by diversions and extensions of brook drains within the city. Work can start immediately and PWA estimated 150 men could be employed eight months.

Brookline, Mass., received two loans and grants, one of $38,000 for relocation of water mains including enlargement of the main along the widened Boylston street. Work on this project can begin in three weeks and PWA estimated fifteen men could be employed ten months. The other of $16,000 was for relocation of sanitary sewers on Boylston street preliminary to widening and repaving the thoroughfare. Work can start in one month and PWA estimated twenty men could be employed four months.

State Improvements

Massachusetts received seven loans and grants. One for $25,000 was for resurfacing State highway route No. 13 from Montecito to town line easterly to the junction with the State route No. 8. Work can start at once and PWA estimated forty-two men would be employed two months.

The second of $120,000 was for resurfacing with bituminous macadam 4.3 miles of State highway No. 32 from the Ware-Palmer town line to the junction with Thorndike street at Palmer. Work can start in two months and PWA said sixty-five men could be employed five months.

The third was $164,000 for construction of a two-story and part basement fireproof hospital and the purchase of certain equipment for the Boston State Hospital. Work can start in one month and PWA estimated fifty-one men would be employed five months.

The fourth was $13,000 for widening and resurfacing with bituminous macadam State highway number 331 in Winchendon. Work can start in three weeks and PWA estimated thirty-five men would be employed forty-five days.

The fifth was for $229,000 for reconstruction, resurfacing and widening 2.1 miles of State highway route 1-A in the city of Revere. Work can start in one month and PWA estimated 170 men would be employed five months.

The sixth was for $42,000 for construction of a sanitary sewer to serve the Walter E. Pernal State School at Waverley. Work can start in one month and PWA estimated forty men would be employed five months.

The seventh of $35,000 was for widening the State highway No. 126 between the towns of Ashland and Holliston. Work can start in two weeks and PWA thirty-two men would be employed three months.

New Bedford's Loans

New Bedford, Mass., received three loans and grants. One of $500,000 was for replacement of approximately four miles of existing 36-inch cast iron pipe with water mains with 48-inch cast iron. Work can start in two weeks and PWA estimated 85 men would be employed 15 months. The second of the same sum was for construction of a three-story and basement 46 classroom and cafeteria fireproof addition to the high school building. Work can start in one month and PWA estimated 120 men would be employed a year. The third was for $428,000 for surfacing with bituminous macadam and installation of curb and drainage facilities of parts of Acushnet avenue, Purchase street and Ashley boulevard. Work can begin immediately and PWA estimated 180 men would be employed a year.

Quincy and Brookline

Quincy, Mass., received two loans and grants, one of $339,000 for extension of its sanitary sewer system in Quantum Adams Shore and Hough's Neck district. Work on this project can start in a week and PWA estimated 300 men would be employed eight months. ## Single Employment Office for Boston

All persons in Boston looking for work on projects of any public character, whether the projects are financed in part by the State or the Federal government, are to register in the new single employment office in the new public building at 100 North Street, near North Station. Three floors in that building have been opened for registration and assignment of workers, and Everett L. Hanna is the manager of the office.

There is no other public employment office in the city to handle the labor for these projects. The former office at 129 Congress street was closed some time ago, and the office in the South Armory was closed this week. Women also are directed to report to the new office at 100 North Street.

The system of registration has been changed throughout the State. The State employment director, Dr. Robert S. Quinby, whose headquarters are in the Federal Building, which serve as his quarters also for the National Employment Service, has appointed employment managers in nearly all the cities and towns in Massachusetts. There are 233 such offices, each with a local manager, and only in a few instances does one office serve more than one place in the city or town hall.

People looking for work must register in their home town, except that the Boston office will register applicants from nearby places who want work on some of the large Federal jobs, such as the bridge work in Quincy.

Artists' Work for CWA Can Include Framed Pictures, Washington Rules

Worcester, Dec. 15—The selection of John Davis Hatch, Jr., of Boston, assistant director of the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum of Boston, as assistant general chairman of the New England committee of the Federal public works of art projects under the CWA was announced today by Francis Henry Taylor, director of the Worcester Art Museum, who is chairman of the committee.

Mr. Hatch will have charge of the general headquarters of the committee in the main office of the Gardner Museum, where space has been offered to the committee by Morris Carter, director.

Thus the first step in the program of creating a central office where all applications for work by needy artists will be considered and disbursements made, has been completed. The committee has set for its goal the finding of work for 150 unemployed New England artists by Christmas time, probably, Mr. Taylor thought, on a weekly salary basis. Only artists of professional standing will be considered, he said.

Representatives of all important art societies in New England, regardless of school of thought, are being asked to send to the committee at once names of professional artists in immediate distress.

Mr. Taylor made known that his committee had obtained from Washington a ruling to the effect that any framed picture could come under the official interpretation of a "mural" thus not restricting work to frescoes painted directly on walls, as the term would indicate.

Under the new ruling, it will be possible to commission not only small paintings in oils, but etchings, lithographs and other such studies, suitable for distribution to public schools for exhibition and instruction in the various arts.

Although many of those persons in charge of the movement throughout the country are known to be more interested in modern art, Mr. Taylor was emphatic in stating that no discrimination will be shown.

According to local plans, artists selected for help will be commissioned to make designs and sketches of mural projects, decorative sculpture, pictures, posters, advertising designs, etc., from which works of merit may be considered later for the permanent decoration of public buildings.

Not only are official government buildings to profit by such decorations, commissioned from those needing work, but schools, libraries and other institutions will benefit.

Mr. Taylor also announced the appointment of other members of sectional committees as follows:

Worcester—George P. Booth, and Rear Admiral Ralph Earle, president of Worcester Polytechnic Institute.
Massachusetts—Alvan T. Fuller of Boston; Paul A. Sachs of Cambridge, president of the American Association of Art Museums; Edward Jackson Holmes, director of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston; Edward Forbes, director of the Fogg Art Museum, Harvard University; Mr. Currier, Charles H. Sawyer, director of the Addison Galleries of American Art at Andover; William Emerson, dean of architecture at Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Henry Meltham of the Fogg Museum; William T. Aldrich of Boston; Charles D. Macmillan of Boston; Mrs. Anna Webb Karpman, publicity director of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston; Wilmer R. Evans, president of the Boston Art Club; Mrs. Eva Whiting White, director of the Peabody Settlement House; Miss Ida M. Cannon, special service director at the Massachusetts General Hospital.

WORK PROVIDED 4,000,000 IN U. S.

Hopkins Claims Success for Huge Civil Works
Program

CHEESE AND LARD BOUGHT FOR NEEDY

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15 (AP)—Success was claimed today by the civil works administration in its effort to give employment to 4,000,000 persons on public projects.

Harry L. Hopkins, the administrator, told reporters the goal had been reached through the day-and-night co-operation of state and local boards and their associates.

His statement, Hopkins explained, was based on telephone reports from state leaders concerning the ambitious effort, which started a month ago. Tomorrow was the deadline set.

It was also made known that the Federal Surplus Relief Corporation, which Hopkins heads, plans to spend approximately $3,000,000 for large distribution to the needy unemployed. Butcher purchases are also contemplated.

Families still on relief rolls were estimated by Hopkins at 1,500,000, but he said the exact number would not be known until state administrators report in January.

Hopkins said he could give no definite employment figures either for individual states or for the country as a whole.

He explained, however, the employment is not divided as originally planned, some states having exceeded their quotas while others, including Pennsylvania, New York and Maryland, failed to reach it.

The drought areas in the West and the tier of states along the northern section of the country, Hopkins added, were permitted to exceed their quotas on the theory that weather conditions would prevent them from carrying on work as steadily as farther south.

Plans for the employment program provided for taking 2,000,000 men off relief rolls and 2,000,000 from the United States unemployment service lists.

In the relief efforts, Hopkins said, hog and cattle buying were continuing and every state had been offered an opportunity to buy cattle with federal relief money and have them processed within the state.

INJUNCTION TO STOP CWA JOB Tree Lovers Protest Over Forestry Work

The Christmas hopes of hundreds of Bedford men, brightened by wages received for work on a CWA forestry project in their city, are expected to be dimmed today, when many of them are to be "laid off," as the result of action taken by a small group of tree lovers.

Alleging that the CWA workers are destroying shade trees, the tree lovers, headed by former State Treasurer Fred J. Burrell, secured a temporary restraining order from Judge Abraham E. Pinnuck in Middlesex Superior Court yesterday afternoon, preventing further forestry work pending a hearing Friday.

Mrs. Theresa St. Dennis, Bedford civil works administrator, said last night that all work on the forestry project, now employing 700 men, would cease. The men will be paid today, unless some can be engaged on other projects, it is likely that the men will be laid off, officials said.

CONCLUDES WITH WORK FOR 131,600

CWA Board Winds
Up—Mrs. Rantoul
Flays Members

BY JOHN GRIFFIN

The most remarkable peace-time project in the history of Massachusetts was brought to a successful conclusion last night when the Civil Works Board made the final authorization that put to work 131,600 men and women. All of the jobs will be filled by the first of next week, and a total of upwards of $30,000,000 will flow into Massachusetts in payrolls and purchases of materials.

BEST OF ANY STATE

The achievement here is believed to be the best of any State in the Union

Ignores Charges

Chairman Bartlett refused to enter into any controversy last night, and ignored the charges that Mrs. Rantoul placed against him, but the other members of the board rose to his defense. State Treasurer Hurley, who earlier had issued a statement praising the work of Chairman Bartlett, declared that "all the controversy and unrest over the various women's activities can be charged directly to Mrs. Rantoul."

It is no secret that the board held Mrs. Rantoul to be a stumbling block in the carrying out of the work, but every effort was made to continue harmoniously. After several conferences, she and Chairman Bartlett agreed to place before the board a list of women to be put to work as fast as possible. "In theory," he said, "all these people should be at work Dec. 15. All communities should get to work as early as possible. I hope that everyone will take hold and put people to work."

All the women are expected to be put to work, principally in knitting, sewing and canning projects, within a few days, and to be kept at work until Feb. 15. The last approval made by the board was for such a project, which came from Haverhill for the employment of 11 women. All women on these projects will receive 40 cents an hour, according to word from Washington.

Through a technicality, women already at work on these projects will not be paid today as scheduled, but will receive their money Monday or Tuesday. The total amount due such women this week is about $100,000.

Steps to Remove Gaskill

At the conclusion of the session, State Treasurer Hurley issued the following statement: "The State of Massachusetts and the people are to be complimented that they had as chairman on this board Joseph W. Bartlett, who gave unstintingly of his time and services for the success of the CWA. The figures tonight prove that under his leadership the programme has been brought to a successful conclusion. His endorsement is in the allotment tonight of 240 extra women. Chairman Bartlett has not for a moment neglected women's projects and he has extended them every courtesy. The chairman and all the members of the board served without compensation of any kind."

Framed Pictures, Washington Rules

[Special Dispatch to The Herald]

WORCESTER, Dec. 15.—The selection of John Davis Hatch, Jr., of Boston, assistant director of the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum of Boston, as assistant general chairman of the New England committee of the federal public works of art projects under the CWA was announced today by Francis Henry Taylor, director of the Worcester Art Museum, who is chairman of the committee.

Mr. Hatch will have charge of the general headquarters of the committee in the main office of the Gardner Museum, where space has been offered to the committee by Morris Carter, director.

This is the first step in the program of creating a central office where all applications for work by needy artists will be considered and disbursements made, has been completed. The committee has set for its goal the finding of work for 150 unemployed New England artists by Christmas time, probably, Mr. Taylor thought, on a weekly salary basis. Only artists of professional standing will be considered, he said.

Representatives of all important art societies in New England, regardless of school of thought, are being asked to send to the committee at once names of professional artists in immediate distress.

Mr. Taylor made known that his committee had obtained from Washington a ruling to the effect that any framed picture could come under the official interpretation of a "mural," thus not restricting work to frescoes painted directly on walls, as the term would indicate.

Under the new ruling, it will be possible to commission not only small paintings in oils, but etchings, lithographs and other such studies, suitable for distribution to public schools for exhibition and instruction in the various arts.

Although many of those persons in charge of the movement throughout the country are known to be more interested in modern art, Mr. Taylor was emphatic in stating that no discrimination will be shown.

According to local plans, artists selected for help will be commissioned to make designs and sketches of mural projects, decorative sculpture, pictures, posters, advertising designs, etc., which works of merit may be considered later for the permanent decoration of public buildings.

Not only are official government buildings to profit by such decorations, but schools, libraries and other institutions will benefit.

Mr. Taylor also announced the appointment of other members of sectional committees as follows:

Worcester—George F. Booth, and Rear Admiral Ralph Eagle, president of Worcester Polytechnic Institute.
Massachusetts—Alan T. Fuller of Boston; Paul J. Sachs of Cambridge, president of the American Association of Art Museums; Edward Jackson Holmes, director of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston; Edward Forbes, director of the Fogg Art Museum, Harvard University; Mr. Carter, Charles H. Sawyer, director of the Addison Galleries of American Art at Andover; William Emerson, dean of architecture at Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Henry Methuen of the Free Museum, William T. Aldrich of Boston; Charles D. Macmillan of Boston; Mrs. Anna Webb Karganah, publicity director of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston; Wilmer R. Evans, president of the Boston Art Club; Mrs. Eva Whittine White, director of the Peabody Settlement House; Miss Ida M. Cannon, social service director at the Massachusetts General Hospital.

Washington, Dec. 15 (A.P.)—Success was claimed today by the civil works administration in its effort to give employment to 4,000,000 persons on public projects.

Harry L. Hopkins, the administrator, told reporters the goal had been reached through the day-and-night co-operation of state and local boards and their associates.

His statement, Hopkins explained, was based on telephone reports from state leaders concerning the ambitious effort which started a month ago. Tomorrow was the deadline set.

It was also made known that the Federal Surplus Relief Corporation, which Hopkins heads, plans to spend approximately $3,000,000 for cheese and an undetermined amount for land distribution to the needy unemployed. Butter purchases are also contemplated.

Families still on relief rolls were estimated by Hopkins at 1,500,000, but he said the exact number would not be known until state administrators report in January.

Hopkins said he could give no definite employment figures either for individual states or for the country as a whole.

He explained, however, the employment is not divided as originally planned, some states having exceeded their quotas while others, including Pennsylvania, New York and Maryland, failed to reach it.

The drought areas in the West and the tier of states along the northern section of the country, Hopkins added, were permitted to exceed their quotas on the theory that weather conditions would prevent them from carrying on work as steadily as farther south.

Plans for the employment program provided for taking 2,000,000 men off relief rolls and 2,000,000 from the United States unemployment service lists.

In the relief efforts, Hopkins said, hog and cattle buying were continuing and every state had been offered an opportunity to buy cattle with federal relief money and have them processed within the state.

CWA Board Winds Up—Mrs. Rantoul Flays Members

BY JOHN GRIFFIN

The most remarkable peace-time project in the history of Massachusetts was brought to a successful conclusion last night when the Civil Works Board made the final authorization that put to work 131,600 men and women. All of the jobs will be filled by the first of next week, and a total of upwards of $30,000,000 will flow into Massachusetts in payrolls and purchases of materials.

BEST OF ANY STATE

The achievement here is believed to be the best of any State in the Union.

Ignores Charges

Chairman Bartlett refused to enter into any controversy last night, and ignored the charges that Mrs. Rantoul placed against him, but the other members of the board rose to his defence. State Treasurer Hurley, who earlier had issued a statement praising the work of Chairman Bartlett, declared that "all the controversy and unrest over the various women's activities can be charged directly to Mrs. Rantoul."

It is no secret that the board held Mrs. Rantoul to be a stumbling block in the carrying out of the work, but every effort was made to continue harmoniously. After several conferences, she and Chairman Bartlett agreed to place 10,000 women at work, and that number of women's jobs were assigned yesterday. In addition, Chairman Bartlett induced Washington to allow 200 more jobs for women, and these were approved last night on projects submitted by Mrs. Rantoul.

Chairman Bartlett, after the final authorization last night, issued a statement in which he urged the ladies and to put the men and women to work as fast as possible. "In theory," he said, "all these people should be at work Dec. 15. All communities should set to work as early as possible. I hope that everyone will take hold and put people to work."

All the women are expected to be put to work, principally in knitting, sewing and canning projects, within a few days, and to be kept at work until Feb. 15. The last approval made by the board was for such a project, which came from Hatfield for the employment of 11 women. All women on these projects will receive 40 cents an hour, according to word from Washington.

Through a technicality, women already at work on these projects will not be paid today as scheduled, but will receive their money Monday or Tuesday. The total amount due such women this week is about $100,000.

Steps to Remove Gaskill

At the conclusion of the session, State Treasurer Hurley issued the following statement: "The State of Massachusetts and the people are to be congratulated that they had as chairman of this board Joseph W. Bartlett, who gave unstintingly of his time and services for the success of the CWA. The figures tonight prove that under his leadership the programme has been brought to a successful conclusion. His endorsement is in the allotment tonight of 131,600 extra women. Chairman Bartlett has not for a moment neglected women's projects and he has extended them every courtesy. The chairman and all the members of the board served without compensation of any kind."

URGED TO GET TO WORK

While Hopkins has agreed to consider Bartlett's request for 14,500 more jobs, the board members felt strongly last night that local officials should waste no time in getting men to work as new regulations from the national capital may mean the rescinding of approvals already given. It was considered doubtful that Washington would halt men at work.

Originally the Massachusetts quota for CWA jobs was 97,000 jobs. So swiftly did the Bartlett board organize and begin to approve projects that delighted Washington officials, pointing to the spirit of the CWA program, granted more jobs, bringing the total to 121,750.

Chairman Bartlett agreed that 10,000 women should be included in the quota. Although the quota was filled, they continue to examine projects and give tentative approvals. Yesterday he asked Hopkins to give the state 14,500 jobs in all.

At the same time he related the plight of Massachusetts women and said thousands more could be put to work. Hopkins, much pleased with the work, Bartlett board, allowed an additional 2,500 women for civil works service projects and agreed to let the state have the 129,000 others already approved, thus bringing additional hundreds of thousands of dollars into the state.

The board will begin the work of selecting from the projects submitted by Mrs. Rantoul a sufficient number to exhaust the 2500 figure. The women will be engaged in sewing clothes for the needy, knitting, rebinding library books and cleaning public buildings.

HURLEY STATEMENT

At the close of the meeting, State Treasurer Hurley said:

"The Commonwealth and its citizens should be congratulated that this board as Mr. Bartlett as chairman. He has been unstintingly of his time and services for the success of the CWA program. The figures prove beyond question that Mr. Bartlett's leadership has brought our program to a successful conclusion, borne out further by the fact that he has obtained an extra allotment of women, making a total of 131,500 women. This shows Mr. Bartlett has not neglected the problem of providing jobs for women and that he has extended every courtesy to them."

William B. Coy, third member of the board, summarily removed Moses Gaskill, civil works administrator for the town of Mendon, when Gaskill refused to sign 20 CWA checks for workers less paid. Coy suggested that the selectmen choose another administrator. Coy also said that any man not willing to assist in the patriotic movement should be dropped from his position. Gaskill is chairman of the public welfare department of the town. The members of the state CWA board have been working night and day without pay since Nov. 17, Coy said, and local officials are expected to co-operate.

SOME TIME BREWING

The squabble between Mrs. Rantoul and the members of the civil works board has been brewing for some time. Mrs. Rantoul organized women throughout the state to devise civil works projects for women. She named women as administrators for women projects, the theory being that women would be better to conceive projects calling for the employment of women.

Skilled in organizing, and acquainted with many prominent women throughout the state, Mrs. Rantoul in a comparatively short time had an organization of her own at work. Spurred by patriotism, many Massachusetts women devoted hours to devising projects, enrolling unemployed women, investigating the needs of women.

of all jobs assigned to the state.

AGREED OF 10,000 TO BE HIRED

Chairman Bartlett made an agreement with Mrs. Rantoul that 10,000 women would be hired, but that women already engaged in projects would go to work would be included in the figure, as have to be included in the figure, as would the 2500 women census under in a state unemployment department of labor and industry. This brought the number of available unfilled women jobs down, but the 10,000 women could that approximately 10,000 women could be taken care of in projects approved by Mrs. Rantoul.

Mrs. Rantoul had named a date for women to submit projects. This date was set ahead 24 hours, so that Wednesday night was the deadline. Praying the storm in an effort to obtain work for needy women, some of women started for Provincetown, field and Grafton and arrived after the deadline, a P. M. But Mrs. Rantoul included the projects in the batch presented to the board Thursday night, bringing the total to 9500, although 4000 had been agreed upon.

Examination of the projects disclosed that a large percentage had not been approved by local civil works administrators appointed by the board. Unsurprisingly, the projects were not expected to be approved. Others were not explained sufficiently to permit of understanding the projects, while still others could not be approved for various reasons. The board struggled with the problems until early yesterday morning and then adjourned.

During all the period that projects were being approved the status of Mrs. Rantoul was somewhat in doubt, but to spare her embarrassment the board listened to her suggestions and made agreement with her as though she were empowered to do the work.

AUTHORITY IN DOUBT

Yesterday John T. Scully, federal emergency relief administrator, admitted that he had appointed Mrs. Rantoul as state chairman of women's activities for the FERA on Nov. 22 after Mrs. Ellen S. Woodward, national head of FERA women's activities, had approved her appointment. There is doubt that Scully had the authority to make such an appointment.

Regarding the appointment as director of women's activities for the CWA it is a known fact that no member of the civil works administration ever appointed Mrs. Rantoul to the position, which is a federal position for which no salary is paid. Yesterday the feeling among the members was that the ing among the members was that the women's projects submitted by Mrs. Rantoul would be acted on as though they were officially presented.

Mrs. Rantoul yesterday said she had not been given sufficient information as to procedure by the board. She declared she had done her work of creating a state organization, and then had been taken ill. She felt hurt that she was the subject of criticism because the projects submitted could not be approved in the form presented.

State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley quickly defended his board. He insisted that "all controversy and unrest among the various women's activities could be charged to Mrs. Rantoul." As he spoke a delegation of women from Quincy entered his office to protest against "the unfairness evidenced in the manner of appointing community directors" by Mrs. Rantoul. This delegation, the fifth to visit the state treasurer, charged that politics was the deciding factor in the appointments. Hurley cited also the large number of letters received by him complaining of the methods used by Mrs. Rantoul in naming community directors.

The last day of the approving period for civil works projects was as hectic as any, as charges and counter charges were handled back and forth between Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, in charge of CWA women's activities, and State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, who defended the board of which he is a member.

As the day closed there was doubt as to the validity of the appointment of Mrs. Rantoul to the position of state director of women's activities for the federal emergency relief administration, and the same position for the civil works administration.

Word has been received from Washington that so-called white collar workers in this section will be paid an average of $18 a week, and technical workers up to $45 a week. Last night Chairman Bartlett said he had not been informed of the ruling. He thought at first the wage schedule applied to public works projects, but added that the pay rate for civil works projects would average $18 a week.

The schedule as announced for the north zone is: Base rate $18, intermediate group $21, supervisory $24, and technical supervisory $45 a week.

State Treasurer Hurley issued a statement last night calling attention to the splendid showing of the state and said the major share of the credit should

The members of the state CWA board have been working night and day to get the CWA started," Mr. Coy said, and local officials are expected to co-operate.

The squabble between Mrs. Rantoul and the members of the civil works board had been brewing for some time. Mrs. Rantoul organized women throughout the state to devise civil works projects for women. She was even as adamant in her demands as women as administrators of the projects, believing that women would be better to conceive projects calling for the employment of women.

Skilled in organizing, and acquainted with many of the state's women throughout the state, Mrs. Rantoul in a comparatively short time had an organization of her own at hand. During all the period that projects were being approved the status of Mrs. Rantoul was somewhat in doubt, but to spare her embarrassment the board listened to her suggestions and made agreement with her as though she were going to do the work.

AUTHORITY John T. Scully, federal emergency relief administrator, admitted he had appointed Mrs. Ransauz to the state chairman of women's activities for the 7th district in 1932 after Mrs. J. C. Woodward, national head of the CWA women's activities, had expressed her appointment authority to make such a decision.

Regarding the appointment as director of women's activities for the CWA in 1932, Scully said the fact that no member of the civil works administration was appointed Mrs. Ransauz to that position, which is a federal position for which no salary is paid. Yesterday the ruling among the members was that the women's post should be acted on as though they were officially presented.

Mrs. Ransauz herself said she had not been given sufficient information to proceed by the board. She stated she had done her work and then had a state organization and she had been the subject of criticism because she was the only woman on the board. The projects submitted in form presented.

"In the application for the loan, $100,000 was allocated for locomotive, freight car and passenger coach repairs. The money would insure continuous employment during December, January, February and March for approximately 730 workmen at the Billerica locomotive repair shops at Concord, N. H. The balance, it is proposed, will spend on maintenance of roadbed and tracks, and on some portion of it, new possibilities. This part of the loan, however, will not be drawn down, if at all, until spring when such work is possible."

Veterans of Foreign Wars of the Revere post made vigorous protests to federal officials yesterday that because of politics certain aliens were given license for work on CWA projects.

Charges were made also that plumbers with absolutely no war service, but having a political pull, were employed while skilled veterans were told there was no work for them.

John H. Wallace and Jesse H. Jones, both past department commanders of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, called at the federal re-employment service at the Quadra verbal protests to Dr. Robert S. Quimby, head of the service. Dr. Quimby insisted that the investigation had been surveyed by the understanding condition that it was the responsibility of the nation to be remedied. Dr. Quimby pointed out that the CWA problem had been hurriedly organized and every effort was directed at getting men back to work and that if there were some complaints they were caused by the tremendous speed with which the work was inaugurated.

The public works department is to be moved from the State House into the new public works building at 100 Nassau street, near the North station, it was announced yesterday.

C. W. A. PAY FOR ALL BY SATURDAY

Board Aims to Give at Least Week's Wage

Injunction in Medford Against Cutting Down Shade Trees

Wage payments before Christmas to every person employed under the civil works program was the aim expressed by the State Civil Works Board yesterday afternoon as plans were made to speed up the disbursing system throughout the State. It is planned that every employee will get at least one week's pay by Saturday night.

William B. Coy, in charge of finance for the board, and State Treas. Charles F. Hurley, member of the board, will supervise the drive for wages. "It is mostly a question of getting the mechanics of the disbursing system working smoothly," said Coy yesterday afternoon.

The State Board will spend this afternoon in going over the 2500 additional jobs for women, projects calling for that number being already at hand.

Tomorrow the board will move out of the State Treasurer's office and into rooms 249, 427 and 460 in the State House, to continue its work.

Burrell Secures Injunction

The only complaint which reached the board yesterday was lodged by Fred J. Burrell of Medford, former State Treasurer, who obtained an injunction from the Middlesex Superior Court, stopping the C. W. A. workers from chopping down more shade trees in the city.

The complaint had been first lodged by a group of Medford residents, who claimed that the C. W. A. workers were not using judgment in removing dead trees, but were cutting down many of the beautiful shade trees in the city as well.

No action was taken by the board, but Commissioner Coy, who lives in Medford, is expected to investigate the case.

The State board sent two telegrams to Washington yesterday. One was to President Roosevelt, thanking him in behalf of the people of the Commonwealth for this opportunity to go to work. The other was addressed to Federal Relief Administrator Hopkins and thanked him for the co-operation he had extended to Massachusetts.

MAY DOUBLE C. W. A. FORCE

Mayor Curley Hopes for Move by President

Assured of $400,000 More for Boston Harbor

Mayor Curley revealed yesterday on his return from a civil works conference in Washington, attended by Mayors of principal cities, that a proposition to increase the C. W. A. employees from 4,000,000 to 8,000,000 is now before President Roosevelt, and that Harry Hopkins, director of the C. W. A., had been favorably impressed by the proposition.

Mayor Curley was optimistic as to the outcome and said he thought favorable action might be expected. He further said the Mayors have asked for continuance of the C. W. A. work until June or July.

More Harbor Work

Assurance that the request of the War Department for $400,000 additional for widening and dredging Presidents Roads in Boston Harbor would be granted in a few days was reported by His Honor. He said this amount would be taken from P. W. A. funds, bringing the total for this project to $1,200,000.

The Mayor stressed the need of this work if large ships are to be attracted to the Port of Boston, and said that such an expenditure would prevent such an occurrence as the grounding of the Britannic on Governor's Island Friday night. The Mayor said the Leviathan has also had difficulty in Boston Harbor and the new channel widening would make navigation easier for all vessels.

Boston's own proposal for $6,000,000 public works was discussed by the Mayor in Washington. He said a force was now working on these proposals in Washington and that he anticipated favorable action by the middle of next week.

Ask New Loan Agency

The creation of a Municipal Finance Board similar in some respects to the Farm Relief Board was another proposal discussed by the Mayor on which Mayor Curley expressed the opinion there might be favorable action. This board would act as a clearing house for tax anticipation warrants, and the rate of interest on loans from such a board on warrants would be established at 4 percent instead of at 5 or 6 "such as the banks are now exacting," the Mayor said.

The board would make it possible for the cities to get funds as needed. Under the present law banks can invest only to the extent of 10 percent of their capitalization in tax anticipation warrants, whereas the requirements of cities such as Boston would demand a 30 percent investment. The Mayor said that the Mayors' conference in Washington thought it would be more difficult to amend the law governing the amounts banks may invest than to create the board. The matter is under consideration by Secretary Morgenthau, Jesse Jones and Gov. Black of the Federal Reserve Board.

NOTES OF THANKS BY CWA BOARD

Notifies President and Col. Hopkins Quota Is Complete

The Civil Works Board last night sent a telegram to President Roosevelt on behalf of the men and women who have been put to work, under the Civil Works programme, thanking him for his efforts. A second telegram of gratitude was sent to Colonel Harry L. Hopkins, federal relief administrator, who first proposed the Civil Works programme and then carried it out as administrator.

MESSAGES OF THANKS

The local board, consisting of Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett, State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, and William B. Coy, Boston banker, accomplished more than it set out to do, and made jobs for 13,000 persons instead of the 7,000 originally allotted to this State. The members of the board were gratified last night at the response of the public and expressed particular pleasure in the co-operation shown by the cities and towns of the State.

The telegram sent to the President was as follows: "The Massachusetts Civil Works Administration quota has been filled. On behalf of the persons who have been put to work through this programme, we, as a board, extend to you our grateful appreciation. We are also wiring Colonel Hopkins of our appreciation of his wonderful co-operation in this movement."

The telegram sent to Colonel Hopkins said: "The Massachusetts Civil Works Administration quota has been filled with your wonderful co-operation. The persons who have been put to work through this programme, through us, extend their appreciation to you as the originator of this movement."

The major phase of the board's work is now completed, but the work of administration of the programme remains to be done. This entails the purchase of materials through a central purchasing agency, the handling of the financial arrangements for disbursements of all sorts, including payrolls, and checking up on the progress of the works undertaken by the cities and towns.

Chairman Bartlett said last night that the inspectors acting for the board will not act as "spotters" but will seek to give assistance to the cities and towns in every possible way. There is still a possibility, he said, that Colonel Hopkins will grant permission for the board to authorize a few new projects, but the board is not banking too heavily on such an outcome.

More Than 14,000 Men and Women Will Start This Week On Civil Works Projects calls for clearing practically all, and the painting of most, public building interiors, and the making of such repairs to public thoroughfares as can be made without the use of blue prints. The whole will be a long drink of "Dr. Roosevelt's tonic" to communities that have been forced for economy's sake to curtail, or altogether to suspend, for a least two years, the normal expenditures for upkeep.

White Collar Jobs

The civil works service program, which many of the "white-collar class" will be reemployed, confines itself to strictly clerical pursuits. This work will be of cataloging, filing, indexing public records and generally bringing them up to date.

One shining example of this type of work is that to be done in the Boston Election Department's archives, and it relates to the file-card of each of Boston's 300,000 men and women voters. Economies there, and the pressure of other business through three years, has caused for three years a lapse in the practice of noting on each card the voting address of each individual at each election—thus there are 900,000 items to be checked in this job.

The 30-hour work-week for all 14,000 in this temporary army of workers will be of five 6-hour days. Foremen will get $40 to $50 per week; mechanics, $36; clerks and stenographers, from $18 to $24; laborers, $15.

As Joseph W. Bartlett is the Federal Administration's boss of the Great Dispensation in this State, Mayor Curley is head man in Boston and because of his long, intimate familiarity with the set-up and the operation of municipal departments, and his talent for organizing a job

Boston's lagging public works and civil works programs—which got away to a slow start because of a shortage of materials and tools and because of red-tape which inevitably attends such a far-reaching undertaking—is due to "snap out of it" as Christmas draws nigh.

By midweek, above 14,000 men and women, some long idle, will at last be attached to a payroll and will continue to work for an average of eight weeks. These, in the end, will have a total of $3,200,000 pipe-lined into their purses in wages—after a clean-up crusade that must come near to making old Boston's buildings and highways gleam like those of the proverbial spotless town.

The bill for materials and tools will eat up the remaining $800,000 of the total of $4,000,000 available to Boston as its portion of the emergency relief funds.

Boon to Industries

The equipment shortage exists not only in New England but throughout applications for coats, shoes, and a sure entry to a job, were rejected. But thousands of new cases had to be admitted to the dole list on the ground that each was close to poverty's brink—and today there are more names in Boston's relief list than ever before. 000 a month effected by those shifts to the works payrolls. As for the materials shortage, it is principally in picks and shovels, paint and brushes, electrical equipment, roofing materials, crushed stone, sand and gravel. And there is unavoidable delay in fabricating steel orders.

Public Works Projects

The city Public Works Department's projects are perhaps of widest interest. About 100 streets in West Roxbury, Dorchester, Brighton and Hyde Park will be graded, and in some water mains and sewers will be laid. The department's 114 trucks and 145 carts, which do the garbage-ash removal chore, will be scraped and painted—adding years to their useful lives and improving them from the sanitary angle. Stony Brook and other water courses will be thoroughly cleaned, for the first time in perhaps four years.

On the following four bridges maintained by this department, surface repairs are to be made, and the superstructures repainted: Longfellow, Meridian-st., Summer-st., Warren and Chelsea bridges.

Some 2,000,000 granite blocks, piled in yards along Victory road, Massachusetts av and in Brighton will be recut to 2-inch size—and Mr. Curley, the great human adding machine, computes that, when these old blocks are relaid in Boston streets as grouted-joint-style paving, they will represent a saving of $300,000, which would otherwise have been expended for other types of surface.

A job that will be put through daily under the eyes of countless thousands of Elevated commuters and autoists will be the relining of the five miles from Arlington st. to Lake st. and the Newton line. Along with this job the city Park Department will brush up various cemeteries under its control, and will do some remodeling at the Boston Airport, as well as enlarging and grading its landing field.

There will be general repairs to 135 schoolhouses and yards. At the Conley-sq Library 700,000 books will be taken off shelves, cleaned, and replaced.

To Wipe Out Slums

No more babies will be born in 65 slum tenements in the North, West and South Ends of the city, and in East Boston and South Boston. These dilapidated health menaces will all be pulled down, having been condemned by the Health Department as unfit for human habitation.

Forty Election Department voting booths which have seen numberless citizens alone with their pencil and ballot and conscience, will be repaired and painted.

Supt. of Public Buildings John P. Engler's bureau will oversee the painting and cleaning of many municipal units—City Hall and the Annex, old police and fire stations, the Court house, hospitals and institutions generally. Some park buildings will get a like refurbishing as will some health units and convenience stations maintained by the Health Department.

At Rainsford Island all old structures will be razed, and its pier strengthened and repaired. Old Devil Sea is gnawing away at the road there leading to the cemetery—Potter's Field. Those buried there had not at death the wherewithal to buy themselves a corner of earth in which to sleep forever. Simple, lettered, wooden crosses mark their last resting places. The Emergency Relief Fund will foot the bill for a plain but good-looking wrought-iron fence, to be placed at last as a protective arm around the now lone some "God's-acre."

And when the 13,000 men and 1000 women who perform all these varied tasks have brought them to conclusion, about Feb 15, Boston ought to be much more wholesome, inside and out.

Injunction in Medford Against Cutting Down Shade Trees

William B. Coy, in charge of finance for the board, and State Treas Charles F. Hurley, member of the board, will supervise the drive for wages. "It is mostly a question of getting the mechanics of the disbursing system working smoothly," said Coy yesterday afternoon.

Tomorrow the board will move out of the State Treasurer's office and into rooms 249, 427 and 460 in the State House, to continue its work.

The only complaint which reached the board yesterday was lodged by Fred J. Burrell of Medford, former State Treasurer, who obtained an injunction from the Middlesex Superior Court, stopping the C. W. A. workers from chopping down more shade trees in the city.

No action was taken by the board, but Commissioner Coy, who lives in Medford, is expected to investigate the case.

The State board sent two telegrams to Washington yesterday. One was to President Roosevelt, thanking him in behalf of the people of the Commonwealth for this opportunity to go to work. The other was addressed to Federal Relief Administrator Hopkins and thanked him for the co-operation he had extended to Massachusetts.

Assured of $400,000 More for Boston Harbor

Mayor Curley was optimistic as to the outcome and said he thought favorable action might be expected. He further said the Mayors have asked for continuance of the C. W. A. work until June or July.

Assurance that the request of the War Department for $400,000 additional for widening and dredging Presidents Roads in Boston Harbor would be granted in a few days was reported by His Honor. He said this amount would be taken from P. W. A. funds, bringing the total amount granted to $1,200,000.

The Mayor stressed the need of this work if large ships are to be attracted to the Port of Boston, and said that such an expenditure would prevent such an occurrence as the grounding of the Britannic on Governor's Island Friday night. The Mayor said the Leviathan has also had difficulty in Boston Harbor and the new channel widening would make navigation easier for all vessels.

Boston's own proposal for $6,000,000 for public works was discussed by the Mayor in Washington. He said the force was now working on these proposals in Washington and that he anticipated favorable action by the middle of next week.

The creation of a Municipal Finance Board similar in many respects to the Farm Relief Board was another proposal discussed by the Mayors on which Mayor Curley expressed the opinion there might be a favorable action. This board would act as a clearing house for tax articulation warrants, and the rate of interest on loans from such a board on warrants would be established at 4 percent instead of at 5 or 6 "such as the banks are now exacting," the Mayor said.

The board would make it possible for the cities to get funds as needed. Under the present law banks can invest only to the extent of 10 percent of their capitalization in tax anticipation warrants, whereas the requirements of cities such as Boston would demand a 30 percent investment. The Mayor said that the Mayor's conference in Washington thought there would be more difficulties amending the law governing the amount banks may invest than to create the board. The matter is under consideration by Secretary Morgenthau, Jesse Jones and Governor Black of the Federal Reserve Board.

Notifies President and
Col. Hopkins Quota
Is Complete

The Civil Works Board last night sent a telegram to President Roosevelt on behalf of the men and women who have been put to work under the Civil Works programme, thanking him for his efforts. A second telegram of gratitude was sent to Colonel Harry L. Hopkins, federal relief administrator, who first proposed the Civil Works programme and then carried it out as administrator.

The local board, consisting of Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett, State Treasurer Charles E. Hurley, and William B. Coy, Boston banker, accomplished more than it set out to do, and made jobs for 131,600 persons instead of the $7,000 originally allotted to this State. The members of the board were gratified last night at the response of the public and expressed particular pleasure in the co-operation shown by the cities and towns of the State.

The telegram sent to the President was as follows: "The Massachusetts Civil Works Administration quota has been filled. On behalf of the persons who have been put to work through this programme, we, as a board, extend to you our grateful appreciation. We are also wiring Colonel Hopkins our appreciation of his wonderful contribution to this movement."

The telegram sent to Colonel Hopkins said: "The Massachusetts Civil War Administration quota has been filled with your wonderful co-operation. The persons who have been put to work through this programme, through us, extend their appreciation to you as the originator of this movement."

The major phase of the board's work is now completed, but the work of administration of the programme remains to be done. This entails the purchasing of materials through a central purchasing agency, the handling of the financial arrangements for disbursement of all sorts, including payrolls, and checking up on the progress of the works undertaken by the cities and towns.

Chairman Bartlett said last night the inspectors acting for the board will not act as "spotters" but will seek to give assistance to the cities and towns in every possible way. There is a possibility, he said, that Colonel Perkins will grant permission for the board to authorize a few new projects, on such an outcome.

the Nation. It was plain to see that the character of the twin public and civil works schedules would quickly exhaust existing supplies, and oblige dealers to order new stocks of goods, the fabrication of which will reemploy other thousands in their respective industries.

In Boston as in all the State's cities and towns, the public works program calls for clearing practically all, and the painting of most, public buildings, interiors, and the making of such repairs to public thoroughfares as can be made without the use of blue prints. The whole will be a long drink of "Dr Roosevelt's tonic" to communities that have been forced for economy's sake to curtail, or altogether to suspend, for a least two years, the normal expenditures for upkeep.

The civil works service program which many of the "white-collar" class will be reemployed, confine itself to strictly clerical pursuits. This work will be of cataloging, filing, indexing public records and generally bringing them up to date.

One shining example of this type of work is that to be done in the Boston Election Department's archives, and it relates to the file-card for each of Boston's 300,000 men and women voters. Economies there, all the pressure of other business through three years, has caused for three years a lapse in the practice of noting on each card the voting address of each individual at each election—thus there are 900,000 items to be checked in this job.

The 30-hour work-week for 14,000 in this temporary army workers will be of five 6-hour days. Foremen will get $40 to $50 a week; mechanics, $36; clerks and stenographers, from $18 to $24; laborers $15.

Fox' top sergeants are City Treas Edmund L. Dolan, Secretary Walter V. McCarthy of the Overseers of the Poor, and Supt Philip A. Chapman of the Supply Department. For the purposes of the works and service program, these officials have created bureaus separate from their municipal offices.

Dolan has organized a payoff system by which 14,000 workers will be paid at the scene of their tasks. Chapman is reaching out for a small mountain of needed materials and tools. McCarthy is digging into his records of persons who have long been receiving doles from his bureau—and picking the wealthiest of them for one or another of the jobs available.

C. of those who will be finally on the list. At a payroll this week, half have been registered at the Federal Employment Office, Nashua st., where M. J. McDonald, chief clerk, says that the list is too long. In fact, he says, now, 350 persons have registered there and are waiting for a call from the bureau, swamping it with work. The registrants, has not been able to certify workers as rapidly as had been expected. He says that he has referred the Overseers of the Poor, who are now in charge, to the Federal Bureau, but the bureau has naturally refused to take on its list. But McDonald says that the list is being corrected, and that the Overseers will be in charge of the various jobs ready to be filled. He says that he has testified that men and women who have been certified by the Federal list group are not a big danger to the group, but that the majority of the trouble is coming from the small group on the city lists.

One dark spot in the whole picture is that the shifting of so many persons from the overseers of the payrolls to the payrolls of the works program does not represent any money saving to Boston taxpayers in the way of doles. As the works program came to fruition and thousands of transfers took place, the overseers had other thousands of new applications for doles. Some of these applications, obviously made with the idea that a place on the dole list was

MAYOR CURLEY IN WASHINGTON ON C. W. PROGRAMS

A group of Mayors met in Washington Friday to advocate among other things continuation of the civil works program for an indefinite period and an additional $100,000,000 allotment to the public works administration, low interest taxes and Federal Government purchases of municipal tax warrants. Left to Right—Mayors Indiana, New York, Curley, Boston, Sparks, Akron, Wamsley, New Orleans, and Paul V. Hitters, Chicago, secretary of the conference.

CWA SENDS THANKS TO WASHINGTON

Workers Will Get Pay in Time For Holiday Buying

In the name of the 131,500 Massachusetts men and women who will receive money for services on CWA projects, the Massachusetts civil works administration yesterday sent telegrams expressing the gratitude of the state to President Roosevelt and Col. Harry L. Hopkins, federal CWA administrator.

The work of approving projects to employ 2500 additional women on civil works service projects at 40 cents an hour continued yesterday. The 2500 jobs were granted to the state by Col. Hopkins after he had agreed to accept a total of 8000 jobs over the limit set for this state by the national authorities.

Meanwhile, Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett, State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley and William B. Coy, a Boston banker, who constitute the civil works board, were hoping that Col. Hopkins would grant Chairman Bartlett's request for 14,500 more jobs, which would bring the state's quota to 145,000. Hopkins will give his decision tomorrow.

That CWA workers would receive their pay, whether for a full week or part of a week, in time to purchase Christmas gifts, was the promise made yesterday by Coy.

"The financial set-up has been completed and we are in a position to pay," he explained. The work week ends Thursday, payrolls are made up and approved Friday and checks made out, and disbursement finished Saturday in time for Christmas purchases. Coy indicated that he would ask all disbursement officers to make every effort to pay off by Saturday noon. He saw no reason why this could not be done, even in large cities like Boston where the making up and distribution of thousands of checks is a big administrative problem.

The message sent by the board members to President Roosevelt follows:

"The Massachusetts civil works quota has been filled. On behalf of the persons who have been put to work through this program we as a board extend to you our grateful appreciation. We are also writing Col. Hopkins of our appreciation of his co-operation in this movement."

The telegram to Col. Hopkins referred to his "wonderful co-operation" and expressed the appreciation of the board that thousands had obtained work "through the program which you originated."

Tomorrow the CWA will move from State Treasurer Hurley's office to rooms 249, 427 and 460 at the State House. Quarters for the payroll and personnel executives will be taken outside the State House. A force of inspectors will be organized to inspect the progress of projects and the character of the work done.

LABOR MEN CHARGE CWA VIOLATIONS

Committee Named by Building Trades to Handle Matter

A committee of three were empowered to take up all complaints of violations of the PWA and the CWA relief measures, and to air them with the administration in Washington. If remedies cannot be secured from the local and State administrative boards, at a special convention of the Massachusetts State Building Trades Council at the American House yesterday.

CHARGE VIOLATIONS

This action followed complaints from practically every part of the State by more than 250 delegates representing 39 cities and 15 towns. In outlining the purpose of the special convention, E. A. Johnson, president of the State council, stressed the splendid accomplishments of the CWA in general since Nov. 16, when it was launched.

He declared that maladjustments were bound to exist in such hasty and stupendous projects, but emphasized the fact that union labor has been defrauded of a living wage under the PWA and the CWA, through violations and evasions of the wage standards set in all of these governmental relief acts.

To Meet Today

The list of alleged violations included failure to pay the fixed minimum wage rates, employment of incompetent mechanics, "political pull" to secure employment for work that ordinarily would be done by union labor, hostility of a number of assistant administrators to organized labor, plea of lack of authority on the part of administrators to interpret parts of the measures or enforce mandates in relation to fixed wages, establishments of intermediate wage rates and occupational classification never before heard of.

The committee appointed to handle the matter consists of E. A. Johnson, the mayor, James P. Meehan, a secretary, and Robert J. Watt, secretary-treasurer of the Massachusetts State Federation of Labor. The committee will meet today.

Building Wreckers to Act Upon Wage Report

A special meeting of members of Building Wreckers Union 315, International Hod Carriers & Common Laborers' Union, will be held tonight at Paine Memorial building, 9 Appleton street, for the purpose of acting upon a report of its wage committee on conference held with the employers in reference to a new wage and working agreement. The men have asked for a wage of 70 cents an hour. The employers, it is understood, have met this proposition with an offer of from 40 to 50 cents an hour between now and May 1, and 60 cents after that date. The wage committee is composed of Daniel Sullivan, J. McAniff and R. Malloy.

WORKERS CHARGE CWA VIOLATIONS

Complaints Aired at Building Trades Council

Vigorous complaints against the CWA were made by the more than 250 delegates to the special convention of the Massachusetts State Building Trades Council which met yesterday at the American House.

Alleged violations of the CWA and PWA included failure to pay the fixed minimum wage rates, employment of incompetent mechanics, the use of political pull for work that ordinarily would be done by union labor, hostility of a number of assistant administrators to organized labor, and pleas of a lack of authority on the part of administrators to interpret parts of the measures or enforce mandates in relation to fixed wages.

A committee of three was named to take up the complaints with the administrators of these acts at Washington and with President Roosevelt, if remedies cannot be had from the local and state administrative boards. Named on the committee were E. A. Johnson, president of the state council, James P. Meehan, secretary, and Robert J. Watts, secretary-treasurer of the Massachusetts State Federation of Labor. The committee will meet today to arrange its program.

In some localities, delegates declared, foreman supervisors had been engaged on CWA projects at a wage rate of $1.50 or more an hour, although skilled mechanics were paid $1.20, the minimum set by the act. Grafting on a small scale was reported in a few cities and towns.

Delegates from Lynn, Newton and Pittsfield read communications, purporting to be copies of letters from Joseph V. Bartlett, chairman of the state CWA board, approving wages of from 80 cents to $1 per hour for semi-skilled labor.

Medfield was named as one place where the state was violating the wage of the CWA for skilled work by paying as low as 85 cents an hour, although the cities and towns were obliged to pay $1.20 an hour.

Outlining the purpose of the special convention, E. A. Johnson stressed the splendid accomplishments of the CWA in general since Nov. 16, but declared that union labor had been defrauded of a living wage under the highway construction act, the CCC, the PWA and the CWA through violations and evasions of the wage standards set in all of these relief acts.

DESERTIONS TO C. W. A. JOBS

Complaint by Four Toledo Companies

TOLEDO, O. Dec 19 (A. P.)—If the official complaints of four Toledo manufacturing concerns are justified, some of their men are deserting to take public works jobs.

The Spicer Manufacturing Company, the Valve Bay Company, the Gendron Wheel Company and the Toledo Metal Wheel Company tell the complaint board of the local C. W. A. administration it happens this way:

The four manufacturing concerns pay 38 to 40 cents an hour for an eight-hour day, conforming with Federal codes. The C. W. A. workers get 50 cents an hour. They work six hours a day.

The complainants say some of those privately employed quit their jobs, certify in their C. W. A. applications they are unemployed, and qualify in this manner, although all C. W. A. workers are supposed to come from the lists of either the relief agencies or the State-city free employment service.

One member of the complaint board signed a warrant charging a glass company worker with taking C. W. A. employment while still holding his regular job.

QUOTA INCREASE REFUSED STATE

Hopkins Says He Cannot Put on Any More Persons Now

A request that 14,000 additional persons be added to the civil works quota of Massachusetts was refused yesterday by Harry L. Hopkins, federal relief commissioner, on the ground that since this state has been granted one increase of 34,000 persons and many other states are clamoring for larger quotas, he felt that for the present no more could be granted here.

The present quota is 131,000 persons and Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts civil works administration, who requested the federal administration for the quota increase, said he has sufficient projects on hand to justify the employment of 14,000 more persons.

Yesterday the state civil works board authorized the employment of 130 social welfare workers to work in the cities and larger towns, except Boston. Boston has a state appropriation of $50,000 for the employment of welfare workers.

A project for the employment of 300 women for sewing and knitting in Fall River has been approved. The civil works board also has approved a project for proposed improvements at the Boston airport which will provide work for 800 men.

Work on the state's fish hatcheries and game farms, wild life sanctuaries and the marine fisheries bureau was started yesterday under the direction of Raymond J. Kenney, director of the state division of fish and game. Approximately $200,000 has been allotted for the work.

The three members of the civil works board, who are also members of the state emergency finance board, conferred on applications for loans from cities yesterday. William S. Coy worked on the completion of a disbursing system and Charles F. Hurley, state treasurer, caught up on work he had been forced to lay aside while the civil works board was in session.

Quit Factories to Get Work on CWA Jobs

TOLEDO, O., Dec. 18 (AP)—Several Toledo factories complained today that some of their employees were quitting to take jobs on public works projects.

Although the factories are paying wage scales conforming to federal-approved industrial codes, the local CWA rate of 50 cents an hour is higher. The factories pay 38 to 40 cents an hour for an eight-hour day. The CWA workers have a six-hour day.

Unnecessary Expenses For Tewksbury Infirmary Projects, Trustee Cronin Charges

These unnecessary expenses, the bossless men said, were depriving them of the benefits intended for them under the C. W. A. "Even if only $3000 in supervisors' fees were saved," he in supervisors to the Governor, "it would mean $15 each to 200 needy families, and I know it can be done."

"This fund," said Cronin, referring to the allotment, "is for the benefit of the infirmities," was never intended for the infirmities and engineering charts, particularly in simple projects, but for labor, that the money should get distributed to the needy—to reduce privation—without resorting to a dole."

Cronin asserted that a State engineer, qualified in every way, was on duty at the infirmary and could easily take over the general supervision of the work at no extra expense.

social contacts and assistance to the sick, the community, but by the written word on record, but by dinner and meetings with an occasional philanthropically clad mission to institution."

ABOUT 1600 MEDFORD MEN HAVE CIVIL WORKS JOBS

MEDFORD, Dec 21—The registration of men for employment on civil works projects at the local reclamation registration office of the United States Labor Department at 201 Headquarters Building, totaled about 2500 according to the statement of Milton D. Riley, director of local office.

About 1600 of these men are working on local civil works projects.

"Contradiction To Idea"

"And still," Cronin wrote, "Mr. Cronin picks contractors and engineers—already building projects and not unemployed—at big expense. Mr. Cronin has arbitrarily put certain unemployed firms or persons in positions as supervisors. These supervisors are given instructions from Mr. Cronin or otherwise, employed people not in distress or unemployed—contrary to law and humane principles and in contradiction to the idea and policies if not the regulations set down in the manual of the Public Works Administration."

The postmaster-trustee complained

A. F. of L. Reports Haverhill on Alleged Violation of the Rules

Whether it will be permissible to discontinue the use of substitute machinery on Civil Works projects may be determined in connection with a project in Haverhill, where on a sand pit operation the Civil Works Board has authorized eight weeks was authorized by the Civil Works Board. This morning Robert J. Watt, secretary of the Massachusetts State Federation of Labor, received a complaint from a group of Haverhill men who say that about thirty men who had been doing the sand pit mechanical leaders, which can do the whole job in three weeks. They pointed out that they had been on the welfare list from which they were enrolled for the C W A job.

Mr. Sullivan's matter to John T. Sullivan, the emergency relief director for the State, who called Mayor Darylne of Haverhill, the civil works administration for the State. He explained that with hand labor it was not possible to produce and forward the sand. As it was stated, but the situation will be reconsidered.

To use machinery where the work can be done by human labor is contrary to the spirit of the law, said both Mr. Watts and Mr. Scully.

in addition of Conant's attempt to tell the trustees what to do. "Conant has no official or executive jurisdiction over the State Infirmary," he asserted. "A close perusal of the statutes, will convince the skeptical that the commissioner is merely a customer of that institution and that all responsibility and accountability rests with the board of trustees. "The commissioner's obligation is satisfied when he sees that his charges are properly clothed, fed and cared for medically.

"When an investigation Commissioner Conant steps aside and is satisfied to let censure fall on those accountable, but when an opportunity at self-aggrandizement appears, he is again in the picture, ruling through factions born of political appointments and bred of social contacts and assumed authorities, communicating, not by the written word for record, but by dinner and meetings with an occasional philanthropically clad mission to the institution."

MEDFORD, Dec 21—The registration of men for employment on civil works projects at the local reemployment registration office of the United States Labor Department, at Post Headquarters Building, totaled about 2500 today, according to the statement of Milton D. Riley, director of the local office.

About 1600 of these men are working on local civil works projects on civil works projects in charge of the Metropolitan District Commission or some other State department. About 1400 are employed locally. Today 84 men were put to work on Brooks Playstead Park and 44 at T. Park. Two painters also were assigned to work on public buildings and 16 men to the local Postoffice take care of the Christmas mail. The payroll of the civil works for Saturday is expected to be about $25,000.

Washington, Dec. 21 (A.P.)—The Civil Works Administration may bring its projects in the extreme southern part of the country to an end by Feb. 1, Har-

L. Hopkins, the administrator, said some of the projects in the citrus belt of Florida may cost last more than another week's wages, Hopkins, who intends to see that there is no shortage of labor in rural areas, said, "When I came here I found they were paying 5 cents an hour for a ten-hour day on highways in Georgia. When I put the relief rate at 30 cents an hour they said the world would come to an end. It didn't. I believe in a new deal for the worker and the farm hand.

Special to the Post.—Washington, Dec. 21.—The Census Bureau faces the greatest "rush" order in its long history. To provide emergency relief for the "white collar" unemployed, the Federal Government has voted funds for five surveys that must be completed. The surveys will be conducted by the bureau, beginning not later than January, and giving employment opportunities to men and women alike. Director Austin began making intensive preparations for this emergency program, which will include surveys of business, an inventory of real property, a study of the cost of living, the housing problem, an index of American business concerns, and completion of the analysis of the 1930 census of population. Mr. Austin has been directed to submit legislation for a census of population in 1934, but a direct appropriation from Congress will be necessary, unless Federal relief officials can be persuaded that such a census should find a place in the emergency relief program.

Many "white collar" workers will be given jobs in the Bay State—probably 1000 or more. Sixty cities have been chosen for the Real Property Inventory. One is Worcester. Other cities may be selected, if they can make out a sufficiently good case at the C.W.A. The real property inventory alone will employ 11,000 men and women.

The major purpose of this inventor to determine clearly the present condition and adequacy of our housing facilities will have an important bearing on future activity of the organization. A special organization of technical men of wide experience has been organized in Washington to handle the project. The field work will be conducted by the Bureau of the Census. Schedules of information will cover the wide range of subjects dealing primarily with residential property. The survey will include data showing the condition of property with respect to repair and improvements, the number of vacant erties, both houses and apartments, a number of families that have been in the region, the physical character of the structures, the equipment installed and the average rental, which can be compared to the census data for 1929.

In explaining the value of this history, Dr. Willard Thorp, director of the Bureau of Economic Research, says: "Maintenance of balance in employment is the most important factor facing the country. It is difficult to accomplish this without a statistical foundation on the many aspects of our economic system. Business men are able to act on knowledge as possible and as specific about the 'what-ifs' about to take.

In the real estate and building this is glaringly illustrated in many of the country, where there have periodic phases of over-building, no definite planning, no information to whether or not there was a need for the buildings, whether population trends favored, or whether wages and salary totals were sufficient. As sequence, we have often proceeded point far out of balance. This has in enough communities to affect the tire country and was a most important contributing factor to the depression.

This will be of equally great importance to the Government in endeavoring to dispel the depression. The money derived from such a program will be lasting, and it is in line with the policy of the Government to plan carefully for the future. It will inaugurate an initiative, guiding and inspiring the people to save itself from disaster and errors. The Government is very interested in pooling vital resources as a safeguard against disaster to all classes of people. The property is the class of capital investment in the country.

Harry L. Hopkins has approved the housing survey and the Civil Works Administration is going to employ about 500,000 persons, chiefly women. The Bureau of Home Economics will carry out the project, in co-operation with the U. S. A., in civil engineering. The survey will cover 300 counties, in the State, and will aim first, to determine the adequacy of present farm homes, and, next, to measure the potential for improved farm home facilities to develop plans for installation of standard specifications and to investigate typical sections and to invent possible methods for financing farm improvements. One out of every five farm homes will be visited. Between 1935 and 1936, the Government will be given employment in this project.

Under This CWA Allocation Boston Will Receive $38,280

$952,461 PROJECTS
APPROVED BY ELY

The state civil works board yesterday mailed out checks totalling $369,639 to some of the larger cities and towns, with which to pay off CWA workers. Chairman Joseph Bartlett announced that under this allocation Board would receive $38,280, Springfield, $10,795, and $6,072.

Other developments of the CWA in Massachusetts yesterday was the approval of projects totalling $952,461, submitted by the state emergency public works board, and the terming of the delay in the start of actual construction of $20,000,000 worth of approved projects as "most disappointing" by the emergency public works commission.

The projects approved yesterday now go to Washington for further sanction by federal authorities.

Among those approved was the construction of a kitchen and dining room building at the state infirmary at Tewksbury, to include connecting tunnels and other items. The cost is $439,990. Another project provides for the construction of a new dormitory at the Soldiers' Home at Chelsea at a cost of $218,700.

The approved list is the 10th to be undertaken by grant and loan from the federal public works fund. The cost of each project given has been estimated on the basis of present prices, and an additional fixed percentage to cover the increased cost of labor and supplies. In the estimates the direct labor cost is figured at 36 per cent. of the total and will furnish 26.2 cents of labor.

Others of the approved projects include:

Construction of a shore house at the Tewksbury Infirmary to cost $126,621; installation of a new well field at the same institution, costing $67,600; reconstruction and extension of stone jetties and dredging the channel at towns.

Chairman Joseph W. Banister said that under this first Boston will receive $35,250, New $10,750 and Worcester $6,750.

Checks Mailed to Cities and Towns Here

Setting in motion machinery for speedy transmission of federal funds to local municipalities to pay 100,000 workers, the State Civil Works Administration last night mailed out checks totaling $369,639 to some of the larger cities.

Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett announced that under this first allocation Boston will receive $38,280, Springfield $10,735 and Worcester $6028.

While money from CWA payrolls circulating here Governor Dwyer has $962,461 in projects submitted by the State Emergency Public Works Board. The projects will go to Washington for sanction by federal authorities.

Projects approved include construction of kitchen and dining room at the Infirmary at Tewksbury to cost $200. Another calls for the construction of a new dormitory at the Soldiers Home in Chelsea at a cost of $218

John T. Scully, state director of the federal emergency relief administration, announced yesterday the list of directors of public agencies in all cities and towns in Massachusetts. The list follows:

INVESTIGATING MORE CAMBRIDGE CASES

Police Checking Up on Addresses Given By 30 C. W. A. Workers

Cambridge police continued their investigation today of the C. W. A. in Cambridge as a result of reports that 150 were fraudulently enrolled. It was brought out today that 30 more cases are under investigation because addresses given are doubted by the authorities.

Definite assurance was given that none would be fired during the holidays. Those in charge wanted to make sure that none of the innocent would be deprived of any happiness that might be theirs as a result of the employment. Those, however, who might come under the scope of the investigation more critically will be prosecuted to the limit, it was said.

At the Brattle-st Municipal Building, this morning, real Christmas cheer was brought to 2206 men and 122 women who were given their Christmas checks. The amount paid out was approximately $39,000. Employees of the Harvard Trust Company were on hand at the building with cash for each check. This was done gratis by the bank authorities.

One of the chief reasons for the action was to eliminate any overcrowding at the bank and secondly to give a service so that the workers could have ready cash on hand and to be able to do their shopping early.

Gave Radcliffe Address

Police investigation of the C. W. A. payroll has disclosed that 150 gave wrong addresses or used other questionable means of getting employment. Some gave vacant lots and business offices as their addresses, while one had the audacity to give the address of a Radcliffe College building.

Aerial Mapping Project Set for CWA Engineers

To Survey Agricultural Regions of 10 States in $650,000 Program

Special to the Transcript:

Washington, Dec. 23—Putting a large number of unemployed engineers and assistants quickly to work on an aerial mapping project that promises to be highly valuable to many governmental agencies—this is the goal of a new Civil Works Administration program.

Airplanes will soon be flying over selected agricultural agencies in ten Southern States, while cameras take overhead views of farms and fields. On the ground below, groups of workers will chain off individual properties and plot to scale the results shown on the air pictures. Fitted together, the air photographs will then form a great mosaic picture map of the land.

During seventy days an allotment of $650,000 is to be expended for this purpose. Mapping of 40,000 square miles will proceed as far as possible, with 500 engineers and some 1500 assistants taking part. The States engaging in the project are Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, New Mexico, South Carolina, Texas and the District of Columbia.

The United States Geological Survey has charge of the project. Advising and conferring with the survey are representatives from governmental agencies which expect to find the maps useful. These include the Bureau of Census, Agricultural Adjustment Administration, Coast and Geodetic Survey, Corps of Engineers of the United States Army and the Army Air Corps.

It is believed that many additional uses for the maps will occur, once they become permanent Government records. The maps will be employed, perhaps as the first demonstration of their usefulness, in connection with the census of agriculture proposed for next November.

Consulting the mosaic strips, enumerators can find obscure farms and buildings that might be otherwise overlooked. Facts about vacant farms, one of the hard problems of the census, can be recorded. Waste land not under cultivation because of gullies, stumps, and rocks can be more completely accounted for. This information becomes of great importance in the study of soil erosion. The study of crops can be more effectively determined with the aid of the air maps.

The maps are expected to provide a more accurate record of the land area within townships and counties. The curvature of the earth causes a slight discrepancy in surveying records in a county, unless this has been taken into account. In one county where this discrepancy has not been allowed for, there is a record of more land in farms than the official area of the whole county.

The maps also may become property and real estate evidence. In one county where the aerial mapping system was tried, the untaxed land discovered within the county amounted to a tax fund sufficient to pay for the initial photographic mapping work.

The project of proceeding with mapping of 40,000 square miles may later be extended to an area of a million square miles if additional funds are made available.

Payless Day Faces Knitters of the CWA

Many Desperate — Those in Boston May Call This Afternoon for Checks

By Bernard Peterson

Another payless payday came to blight the Christmas hope of hundreds of women who went off the welfare lists in their home towns to accept emergency work on CWA projects. They have worked at knitting for two weeks without pay, and face a penniless holiday, despite the utmost last minute effort of the administrative officials.

This morning these women called at their respective city halls and town halls, but for many of them there was no check and the telephones at the State House rang all morning with requests for explanations.

The Boston women in this class will be paid. There are about 200 of them, who work in seven knitting centers. Special messengers have been sent to notify 14. The women got no pay for that week.

Under the new arrangement it became necessary to send the money to the city and town treasurers in the places where any of the knitters lived, and there are some 300 such communities. The town treasurer issues a check to each woman after he has received the cover check from the State treasurer. Those cover checks could not be forwarded to the treasurers until after seven o'clock last night.

Mr. Boston, who is the State director under Dr. Arthur W. Gilbert of the various State projects, prepared the payroll and Mr. Bartlett kept the State Treasurer's office and Controller's office in the State House open last night for the issuance and dispatching of the checks as soon as the warrants could be approved by Mr. Bartlett's board.

Shortly before eight o'clock last evening the checks were sent by special delivery and registered mail to the city and town treasurers all over the State, together with the pay roll lists; some of the county supervisors came to Boston to personally receive the checks and carry them home to the treasurers.

Mr. Boston worked on other details until two o'clock this morning and later started to give personal attention to the distribution of the payrolls among the places that could be reached in time for Christmas.

Deduct Poll Tax From CWA Workers' Checks in Milton

AN ingenious scheme for collecting delinquent poll taxes was put into effect in Milton today, when Civil Works Administration workers received their pay checks. Workers who had failed to pay the poll tax were given cards by Town Tax Collector G. Frank Kemp. Thereafter Kemp gave out the checks, the workers endorsed them and gave them back to him, and he paid over the amount of the check in cash—less the poll tax due.

Although no complaints were received at the State House office of CWA Director Joseph W. Bartlett, it was stated that collections in this manner could not be enforced, should the workers object, inasmuch as the funds are Federal payments and may not be attached.

Kemp's answer to this was that the workers could cash their checks elsewhere, if they so elected.

CLASH ON JOBS IN CAMBRIDGE

CWA Officers Taxed with Inefficiency—They Retort on Local Men

RUSSELL ATTACKED FOR INTERFERENCE

Charges of inefficiency against Civil Works Administration officers in Cambridge were answered last night by counter charges of interference, approaching graft, against city officials, following the announcement that 16 per cent. of the men employed on federal projects were not residents of Cambridge.

The controversy centered on statements issued by Charles J. McMenimen, Cambridge local CWA administrator, and by John M. Kirk, a federal reemployment officer assigned to Cambridge.

"Cambridge had better clean up its situation. Kirk will remain there as the federal appointee," said Dr. Robert S. Quimby, federal reemployment officer assigned to Massachusetts.

A conference between McMenimen and Wellington D. Bateman, a sergeant inspector of the Cambridge police department yesterday revealed frauds in the cases of more than 150 workers enrolled as CWA employees.

Soon afterward Kirk issued a statement blaming Mayor Russell, Harry White, assistant employment manager of the city, McMenimen and his brother, William McMenimen, superintendent of streets, for the situation.

Kirk said that his system had been to fill out cards listing the names, addresses and other information concerning applicants for work and that as men were needed for municipal projects, the cards were given to McMenimen and notices were taken by policemen to the men to be employed.

In case the men had given fictitious addresses or were at work, the policemen reported to McMenimen, he said. "If such a system, he declared, it was impossible as regards his own office, and he and his staff of 10 persons had faithfully registered 5400 applicants for work, of whom 1500 had been given jobs.

His instructions, he said, were to co-operate with local agencies, but on no account to let the power of his office be usurped by politicians.

He declared that Mayor Russell had tried to make him accept a list of men needing jobs and that almost daily White had appeared at his office with a list of names of his own choosing of men whom he wanted put to work.

He said that 66 men, only six of whose names appeared on Kirk's lists, and that either White or McMenimen had given jobs to 96 men, only six of whose names appeared on Kirk's lists, whose names appeared on no list.

Kirk declared he had no intention of impugning the motives of Mayor Russell, White or McMenimen, but that such interference might easily give rise to a suspicion of fraud for which his own office would have to bear most of the blame.

He said that he would brook no further interference by politicians nor would he brook the imputation of fraud within his office.

OUST MRS. RANTOUL, IS DEMAND

War on Appointment to CWA Post Breaks Out

The war brewing for days over the appointment of Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul as head of the women's division of the Civil Works Administration broke wide open last night with a demand made upon Governor Ely to intervene, with the threat that protest meetings will be staged throughout the State unless the Governor takes action.

CRITICISES JUDGMENT

Miss Florence Birmingham, president of the Massachusetts Women's Political Club, directed a letter to Governor Ely attacking the selection of Mrs. Rantoul for this position, criticizing her judgment and sounding a warning of protest meetings throughout Massachusetts unless the matter is ironed out at once.

She stated that the women of the State demand an answer as to who was responsible for the selection of Mrs. Rantoul for this job, claiming there has never been official sanction of her appointment.

It was disclosed that the fight for the removal of Mrs. Rantoul has already been carried so far that it has reached Colonel Harry L. Hopkins, federal relief administrator at Washington. Only a few days ago Mrs. Rantoul was attacked by State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley, who laid at her door all responsibility for the unrest over the various women's activities under the Civil Works Administration.

Bartlett Is Silent

A demand was also made of Joseph W. Bartlett, head of the Civil Works Administration in Massachusetts, that he disclose by whose authority Mrs. Rantoul was selected and given charge of the women's division. Last night Mr. Bartlett declined to comment on the situation.

It was stated that John T. Scully, employment director for the Federal Emergency Administration, was among those who sent a recommendation to Washington calling for the appointment of Mrs. Rantoul, and that Colonel Hopkins officially appointed her only after receiving the recommendation of Massachusetts authorities.

It has been consistently rumored that one of Governor Ely's secretarial staff was likewise responsible for Mrs. Rantoul being selected for the position, but this has never been officially verified at the State House.

JOHNSON HITS CWA WAGE RATE

Pay Said to Exceed That Paid by Industries Under NRA Codes

ELECTRIC UTILITIES HEARING ARRANGED

WASHINGTON, Dec. 22 (AP)—Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, NRA administrator, today filed a strong protest with the civil works administration against the wage rates being paid by it to workers recruited from breadlines as the national recovery administration engaged in its greatest single clean-up drive. Included in 50 codes sent to President Roosevelt for his approval were some of the largest yet taken up.

In many cases wages paid to workers for the civil works administration were said to exceed those of codified industries which employ help for comparable work.

"PERFECTLY RIDICULOUS"

"This is a perfectly ridiculous situation," Gen. Johnson declared, adding that all he can do is protest. It was disclosed that President Roosevelt is inquiring into the complaints.

Signature of the codes sent to the President today, together with those approved earlier in the day, would lift the number of codes in force to 225. The final pre-Christmas dash came simultaneously with the filing of a code to cover electric utilities.

The Edison Electric Institute filed a code proposal which, if approved as drawn, would provide for either voluntary country. The huge batch of codes taken to the White House included two of the biggest groupings yet covered, construction and all its allied lines; printing and publishing, ranging all the way from lithographic and rotogravure plants to newspaper publishers' Association code, the nation's press.

CANNOT ADD 14,000 MORE

State 34,000 Over Its Quota Hopkins Claims

Declaring that he was forced to decline the request of Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State Civil Works Board for an addition of 14,000 persons to the State's quota, Harry L. Hopkins, federal emergency relief commissioner in a telephone communication yesterday said that Massachusetts is already 34,000 over its quota.

Bartlett said that although 14,000 workers have been put to work thus far, he had on hand sufficient projects to make possible the employment of 14,000 more in the event that Washington granted its authority.

Hopkins replied that the work done by the State justified the request that 14,000 more men be added to those at work, but that on account of the large numbers of requests from other States for additional quotas, he felt that the excess already granted here is all that can be given.

it was agreed that Mr. Ide would keep his office open to make payments at 4 o'clock.

What made the situation desperate for the one thousand women employed on knitting projects was that they are without means. Many have come to work day after day without breakfast. Many have received no pay since Dec. 7 from the C. W. A. and could get no further aid from the town welfare board because they were working, but they were looking forward to the Christmas pay day when $24 would be due each one of them.

In some instances where it became known last night that Federal funds could not be forwarded to the cities and towns before Christmas offers were made by private individuals to advance the money, and in one case a citizen made out his personal check for each woman in the group of knitters.

Red tape has been the cause of the difficulty. It grew out of the transfer of the women's projects from the C. W. A. to the Civil Works Service, which was ordered in Washington after the women had been at work for about a week. Joseph W. Bartlett and his board had prepared projects for women and had a plan that worked smoothly. But it was upset by the orders from Washington to make the transfer.

As the money for the civil works service could not continue to come out of the same Federal fund as the money for the C. W. A., it was impossible for the State machinery to have the pay checks ready on time for the week ending Dec. 14. The women got no pay for that week.

Under the new arrangement it became necessary to send the money to the city and town treasurers in the places where any of the knitters lived, and there are some 300 such communities. The town treasurer issues a check to each woman after he has received the cover check from the State treasurer. Those cover checks could not be forwarded to the treasurers until after seven o'clock last night.

Declaring that he was forced to decline the request of Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State Civil Works Board for an addition of 14,000 persons to the State's quota, Harry L. Hopkins, federal emergency relief commissioner in a telephone communication yesterday said that Massachusetts is already 34,000 over its quota.

Bartlett said that although 13,000 workers have been put to work thus far, he had on hand sufficient projects to make possible the employment of 14,000 more in the event that Washington granted its authority.

Hopkins replied that the work done by the State justified the request that 14,000 more men be added to those at work, but that on account of the large numbers of requests from other States for additional quotas, he felt that the excess already granted here is all that can be given.

3000 Women Will Visit Every House in State To Discover Effect of Depression on People

Health and Morale of All To Be Studied in Far-Reaching Census

TO BEGIN WORK ON SURVEY JAN. 1

Three thousand women, many of them college graduates or even former executives, starting Jan. 1 will visit every house in Massachusetts, from the most pretentious to the most miserable, to discover what the depression has done to the health and morale of the people.

It is the first time in the history of the country that an unemployment census has been made almost entirely by women. Mrs. Anne Page of Cambridge, for 20 years an active social worker and labor expert, has been appointed director by Edwin S. Smith, commissioner of labor and industries.

Homes that have not been touched by welfare inspectors because the owners have been unwilling to accept charity will be visited by census takers, drawn largely from what may be termed the "white collared women."

The walls of the headquarters at 169 Congress street are already lined with maps and statistical charts. Telegrams were sent yesterday to obtain detailed maps of every city, town and village in Massachusetts so that examiners may be employed and work begun as soon as possible.

A health survey of Boston will be made at the same time to determine whether the depression has brought an increase in diseases of the type caused by undernourishment. Where health conditions are found to be particularly bad, medical centers will be set up and the necessary steps taken to provide relief.

Many persons, no one can tell how many, have been too poor to have a doctor when they were ill and have been too proud to seek free medical care, Mrs. Page believes. No adequate conception of the health conditions of the city can be had until these persons have been reached.

The state will be divided into districts of 1500 inhabitants and a woman inspector assigned to each district. The inspector will be chosen by the Public Works Administration in the various cities and towns from unemployed women of that community who seek the position. Although experienced workers will be employed whenever possible, the fact that such work has always been done by men in the past will make it necessary to use women who possess other qualifications than experience.

WILL CANCEL WORKS FUND IF CONTRACT IS DELAYED

William F. Dwyer, business agent of the Boston Central Labor Union, has requested a conference with Gov. Ely for the purpose of discussing violations of the CWA relief measure reported to the central body by representatives of affiliated unions.

A number of the complaints registered with the C. L. U. allege violations of the wage section of the emergency act while others stress discrimination against union men in favor of nonunion men by assistant administrators and others with supervision over the carrying out of the act.

Dwyer announced that the C. L. U. has selected the Catholic Union of Boston building at 1622 Washington street for its new headquarters and that the next regular meeting on Friday, Jan. 5, will be held there, instead of at Wells Memorial building, the home of the central body for approximately 30 years.

WILL CANCEL WORKS FUND IF CONTRACT IS DELAYED

Ickes Warns That Money Cannot Be Sent Till Awards Are Executed—$50,000,000 In Payrolls Waiting

WASHINGTON, Dec 25 (A. P.)—A sharp warning that the Public Works Administration would unhesitatingly cancel or rescind allocations for projects to communities that are dilatory in getting actual work under way was given tonight by Secretary Ickes, the Public Works Administrator.

His principal objection was against delays in the execution of proper contracts after projects had been approved.

Public works officials explained that the Secretary's warning did not apply to cases where, after allotments were made, legal obstacles had arisen over such matters as right-of-way; although, they said, such situations should have been cleared up before application for funds was made.

In a formal statement Ickes cited figures showing that just before the holiday grant agreements and bond purchase contracts covering 586 not-Federal allotments had been drawn and sent to applicants. Of these, he said, 270 had been returned properly executed and 307 had not been returned. Until the contracts are executed funds cannot be

SHARP MESSAGE PROTESTS DELAY OF MASS. FUNDS

Matter of 'Grave Concern' To Board Members, Advisory Chairman Says

LOCAL AUTHORITIES HIGHLY CRITICAL

Prompt Action in Approving $31,000,000 Projects By Board Is Cited

Smoldering resentment against delays in obtaining federal money for public works projects in Massachusetts reached a climax yesterday, when former Gov. Alvan T. Fuller, chairman of the state advisory board of the federal public works administration, sent a sharply-worded letter to Secretary of the Interior Ickes, administrator of public works.

Fuller told Ickes that although his board had approved projects amounting to $31,116,000, and PWA officials in Washington had allocated $15,802,000, not a cent of actual money has been received in this state.

The chairman cited a state project which received final approval at Washington Oct. 5, when allocation of money was made. Two months passed before the bond contract was prepared and signed. Shortly after the commonwealth formally requested the first instalment so that a contract could be awarded. But no money has been sent yet, and the project is still held up.

Asserting that this delay is a matter of "grave concern" to the board members, former Gov. Fuller said that many other state projects have been held up pending arrival of bond contracts although the contracts have been in the possession of PWA officials in Washington in many cases for several weeks. It was the failure of the public works program to begin functioning so as to bring re-employment to millions of men that caused President Roosevelt to take $400,000,000 from the public works fund of $5,300,000,000 and set it aside as a civil works fund. The CWA fund was used to put 4,300,000 men and women to work by Dec. 15 and until Feb. 15.

While the CWA board in Massachusetts was setting a national record for speed, Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett, who is also chairman of the state emergency finance board—which puts the original approval on PWA projects—was queried by Massachusetts civic leaders regarding the progress of PWA projects sponsored by cities and towns.

Time and again the resentment, and in some cases downright anger, of the officials was evidenced in bitter "off the record" remarks to the chairman, who explained that his board and the Fuller board had done their duty in approving the PWA projects.

The Bartlett board investigated the financial ability of a city or town to finance its end of the PWA projects—the federal government contributes 30 per cent, as a gift while the community pays the remaining 70 per cent—and the Fuller board examined the projects from the viewpoint of their desirability and worthiness. The engineering phases were then checked by Col. Charles R. Gow, and the project then sent to Washington. After approval at the capital, money was allocated. The delay sions of the act, and have diligently sought to cooperate with them by giving prompt attention to each case submitted in an endeavor to eliminate every unnecessary delay. The records of our office indicate that every application received by us of a meritorious character has been acted upon within a few days after its receipt and has been promptly transmitted to your office for consideration and action.

Up to and including Dec. 22, we have forwarded a total of 175 applications, nine of these being for grants only, of an aggregate estimate cost of $31,116,000. Information received from your office indicates that 96 of these projects, aggregating $15,802,000, have been approved and the money allocated, but no actual money has as yet been made available for any of this work.

As an instance of the delay which has occurred in securing any tangible results, I wish to cite the case of the first state project for which application was made and which was actually approved, so far as allocation of funds is concerned, on Oct. 5; a period of two months elapsed after receipt of notification from your office of approval of this project before the bond contract was prepared and signed. Shortly thereafter, the commonwealth of Massachusetts made a formal request for the first instalment of funds provided for under this contract, but up to this date, no money has been forthcoming and the state very properly has refrained from awarding any contract until they have this money in hand.

A large number of additional state projects which have been passed upon favorably by your office are still awaiting bond contracts, although they have been in your possession for various periods, many of these running into several weeks.

HANDS ARE TIED The commonwealth of Massachusetts has set up adequate machinery for promptly translating these projects into actual construction, but its hands are absolutely tied so long as it does not receive the prompt co-operation of the administrator's office which was anticipated when the applications

200 Workless Women to Get Jobs in Lynn Today

Fully 200 jobless women will go to work at 8 o'clock this morning in Lynn as the result of rush action yesterday afternoon on the part of Mayor J. Fred Manning, a citizens' committee and the Lynn police department. Lynn's police blinker system called in bluecoats from all sections of the city, who were given cards to be distributed to 200 women out of work, telling them to report this morning for work in clothing to be used by the welfare department.

were made. In the mean while bids have been taken on several of these projects in an endeavor to eliminate delay when the final barrier to action was removed, but owing to the time which has now elapsed since these proposals were submitted, it is quite probable that in many cases the work will have to be readvertised on account of increases in material prices since the original tenders were submitted.

We are in complete accord with your expressed policy of proceeding with due regard to the protection of the government's interest in the allocation and distribution of the public works fund, yet in view of the evident purpose of the act to provide prompt relief for unemployment conditions, the period of time which has been taken in connection with the consideration of many of these applications does not appear to be consistent with the major purpose sought for.

I am bringing this situation to your attention because of the strong feeling which is being manifested in this locality regarding the failure so far to produce the desired relief. The local authorities are justly, we believe, highly critical of the administration of this act since they have been led to believe that promptness and diligence on their part would be accorded similar treatment by the federal authorities, and as the members of this board must necessarily share in that criticism, as a component part of your organization I feel that it is incumbent upon us to direct your attention to this situation in the hope that you will be able to find some available means for releasing the major portion of the projects already submitted by us from the influences which apparently are holding them back.

ICKES SAYS FUNDS WILL Be Withdrawn if Not Used Promptly

WASHINGTON, Dec. 25 (AP)—A sharp warning that the Public Works Administration would unhesitatingly cancel or rescind allocations for projects to communities that are dilatory in getting actual work under way was given tonight by Secretary Ickes, public works administrator.

WARNING AGAINST DELAYS His principal objection was against delays in the execution of proper contracts after projects have been approved by the public works board and allotments made.

In a formal statement, Ickes cited figures showing that, just before the holiday, grant agreements and bond purchase contracts covering 586 non-Federal allotments had been drawn and sent to applicants.

Of these, he said, 270 had been returned properly executed and 307 had not been returned. Until the contracts are executed, funds cannot be transferred to begin work. Public works officials estimated that more than $50,000,000 in prospective payrolls was represented in the delayed contracts.

"Months ago," Ickes said, "I warned against dilatory tactics which permit these funds to clog in official channels without final accomplishment of their purposes."

Must Clear Up Situation

Officials of local public bodies which have received allotments must act upon these contracts one way or the other or state why they fail to do so. "The Public Works Administration stands ready to aid any locality on any questions that result from these contracts, but there must be action and not delay."

"The PWA will not hesitate to cancel or rescind allotments already made which, because of unreasonable delay in confirmation of contracts, do not fulfill their purpose in furnishing employment through actual construction work." Public Works officials explained that the Secretary's warning did not apply to cases where, after allotments were made, legal obstacles had arisen over such matters as right-of-way, although, they said, such situations should have been cleared up before application for funds was made.

In the State in Jobless Census

census was to provide jobs for women. Information will be assembled of value to many state and city departments. The material will be given eventually to the federal re-employment service in Massachusetts for permanent use.

IS FAR REACHING

A questionnaire reaching further into certain aspects of the home than any hitherto used has been drawn up with the assistance of members of the health commission, the commission of labor and industries, social service leaders and several other departments.

The effect of continued unemployment on the morale of the worker, the effect on a community of a large number of unemployed, the causes of unemployment, the ages which have suffered most from the depression, these are a few of the angles from which the problem will be attacked.

A careful classification will be made according to age. Children from 14 to 16, who have been forced by NRA codes to drop their jobs, will be studied to learn how they are spending their time, whether the playgrounds are adequate to take care of them or if many of them are slipping into delinquency. At the other end of the scale the census will face the problem of the man of 40 or 45 who is discharged to make way for a younger man.

WILL BE COMPLETE

The solution of these problems will not fall within the definite objectives of the census. But the problem will be clearly presented in many cases for the first time, and brought to the attention of the remedial agent most closely concerned.

Persons who are temporarily employed on a government project with the expectation of being without a job in a month or two, will be listed as well as those who are at present out of work. If a man is working temporarily at a type of work different from his regular occupation or the job he is best fitted to occupy, the fact will be recorded. In this respect the survey will be more complete than any previously undertaken.

Mrs. Page is eminently qualified for her position as director of this large and complicated undertaking. She combines a keen understanding of the problems involved with a pleasant good humor. Although her appointment was announced only Friday, yesterday found her established at headquarters with a small staff already at work. Preparations have been in progress for several weeks.

NATIVE OF BROOKLINE

A native of Brookline, she attended Radcliffe College and achieved prominence as a suffragist and social worker while still an undergraduate. In the garment workers strike of 1913, Mrs. Page, then a junior in college, mingled with the girl strikers, attended their meetings and visited their homes.

Entering the strikers' activity to gain material for a thesis, she soon found her interest in the welfare of the strikers overwhelming her concern for material. She took part in a suffrage parade in Washington and made numerous speeches in behalf of the working girl's cause.

She has been connected with the U. S. department of labor investigating labor costs. At one time she was secretary of the New York state commission that studied the question of reorganizing the government departments of that state.

During the past 10 years Mrs. Page has lived in California, where she was the state secretary of the League of Women Voters.

Not One Cent of $15,802,000 Paid, Fuller Chides Ickes

In getting actual money into the state to re-employ men was what stirred the wrath of former Gov. Fuller. Fuller said that the records in his office indicate that every worth while project has been acted on within 10 days after its receipt and has been promptly transmitted to Washington.

The board, composed of Fuller, John J. Prindiville of Framingham, head of a large contracting firm, and James P. Doran of New Bedford, justice of the third district court of Bristol county, was appointed by the President July 27, last, and "since our acceptance of the responsibilities imposed upon us, we have endeavored through every means at our command to stimulate activity on the part of local authorities," said Fuller.

ADEQUATE MACHINERY

In the case of the state, Fuller added, adequate machinery for promptly translating the projects into actual construction has been set up "but its hands are absolutely tied so long as it does not receive the prompt co-operation of the administrator's office which was anticipated when the applications were made."

While in complete accord with the desire of FWA officials to protect the interests of the federal government, Fuller pointed out that local authorities are "highly critical of the administration of this act." The former Governor pleaded with Secretary Ickes to "find some available means for releasing the major portion of the projects already submitted by us from the influences which apparently are holding them back."

Mr. Fuller's letter to Ickes follows: My dear Mr. Ickes:

The members of this board are experiencing a feeling of grave concern respecting the apparent failure of the public works program to afford prompt relief to unemployment in this state in the manner which was evidently intended when the act was adopted by the Congress early last summer.

Since our acceptance of the responsibilities imposed upon us, we have endeavored through every means at our command to stimulate activity on the part of local public authorities in an effort to expedite the submission of applications for loans and grants under the provisions of the act, and have diligently sought to cooperate with them by giving prompt attention to each case submitted in an endeavor to eliminate every unnecessary delay. The records of our office indicate that every application received by us of a meritorious character has been acted upon within a few days after its receipt and has been promptly transmitted to your office for consideration and action.

Up to and including Dec. 22, we have forwarded a total of 175 applications, nine of these being for grants only, of an aggregate estimate cost of $3,116,000. Unemployment
Census

Plans for Massachusetts Unemployment Census, under which 3000 "white collar" women will be employed at a minimum weekly wage of $18, were outlined in a statement last night by Mrs. Anne Page, director of the census.

MUST REGISTER FIRST

"The women to be employed in this work must be among those at present unemployed. In order to have their names considered as applicants for any of the positions connected with the census taking, they must first register at their nearest Federal Re-employment Bureau. These bureaus have been established throughout the State in every city and town. The Boston Bureau is located on the 10th floor of the Public Works building at 100 Nashua street. I should like to impress upon the women who are desirous of taking part in this work that they must meet these requirements. No applications will be considered unless the applicant has first registered at one of the re-employment bureaus."

To Check Unemployed

"It is a project for women, intended to give in some measure relief until Feb. 15 to some of the thousands of educated women who are at present out of work due to the depression."

"The purpose of the census is to determine from the total population of the Commonwealth the number of persons who are unemployed or who are temporarily employed in stop-gap occupations. It is designed to prepare facts upon which a study and eventual diagnosis of conditions can be based."

"The State has been divided into 14 districts, each district under a supervisor. Enumerators will be apportioned among the districts at the rate of one to every 150 persons. Under a new ruling of the Civil Works Administration the minimum pay of all persons employed on the project will be $18."

Health Survey in Boston

"In Boston a health survey will be made at the same time to discover to what extent unemployment has produced an increase of diseases due to malnutrition and to the general physical and nervous breakdown which comes from worry."

"This survey, it is hoped, will be of social significance and result in an extension of nursing and medical care to many who have not come to the attention of dispensaries and out-patient departments."

U. S. Employment Office

Expressing a desire to clarify in the public mind the nature of the work to be undertaken by the Massachusetts unemployment census, scheduled to begin soon after Jan. 2, Mrs. Anne Page, director of the census, gave out a statement yesterday afternoon in which she said:

"The Massachusetts unemployment census is a project of the Civil Works Administration designed to give immediate employment to 3000 'white collar' women in Massachusetts and to collect and tabulate authentic information on the number of unemployed in the State."

"It has been designated as a woman's project, and for the first time in the history of census taking, the personnel will be made up of women."

"The women to be employed in this work must be at present unemployed. In order to have their names considered for any of the positions connected with the census taking, they must first register at their nearest Federal Reemployment Bureau. C. W. A. AND N. R. A. HEADS'
WAGE DISPUTE SETTLED

WASHINGTON, Dec. 26 (A. P.)—Differences of opinion between Hugh S. Johnson, Industrial Law Administrator, and Harry L. Hopkins, Civil Works Administrator, over the wage rates of civil works employees, appeared to be settled today.

The former spoke to reporters as he entered a lunch conference with President Roosevelt.

Denying he had any row with Hopkins, Johnson said he understood that while the C. W. A. paid higher wages than many industries, nevertheless the industrial workers were on a shorter week, thus evening up the differences in most instances between employees under N. R. A. codes and the Federal workers.

RUSSELL REQUESTS
KIRK'S REMOVAL

Action Follows Dropping of 150 From C. W. A.

Following yesterday's dismissal of about 150 C. W. A. workers on Cambridge projects, who were found to be illegally registered, Mayor Russell, be illegally registered, Mayor Russell formally requested removal of John L. Kirk, Federal reemployment agent assigned to Cambridge.

The Mayor made the request of Inspector Homer, who is said to be making a tour of inspection for the

C. W. A. officials at Washington. Homer said he would take the matter up with his superiors.

It is the contention of the Mayor that Kirk is responsible for the fraudulent registration of the group who were dropped from the C. W. A. payroll yesterday. Kirk lays the blame at the door of Mayor Russell, other city officials and Charles L. McMenimen, Cambridge C. W. A. administrator.

McMenimen said last night that all future hiring will be done through the office of the Cambridge Board of Public Welfare, of which he is chairman. Of the 2200 C. W. A. workers in Cambridge, about 600 have yet to be investigated by police. Mayor Russell said about 10 percent of the men now on the Cambridge C. W. A. rolls do not belong there.

Women's Club Accuses Mrs. Rantoul
Of Giving CWA Jobs to Debutantes

A demand for a federal investigation of rumors that Boston politicians were being allowed to hand out work slips to women applicants for work under the civil works administration, and that some politicians were charging as much as $50 for the slips, was contained in a resolution unanimously passed at a meeting of the executive board, officers and chairmen of local branches of the Massachusetts Women's Political Club in the Hotel Bradford last night.

The resolution condemned Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, director of the women's division, for violating the spirit of the act by choosing debutantes and married women who were not in need as her subordinates in the women's division.

It also criticized Gov. Ed. Dwyer, S. Smith, commissioner of labor and industries, and John T. Scully, state director of public works, for the appointment of Mrs. Anne Page, for 10 years a resident of California, as director of the unemployment census.

The club committee, which investigated the appointment of Mrs. Rantoul and Mrs. Page, said that Smith "persisted in denying knowledge" as to how long Mrs. Page had lived in this state.

It was voted to send a committee of 100 unemployed women to call on Gov. Ely next Wednesday. "If we don't obtain satisfaction, we will then call a mass meeting," said Miss Florence Birmingham, president of the club.

Mrs. Rantoul and Scully last night declined to discuss the accusations. Smith was in Philadelphia.

"White Collar" Jobs for
1000 Men and Women

About 1000 men and women will start on a census of Massachusetts business on Jan. 1, according to announcement by Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the Civil Works Board last night, after consultation with Kirk Austin, New England representative of the Department of Commerce.

All jobs available under this plan will be of the "white collar" type and positions will be filled from among the registered unemployed and welfare recipients.

WOMEN CWA WORKERS
FIND NO MATERIALS

Twenty-five women who were ordered to report to CWA headquarters in Quincy yesterday to do needle work found no materials on hand with which to begin. Mrs. C. Stanley Purcell, in charge of the women's division at the headquarters, blamed officials in Boston for failure to deliver the materials. Fourteen of the women were finally put to work at the Quincy City Hospital with materials available there, and the rest were told to report for work later in the week.

clients. The workers will ascertain the costs of production, profits and losses, and statistics of workers and wages.

Chairman Bartlett, as head of the State Emergency Finance Board, also announced approval of $40,000 to be expended by the town of Andover for a new high school, equipped with gymnasium and assembly hall. This plan will be constructed with federal funds, 70 per cent as a loan and 30 per cent as an outright grant.

Quincy CWA Women
Arrive Ready to Sew:
Find Supplies AWOL

When the first contingent of CWA women due to work under the CWA in Quincy arrived this morning at their new office, but no supplies awaited them.

Nowhere, let alone thread and bobbins. Nor was there any money whereupon to purchase same.

Finally Mrs. Estel Purcell, in charge, went across the street to the welfare bureau, borrowed some money and bought enough supplies for most of the twenty-five women to start to work.

Alack! There was no cloth to sew. So the fifteen were sent to the Quincy City Hospital with a supply of buttons, like what the office expense account, and are sewing buttons on.

WOMEN TO SEE ELY TO ASK PROBE

Claim CWA Jobs Sold and Given by Favor

Moved to action by charges of graft and favoritism in the handing out of CWA jobs to men and women, as made by a special investigating committee, 100 unemployed women, members of the Massachusetts Women's Political Club, from all parts of the State, are to march to the office of Governor Ely next Wednesday to register personal protests against the State CWA officials.

Tickets and passing time, a social gain, stirred the women to action last night.

In addition the women's committee charges that there is a lack of leadership evident throughout the State, with debutantes working just for a fad while worthy women with dependents cannot secure employment.

The most sensational of the nine resolves is the one referring to graft charges and the Boston ward officials passing out jobs for personal gain. The resolve as it was sent to President Roosevelt and other high officials is:

Charge Jobs Are Sold

"Resolved, That the many persistent rumors to the effect that women, and men also, are obliged to pay $50 to unscrupulous politicians for positions in Civil Works jobs, would bear investigation from Washington. We are of the opinion that the Federal CWA board, instead of maintaining an aloof, hands-off policy in this important matter, should lend immediate efforts to restore confidence in the act in the minds of the women by seeking to discover if there is foundation for these ugly, wide-spread rumors. Bitter accusations that ward politicians in the City of Boston are receiving cherished work tickets to pass out as they see most profitable to themselves, instead of being distributed through regular channels, should also be investigated. Such conditions, if they exist as rumor claims, are a base betrayal of the President's praiseworthy efforts. What is the use of appropriating millions of dollars to help suffering workers who have been exploited by the money masters if this vast venture is in turn to be used for their exploitation? Even the hint of such abuses calls for the righteous indignation of all American citizens."

Against Mrs. Rantoul

A second resolve, opposing the appointment of Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul as head of the women's CWA programme in Massachusetts, and which charges that debutantes are working claims, who depends on a wage for her existence, is as follows: "Resolved, that the Massachusetts Women's Political Club go on record as disapproving the placing of Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, a society woman, in the position which gives her the stupendous power of naming those who will distribute work to wage earners with whose problems only indirectly has she come in contact. Directors of her selection have shown discrimination. The CWA, involving as it does the very lives of our citizens, should be on such a high plane that it permits not even the slightest suspicion of discrimination. The rule of justice and mercy, not the rule of might and warped bias, should govern this magnificent, ambitious endeavor."

"Debutantes, who work for a fad, and married women with husbands employed, seeking excitement through a 'career', have no place in Civil Works programme. Citizens of city of Boston are already aroused by the news that a Brookline society had taken a job from a girl who depends on a wage for her very existence by working in one of the city's largest department stores which bears the name of a man who has been, and still is, a leader in the NRA activities."

"Wage earners, out of a job, and needing one, rightly feel that society women in these crucial times, should show gratitude to a benign Providence for their accumulations of wealth by staying in their own glorified circle, instead of trying to help workers in their wage earning environment."

In the committee report a charge is made that Mrs. Anne Page, newly appointed director of the unemployment census, lived in California for the past 10 years.

Miss Birmingham personally charges that when she appeared before Commissioner Edwin S. Smith, head of the State Labor and Industries Division, she was insulted by the commissioner when he replied "None of your business" to her question, asking the reason.

WELFARE IS GIVEN
$300,000 MORE

Council Votes Funds to Carry
Dept. Through Year

The Boston city council, at a special meeting yesterday, gave a final reading to an order appropriating $300,000 in additional funds for the welfare department to carry it through the balance of the present year.

This brings the total allotment to the department for the year to approximately $1,350,000, including welfare disbursements as well as allotments as old age assistance and mother's aid. Disbursements of the soldiers' relief department will approximate $1,000,000 more.

At an executive session of the council Rupert S. Carven, city auditor, said that apparently the CWA work program had operated to increase rather than decrease the welfare department rolls. He said that the welfare lists after falling off by several thousand during the summer and fall, increased during the last few weeks to the peak for the year reached last spring. He conceded that this was undoubtedly a reflection of the federal government's policy of giving preference for CWA jobs to welfare recipients.

As a result of this policy, he said, many unemployed persons who previously had struggled along without recourse to city relief, were prompted to have their names placed on the welfare lists either as a means of getting a job or direct relief.

John J. Lydon, soldiers' relief commissioner, presented a different story as regards his department. He said that although veterans also are given preference for CWA jobs, his relief rolls had decreased by several hundred recently as a direct result of the government work program. He said that a number of veterans had been able to enroll on his lists as a means of getting a job, but that he had been able to direct them to the proper agencies for obtaining employment without enrolling for relief.

The council, at its meeting, adopted an order offered by Councilman Francis E. Kelley of Dorchester, requesting Mayor Curley to cancel the contract awarded to Coleman Bros. Inc. for removing refuse and garbage in Dorchester during 1934. Kelley said the incoming mayor should have a chance to pass upon the award, because as Coleman Brothers were third lowest bidder.

150 ARTISTS TO GET
U. S. EMPLOYMENT

Federal Committees for N. E.
Announced

WASHINGTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—The committee membership of the New England division of the federal works of art project was announced today in a telegram sent by Francis H. Taylor, director of the Worcester Art Museum and chairman of the regional committee, to Forbes Watson, technical director.

The New England committee is one of the first of 16 regional groups to be near completion with only the representatives for Vermont remaining to be chosen.

"No community in New England wishing to benefit by the work of the artists is to be denied that opportunity," Taylor said in his wire. "A total of 150 artists will soon be employed, selected from unemployed professional painters, sculptors, print makers and poster artists, who will be assigned to mural painting, portrait, landscape and decorative easel paintings to be hung in public buildings such as the state hospital in Tewksbury, a museum in Providence, the children's ward in the Cambridge city hospital and for town halls."

5-Year Civil Works Plan
Now Afoot

Not Approved Yet by Administration—Huge Burden on Treasury

By Oliver McKee, Jr.

Special to the Transcript:

Washington, Dec. 29—As word comes today that the public works authorization of $3,300,000,000 has been virtually exhausted, the Roosevelt Administration faces a decision not only on the amount of additional appropriations which it will ask of Congress but also on the future of the Civil Works Administration, for which $400,000,000 of public works funds has been granted to give Federal money to 4,000,000 persons formerly on city and other relief rolls until the spring. The executive committee of mayors has already gone on record with a demand for a continuation of the CWA over a much longer period and unofficial reports current here have it that plans are afoot for establishing a five-year CWA program. This plan, it is believed, originates with certain members of Congress and there is no indication so far that the Administration has approved it, with the by next spring. Under these conditions, pledged as he is to securing re-employment for the jobless, the President, it is believed, may favor some sort of extension, although perhaps not on the present gigantic scale of direct governmental relief.

One ominous aspect of the situation is the tendency on the part of some persons already employed to get on the CWA payroll. The rate of wages is that prevailing in the local communities, and this makes a CWA berth fairly desirable to certain persons—even though the employment ostensibly is but temporary. The trend is parallel to that which is resulting in a vast extension of the Federal payroll through the other emergencies.

The President is expected to continue to give much attention during the next day or so to the budget and the related problems of Treasury financing. He is due to submit the budget estimates to Congress the middle of next week.

libraries and schools in several small towns in Connecticut, Massachusetts and Maine."

Officials of the public works of art project said that all artists should apply directly to the regional districts in which they live, to a museum director who represents the New England committee, which includes:

For Eastern Massachusetts—Former Gov. Alvan T. Fuller, chairman of the Massachusetts advisory board of the public works administration; Paul J. Spitz, president of the American Association of Museum Directors; J. Holmes, director of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts; Morris Carter, director of the Isaac Newton Gardner Museum; Edward Forbes, director of the Essex Art Museum; Charles H. Sawyer, at the address Gallery of American Art at Andover; William Emerson, dean of architecture, Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Henry M. Liben, William T. Albridge, Charles M. Keating, William R. Evans, Amy Webb Karsenhan, Ella M. Cannon and Mrs. Eva Whitman.

WESTERN MASSACHUSETTS

For Western Massachusetts—Rear-Admiral Ralph Earl, U. S. N. president, Worcester Polytechnic Institute; George Heath, Joseph A. Marvel, director, Springfield Museum of Art; Dr. William S. Kerkham, director, Springfield Natural History Museum; Miss Laura M. Bates, director, Museum of the Berkshire Museum, Pittsfield; and William H. Eaton, For Rhode Island—Earle Rowe, director, Rhode Island School of Design, Providence, and Royal B. Fennell.

For Connecticut—Winslow Ames, director, Lyman Allen Museum, New London; A. E. Austin, director, Wadsworth Atheneum, Hartford; Everett H. Merks, Yale School of Fine Arts.

For Maine—Henry Andrews, Bowdoin College Museum of Art, Brunswick; and For New Hampshire—Mrs. Maud Beiles Knowlton, director, Currier Gallery, Manchester.

The committee for Vermont has not been announced.

FOR 3000 WOMEN

Director Page Outlines Unemployment Census

Plans for Massachusetts Unemployment Census, under which 3000 "white collar" women will be employed at a minimum weekly wage of $18, were outlined in a statement last night by Mrs. Anne Page, director of the census.

MUST REGISTER FIRST

"The women to be employed in this work must be among those at present unemployed. In order to have their names considered as applicants for any of the positions connected with the census taking, they must first register at their nearest Federal Re-employment Bureau. These bureaus have been established throughout the State in every city and town. The Boston Bureau is located on the 10th floor of the Public Works building at 100 Nashua street. I should like to impress upon the women who are desirous of taking part in this work that they must meet these requirements. No applications will be considered unless the applicant has first registered at one of the re-employment bureaus."

To Check Unemployed

"It is a project for women, intended to give in some measure relief until Feb. 15 to some of the thousands of educated women who are at present out of work due to the depression."

"The purpose of the census is to determine from the total population of the Commonwealth the number of persons who are unemployed or who are temporarily employed in stop-gap occupations. It is designed to prepare facts upon which a study and eventual diagnosis of conditions can be based."

"The State has been divided into 14 districts, each district under a supervisor. Enumerators will be apportioned among the districts at the rate of one to every 1500 persons. Under a new ruling of the Civil Works Administration the minimum pay of all persons employed on the project will be $18."

Health Survey in Boston

"In Boston a health survey will be made at the same time to discover to what extent unemployment has produced an increase of diseases due to mal-nutrition and to the general physical and nervous breakdown which comes from worry."

"This survey, it is hoped, will be of social significance and result in an extension of nursing and medical care to many who have not come to the attention of dispensaries and out-patient departments."

Must First Register With U. S. Employment Office

Expressing a desire to clarify in the public mind the nature of the work to be undertaken by the Massachusetts unemployment census, scheduled to begin soon after Jan. 2, Mrs. Anne Page, director of the census, gave out a statement yesterday afternoon in which she said:

"The Massachusetts unemployment census is a project of the Civil Works Administration designed to give immediate employment to 3000 'white collar' women in Massachusetts and to collect and tabulate authentic information on the number of unemployed in the State."

"It has been designated as a woman's project, and for the first time in the history of census taking, the personnel will be made up of women."

"The women to be employed in this work must be among those at present unemployed. ### Action Follows Dropping of 150 From C. W. A.

Following yesterday's dismissal of about 150 C. W. A. workers on Cambridge projects, who were found to be illegally registered, Mayor Russell formally requested removal of John Kirk, Federal reemployment agent assigned to Cambridge. The Mayor made the request of Inspector Homer, who is said to be making a tour of inspection for the

Women's Club Accuses Mrs. Rantoul Of Giving CWA Jobs to Debutantes

A demand for a federal investigation of rumors that Boston politicians were being allowed to hand out work slips to women applicants for work under the civil works administration, and that some politicians were charging as much as $50 for the slips, was contained in a resolution unanimously passed at a meeting of the executive board, officers and chairmen of local branches of the Massachusetts Women's Political Club in the Hotel Bradford last night.

The resolution condemned Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, director of the women's division, for violating the spirit of the act by choosing debutantes and married women who were not in need as her subordinates in the women's division.

It also criticized Gov. E. A. Tamm, Smith, commissioner of labor and industries, and John T. Scully, state director of public works, for the appointment of Mrs. Anne Page, for 10 years a resident of California, as director of the unemployment census.

The club committee which investigated the appointment of Mrs. Rantoul and Mrs. Page, said that Smith "persisted in denying knowledge" as to how long Mrs. Page had lived in this state.

It was voted to send a committee of 100 unemployed women to call on Gov. Ely next Wednesday. "If we don't obtain satisfaction, we will then call a mass meeting," said Miss Florence Birmingham, president of the club.

Mrs. Rantoul and Scully last night declined to discuss the accusations. Smith was in Philadelphia.

CENSUS WILL START ON JAN. 1

"White Collar" Jobs for
1000 Men and Women

About 1000 men and women will start on a census of Massachusetts business on Jan. 1, according to an announcement by Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the Civil Works Board last night, after consultation with Kirk Austin, New England representative of the Department of Commerce.

All jobs available under this plan will be of the "white collar" type and positions will be filled from among the registered unemployed and welfare recipients.

When the first census of women due to work under the C. W. A. in Quincy is completed, the morning at their new office has been awaited. They were supposed to go to work today.

Nowhere were there needles, however, let alone thread and bobbins. Not was there any money wherewith to purchase same.

Private Mrs. Estel Purcell, in charge, went to the street to the welfare bureau, to borrow some money and bought through supplies for fifteen of the twenty-five women to start to work.

Alas! There was no cloth to sew. So the fifteen were sent to the Quincy Hospital with a supervisor and a supply of buttons, like work at the Quincy City Hospital with materials available there, and the rest were told to report for work later in the week.

Failure on the part of the Governor to aid them next Wednesday will mean that a mass protest meeting will be held, the executive committee voted at its meeting last night.

The report of the special committee appointed by the Women's Political Club to investigate the complaints, is by far the most bitter attack aimed at the CWA work in this State.

Expect Investigation
What action Washington officials of the CWA will take is not known, but leaders of the club following the meeting last night, expressed the belief that their resolutions and charges will result in a thorough investigation.

Following the meeting the committee, which is headed by Miss Florence Birmingham, president of the club, stated that they will continue their investigations and make other reports to the club at a later date, or to the planned mass meeting.

The charges that politicians are selling CWA jobs for $50, and that ward leaders in Boston are receiving work tickets and passing them out for personal gain, stirred the women to action last night.

In addition the women's committee charges that there is a lack of leadership evident throughout the State, with debutantes working just for a fad while worthy women with dependents cannot secure employment.

The most sensational of the nine resolves is the one referring to graft charges and the Boston ward officials passing out jobs for personal gain. The resolve as it was sent to President Roosevelt and other high officials is:

Charge Jobs Are Sold
"Resolved, That the many persistent rumors to the effect that women, and men also, are obliged to pay $50 to unscrupulous politicians for positions in Civil Works jobs, would bear investigation from Washington. A second resolve, opposing the appointment of Mrs. Lois B. "Wage earners, out of a job, and needing one, rightly feel that society women in these crucial times, should show gratitude to a benighted Providence for their accumulations of wealth by staying in their own glorified circle, instead of tying with the workers in their wage earning environment."

In the committee report a charge is made that Mrs. Anne Page, newly appointed director of the unemployment census, lived in California for the past 10 years.

Miss Birmingham personally charges that when she appeared before Commissioner Edwin S. Smith, head of the State Labor and Industries Division, she was insulted by the commissioner when he replied "None of your business" to her question, asking the residence of Mrs. Page.

After hearing the resolutions as drawn by the committee, consisting of Miss Birmingham, Mrs. Kathryn P. Griffin and Miss Mary K. Rooney, the women voted unanimously to accept them as read. Miss Birmingham was appointed spokeswoman for the 100 unemployed when they march to Governor Ely's office next Wednesday.

Several cases, where women and men have been refused jobs while others not as needy were given employment under the CWA rules, were reported to the committee last night at the meeting. The meeting was an executive one last night, and the newly mentioned cases will be investigated thoroughly.

This brings the total allotment to the department for the year to approximately $13,500,000, including welfare disbursements as well as allotments as old age assistance and mother's aid. Disbursements of the soldiers' relief department will approximate $1,000,000 more.

Kelley said the incoming mayor should have a chance to pass upon the award, inasmuch as Coleman Brothers were third lowest bidder.

150 ARTISTS TO GET U. S. EMPLOYMENT

Federal Committees for N. E. Announced

WASHINGTON, Dec. 28 (AP)—The committee membership of the New England division of the federal works of art project was announced today in a telegram sent by Francis H. Taylor, director of the Worcester Art Museum and chairman of the regional committee, to Forbes Watson, technical director.

The New England committee is one of the first of 16 regional groups to be near completion with only the representatives for Vermont remaining to be chosen.

"No community in New England wishing to benefit by the work of the artists is to be denied that opportunity," Taylor said in his wire. "A total of 150 artists will soon be employed, selected from unemployed professional painters, sculptors, print makers and poster artists, who will be assigned to mural painting, portrait, landscape and decorative easel paintings to be hung in public buildings such as the state hospital in Tewksbury, a museum in Providence, the children's ward in the Cambridge city hospital and for town halls."

The budget impasse which, up to date, has prevented the completion of the figures for the coming fiscal year, largely centers in the future obligations to be imposed on the Treasury for relief measures. Little difficulty has been caused by the appropriations for the regular expenses of the Government, beyond the usual protests of bureau and departmental chiefs against the pruning knife of the budget director. A deficit of at least a billion dollars for the fiscal year ending June 30 next already has been indicated, and Lewis Douglas and other advocates of a really balanced budget have been cautioning against piling up future charges on the Treasury.

Demand for Huge Grants
Against these warnings the Administration faces a demand for huge additional grants for public works and the extension of the CWA program for several years. Industry is not yet ready to absorb the 4,000,000 persons on the CWA rolls, and only a short far beyond anything considered likely will enable it to absorb any considerable part of them by next spring. Under these conditions, pledged as he is to securing re-employment for the jobless, the President, it is believed, may favor some sort of extension, although perhaps not on the present gigantic scale of direct governmental relief.

One ominous aspect of the situation is the tendency on the part of some persons already employed to get on the CWA payroll. The rate of wages is that prevailing in the local communities, and this makes a CWA berth fairly desirable to certain persons—even though the employment ostensibly is but temporary. The trend is parallel to that which is resulting in a vast extension of the Federal payroll through the other emergency agencies.

The President is expected to continue to give much attention during the next day or so to the budget and the related and Treasury financing. He is due to submit the budget estimates to Congress the middle of next week.

of one not out of employment, but the contrary, she'll be one of the chosen 300 women sent throughout the State by the Massachusetts Unemployment Relief Commission, which will actually commence a day or two after the advent of the new year.

When the hiring of these 300 women, the long debated question, namely, what is a white collar woman, will be answered.

A white collar woman, say Mrs. Anne Page and others connected with the census project, is a woman of the professions, such as doctors, lawyers, nurses, etc. Included in that list also are stenographers, girls fresh from college, school teachers and almost any type of woman who works in an office or holds a job which demands at least a high school education.

10,000 File Applications

From a list of almost 10,000 of these women, whom the State says are the more or less neglected unemployed, will be chosen the census takers.

For six weeks, in all parts of the State, unemployed teachers, nurses, artists, secretaries and what not, will call at every home in the State asking census questions.

In Boston, where several hundred will be put to work for the six weeks period, health questions will be asked in addition to the regular census questions.

The special health survey will be taken in Boston to determine the effects of the depression. The question to be asked Bostonians is: "In what measure has the depression injured the health of any member of your family?"

Will Be Well Dressed

The answers will be carefully marked down by the census taker and with them a social service committee will try to determine ways and means of aiding those affected until the depression has ended.

The white-collar women, so-called because of their work, will appear to be well dressed individuals while on the job, but the officials of the project point out that this will mean nothing. The expensive fur coats citizens will see were purchased a year or two ago when these women had responsible positions, paying excellent salaries, officials state.

Girl graduates from colleges such as Smith, Radcliffe, Wellesley, Boston University, Sargent School and many other New England institutions, have applied for the census jobs, which will pay but 40 cents weekly.

One applicant told the authorities that she can speak seven languages fluently, and offered gladly to go into the tenement district to take the census.

Hold College Degrees

Three women who applied for census taking jobs have Ph. D. degrees from colleges, and several others have master's and bachelor of arts degrees, the authorities reveal.

When the census-taking starts, the State will be divided into 11 districts. There will be one census taker to every 1200 population.

The census will be the first ever taken by women in this State. The figures which the women receive from the citizens will be sent to the department of labor and industries. In addition to the usual questions, such as name, address and number of persons in the family, the workers will ask for the number of persons working in each family, and if any are unemployed they will seek the length of unemployment.

ings to President Hoover.

Their message read:

"From 21 men who are finding the new year really happy through your Civil Works Administration, which has given them their first steady jobs and regular pay checks for their dependents in three years, come sincere wishes that you may have continued health, happiness, success and prosperity during 1934."

100 WOMEN TO SEE ELY TODAY

Protest to Be Made on CWA Methods

Miss Florence Richmond, president of the Massachusetts Women's Political Club, which has a headquarters at 230 Clark street, will assemble in the Hall of Flags at the State House at 2:30 o'clock this afternoon, and then climb the stairs to Governor Eli's office on the third floor.

She expects to receive the Governor's answer to her protest to him that the timekeeper charged the official book and reduced Doyle's pay without authority.

The women, some of whom were informed of the protest by the award of a grant and tax rebate in the award of CWA jobs to both men and women, and their opposition to the appointment of Mrs. Lois B. Randall as head of the women's CWA programme in the Commonwealth.

The scandal was made known Saturday morning, when former Councilman Joseph W. Doyle of a Tufts avenue, foreman of the laborers doing work at the Central fire station, complained to Chief Evans that his pay envelope did not contain the right amount of money.

Chief Evans investigated and made the discovery that the official CWA time book had been "doctored" and the man who was fired, but it is known that he was recently under charge at the Central fire station, the man who has been fired approached him and his charges were not sustained and his case with that of another man was not pressed.

Holding Name Back

With Doyle in the fire chief's office was Fred Timmins, of 100 Bradford street, Everett, who is employed as engineer of construction. The two men, Chief Evans said, revealed to him facts that led to a quick investigation and the firing of a timekeeper.

Officials are withholding the name of the man who was fired, but it is known that he was recently under charge at the Central fire station, the man who has been fired approached him and his charges were not sustained and his case with that of another man was not pressed.

It was made known last night that Doyle has told the authorities that soon after being given the CWA job at the Central fire station, the man who has been fired approached him and his charges were not sustained and his case with that of another man was not pressed.

Complains of Cut

When his pay envelope was reduced from $36 weekly to $15, Doyle went to Chief Evans and complained. An investigation by Chief Evans revealed that the timekeeper charged the official book and reduced Doyle's pay without authority.

After admitting, the chief charged, that he had asked Doyle for the money and that he in turn was to give the money to a "certain welfare official for a Christmas present, because he was good enough to get the boys' jobs," Chief Evans immediately fired him and started the probe.

Six men working on the job have admitted that they paid 50 cents weekly for the past four weeks to this man, Chief Evans told the federal authorities.

A further check yesterday brought out the revelation that a carpenter, also employed at the Central fire station, has also collected for the "official's Christmas present." This man will be fired when he reports to work tomorrow morning, Evans stated.

Believe 40 Contributed

Everett revealed last night that they believe that of the 80 men working on the fire project at least 40 have been contributing to the "Christmas present" to the official who got the boys the jobs.

Chief Evans, who was reluctant to discuss the matter last night, stated that in his probe he failed to reveal the name of the official, and neither has he discovered that a Christmas present was given an official.

"The scandal is too tough for me. I have called the federal men and they will get the facts. Any information will have to come from them," the Everett fire chief stated.

The chief also stated that when he was placed in charge of the project he told those connected with it that "everything would have to be on the level."

Calls It "Sheer Graft"

"I told this man whom I fired that there would be no crooked work allowed and I meant it. Anything I have charge of will be run right, or I don't take charge. The Christmas present business is nothing but sheer graft, and those who have been taking the weekly tributes will have to pay the price now," Evans stated.

It was also made known in Everett last night that when the federal officials arrive tomorrow morning to question those connected, they will be told of persistent rumors in the effect that men working on other projects in Everett have been asked to contribute to officials.

There are 50 men working on several Everett projects. The work in the Central fire station has been going on for four weeks and officials say that collections from men were taken for at least three of the four weeks.

Laborer Paid Four Weeks

Louis P. Cossett of 23 Clark street, Everett, a laborer employed on the fire station project, admitted Chief Evans says, that he paid the man who has been fired $2 since he started working four weeks ago.

Inasmuch as the CWA project is a federal-controlled proposition the Everett police have not been consulted in the expense.

The firing of the employer and the calling to Everett of federal authorities to sift the charges, brings to the boiling point rumors of dishonest acts that have been prevalent in that city for many days.

Another City Involved

The Everett scandal follows closely on the heels of the report of the Massachusetts Women's Political Club, which revealed rumors that $50 graft was paid for a CWA job and that Boston ward officials were handing out work tickets for personal gain.

The Everett probe is also expected to be the means of federal CWA officials investigating in at least one other city, which is close to the Everett border lines.

The project at the Central fire station in Everett has been progressing very well. The workers have already laid a new cement floor in place of the old apparatus floor. They have also reconstructed the office of the chief and the board of fire commissioners, and are now at work laying cement floors on the second floor of the station, and reconstructing several rooms.

Believed Permanent in Massachusetts

The year 1934 begins in New England today with tangible evidence not only that business is recovering normally, but that at least one-third of those men and women who have suffered keenly through lack of employment have been reabsorbed, either temporarily or permanently, by industry, or have found work under federal projects.

It begins also with the assurance that public improvements which normally would not have been accomplished for years, will be added to the assets of the six states within a few months, as a result of the CWA and PWA projects sponsored and largely paid for by the federal government.

In a statement issued last night, the Massachusetts recovery board declared that since last March 7,000,000 persons have found employment in the United States, and that business has been stabilized in New England.

UNDER THE BLUE EAGLE

According to a statement issued by the statistical bureau of the state recovery board, approximately 94 per cent. of business in Massachusetts is enrolled under the blue eagle, although as yet the codes for several branches of business have not been formulated.

New Year's eve also brought a statement that of the 130,000 jobs assigned to Massachusetts under civil works projects, 100,000 have been filled already and 30,000 more men will be put to work during the coming week.

According to present plans, the civil works program will mean the expenditure in this state alone of $23,500,000, most of which will be given outright by the federal government. Of this amount, approximately 70 per cent. will be expended in wages up to Feb. 15, when the CWA program will end.

As soon as the softening of the ground in spring permits new construction work, the public works program will begin, with more than $40,000,000 to be expended in improvements of a permanent nature which will give work to many of the men now engaged on CWA projects.

One of the most remarkable demonstrations of business recovery in New England was the tremendous increase in purchases during the Christmas season this year. Mass buying was on such a large scale that stocks were completely exhausted in some lines in communities where the pinch of want had been felt most keenly a year ago. At projects at the present time in Fall River. The price of mill stocks is increasing, and six concerns have paid dividends during the past few months.

Mayor J. Fred Manning of Lynn announced Saturday night that beginning during the week ending Jan. 18, city employees in all departments will start receiving their full pay, and that the 10 per cent. wage cut effective since March, 1932, will be restored.

Nearly 1700 school teachers, policemen, firemen and other city workers will receive a total of nearly $7000 more during the third week in January than in any of the past 92 weeks.

A Mayor Manning said he is confident it will not be necessary for any of the workers to donate any part of their salaries during 1934 in order that city expenses may be met.

Walter A. Griffin, who will take office as mayor of Lawrence this week, has pledged the city there will be no more payless pay days. Because of the impossibility of obtaining loans, the municipal employees received no pay from early in 1932 until last June, when back salaries were paid in lump sums, and from July until November pay days were discontinued.

Retail business in Lawrence during the Christmas season was greatly increased over 1932 as a result of a considerable increase of the employees at mills in the city.

From an industrial payroll figure of $1,255,761 in January of 1933, there was a steady increase until the August peak of $2,107,444. In direct contrast to the embarrassing financial spots in which the city found itself in 1932, the municipality went through 1933 without missing a payroll or a bill draft. The last payless pay day, as a matter of fact, was in July of 1932.

The school department retrenched this year to the extent of closing schools a week earlier than usual in June and of opening a week later in September. Other departments went along about as usual.

Debt and interest payments met by the city this year amounted to slightly more than a million dollars and of the $3,700,000 borrowed in anticipation of taxes, $2,300,350 was paid off. There were no defaults. The city carries over into 1934, $1,400,000 in unpaid temporary loans, against a carry-over from 1932 to 1933 of $2,391,000. Borrowing on tax titles this year amounted to $725,000.

C. L. U. AGENT HOPEFUL

W. F. Dwyer Says C. W. A. Is Wonderful Measure

William F. Dwyer, secretary and business agent of the Boston Central Labor Union, discussing the coming year in a statement last night, said:

"I am encouraged over the outlook for 1934, especially after the PWA relief measure gets in full swing, as it will, to my mind, give the necessary impetus to all other lines of business and restore normal conditions."

The CWA is a wonderful temporary measure of relief, which is keeping up the morale of the workers in anticipation of the larger program of the PWA and other looked for projects for the New Year. These combined relief measures, which provide for road building on an extensive scale, building of bridges, dredging and eventually a tremendous building construction program, will start things and before long general business will again be a going concern.

Organized labor here has something else to be thankful for in the induction into office of mayor of Alty, Frederick W. Mansfield, who has long been closely associated with the labor movement and knows its problems and the ambitions of the wage earners.

PATHETIC IN PLEAS FOR JOBS

Fine, Well Educated Women Eager to Get
State Work

The most humane relief project yet undertaken in this country got under way in Boston yesterday, with close to 200 women employed to date.

The purpose is the employment of women who have suffered because of the depression. The results, so far, are so satisfactory as to be spectacular.

WOMEN SEEK CWA JOBS
Part of the line of women who registered yesterday for positions in the CWA.

More than 10,000 women have applied to date to the unemployment office of the Civil Works Administration on the Congress street. More than 200 of the 10,000 will go to work Friday, taking an unemployment census throughout the State at $18 a week or more.

Yesterday those of the 300 who are hardest hit by conditions started in to earn money, some for the first time in four years.

They came in long lines, young women, middle-aged women, old women.

Eagerly Willing to Work

"I haven't worked for a year—for two years—for four years—for so long that I can't take care of my husband, or my little babies," is what they told the women who heard them, who selected them from the 10,000 who humbly applied for "something—anything in the way of honest work."

Most of them looked like women who needed little. To the experienced masculine eye, it seemed they were all well dressed.

Yet a woman who worked with them revealed that there were those who stayed away, those who came early in the morning because they felt with justifiable pride—that their clothes were a little too shabby, a little less attractive than the clothes of others who came later in the day.

Neediest Get the Jobs

"Those who want jobs the worst, those who have sought work the hardest, come early," said the woman-in-charge. "Those who feel they ought to get a job, get things ironed out at home, then dress up in their best and come sauntering in after noon."

"But we interview each one. We talk to them, we consider each case, and those who get work are those who need it most."

"The cases are pathetic and amazing. We have one woman working here today who has a Ph.D. degree from Cambridge University, in England. She ought to be able to get a university professor's job. But she can't get work at all. She is a fine, intelligent woman with ability to speak several languages. She came in here willing to do anything, rather than do nothing."

X-Ray Specialist Glad to Work

"We had a woman in here today who was an X-ray specialist during the war, who had newspaper clippings to prove her record. But time passed her by and she has nothing. All she wants now is just the opportunity to do something—anything, rather than loaf."

"We put her to work sorting out blanks, doing the simplest mental task. And, as far as she is concerned, it might well have been a responsible position in the finest hospital in the world. Tonight, she said she was happy, working with young girls who never in the world had the advantages of education and experience which have been hers."

ANNE PAGE MOBILIZING ARMY OF WOMEN CENSUS TAKERS

But No Postage Stamps Were Given Director in Charge of Unemployment Survey

MRS. ANNE PAGE
Who knows unemployment from many angles—including the viewpoint of a jobless woman.

By DOROTHY G. WAYMAN

Anne Page was told to mobilize an army of 3000 Massachusetts women; but they forgot to give her postage stamps to send out her orders.

Postage stamps or no postage stamps, in a week she had 150 jobless women at work on the clerical preliminaries, and by the time red tape gets around to delivering the postage stamps, the whole 3000 will probably be out in the field at work.

Massachusetts Unemployed Census, they call it; but the name doesn't quite fit, because this job is going to put 3000 jobless women to work.

Right at the top they began, on that angle. Anne Page, herself, was out of a job when they made her director. With a 16-year-old daughter to support, you can imagine that Anne Page knows from her own heart the problems and feelings of other women out of a job.

Graduate of Radcliffe

Anne Page was appointed director of the Massachusetts Unemployment Census on account of the extensive training and experience that fitted her to organize the vast undertaking.

She was born in Brookline. After a year at Bryn Mawr, she came back to Radcliffe to finish her college work, majoring in economics. Her interest in working women has always been keen and sympathetic. She wrote her college thesis before graduation about the garment-workers' strike of 1913, on facts gathered from personal observation.

She has been connected with the United States Department of Labor, investigating labor costs. She was secretary of a New York State commission studying re-organization of government departments.

Two weeks ago the Massachusetts Commissioner of labor and industries, Edwin S. Smith, appointed Anne Page to organize the so-called Unemployment census.

Work That Women Can Do

The first thing that has come home

does not know the office address of her local committee, she should inquire at the City or Town Hall, as the case may be, for information. "There is no politics or prejudice in these appointments," says Mrs. Page. "The only two qualifications are need of a job and general intelligence."

One for Each 1500 Persons

It is estimated that a total of 3000 Massachusetts women will be given employment through the Unemployment Census. The work is to be distributed according to the lines surveyed in the 1930 Federal Census.

That means that the State is broken up into plots containing 1500 inhabitants; and to each 1500-odd area, one woman enumerator is to be appointed. The local committees will try to appoint women who live right in the area they are to survey, in order to save the women enumerators carfare and lunch expense during their work.

The women will work one week, with a minimum of one week.

Women, traditionally, are asked questions. They are asked questions about the census, but all information held confidential.

The more freely the public cooperates in furnishing the information, the more helpful the results of the census will be. The replies are tabulated.

Questions Regarding Family

One set of questions concerns the family—how many, ages, sex, and whether the home is owned or rented.

Then comes employment. The census is sub-divided into three groups of work? On Welfare? On C. W. A. or C. C. C. or P. W. A. Has the woman a temporary job during this regular occupation? This last point is expected to be a future employment very near the future, ascertain whether a number of painters are unemployed, or whether at temporary stop-gap jobs, in certain district, for example, produce influence location of some new public works project later.

Another group of questions tended to throw light on the lives of boys and girls from 14 to 17, owing to hard times, are now absorbed into industry. The need to know whether the children are keeping on with high school or other forms of education, whether they have adequate facilities to keep them from drifting into gang activities or trouble.

Women Job-Seekers Storm Unemployment Census Office

300 Here Ask Positions as Enumerators or Clerks—Canvass Expected to Begin Latter Part of This Week

Planned originally to get under way yesterday, the work of taking an unemployment census in Massachusetts has been deferred for several days, due not only to the difficulty of completing preliminary arrangements at short notice, but also because of a flood of applications from women and girls seeking jobs as census enumerators and clerical workers.

At unemployment census headquarters, 169 Congress street, it was said yesterday that the press of applications for jobs, made both in person and by mail, had made heavy demands on the time of the office personnel, adding greatly to the normal difficulties of effecting a state-wide organization and completing a vast amount of preliminary details in the short time allowed. While unable to set a specific date for the start of the house-to-house canvass, Mrs. Anne Page, director of the census, is now hopeful that it can be made by the latter part of this week. Mrs. Page received her appointment only last week.

The task, planned as a CWA project, will be carried out exclusively by women and girls and will provide jobs for about 3000 throughout the state. More than 10,000 have already applied. The rate of pay is to be $18 a week and it is expected that the field work and the tabulation of the data will take about six weeks.

Applied at the Congress street office yesterday for jobs as census takers in the Boston area. They included many professional women and college graduates, and girls who formerly held responsible positions with business firms. Many of them, like numerous others who have sent applications by mail, related appealing stories of need, involving in many cases the necessity of supporting children, and in some cases a husband, also, when the latter has been unable to find employment over a long period of time.

Under the CWA regulations, all appointments to these and other jobs are made by the local federal employment offices from the lists of registered applicants. Such employment offices have been established for nearly every city and town, the Boston one being at 100 Nashua street. In the case of Boston alone, appointments to the census work are subject to approval by officials of the unemployment census staff, as it is felt desirable to establish certain minimum requirements of fitness for the work.

Although many of the women and girls who stormed the census office yesterday in quest of work had not been registered at the Nashua street office, all were interviewed and their experience and qualifications noted. Those who have not registered were advised to do so at their local employment office, whether in Boston or elsewhere.

The great majority of the applicants had been sent by the Nashua street office, and their arrival during a comparatively short space of time so taxed the facilities of the census headquarters that work was hurriedly relayed to Nashua street to refrain from sending any more applicants for the time being.

Although no appointments as census takers were made yesterday, about 100 were engaged for clerical work preliminary to the actual house-to-house canvass. The 310 census takers to be employed in Boston will be notified of their appointments later in the week.

300 WOMEN SEEK C. W. A. CENSUS JOBS

Many From Out of Town
Sent Home to Register

Although about 300 women reported for registration at 169 Congress street, yesterday, seeking to be among those employed in taking the State wide unemployment census, many more women from cities and towns outside of Boston were disappointed at not being allowed to register here and were told that local C. W. A. administrators for women were the proper persons to see concerning registration.

The 3000 women who will eventually be employed in taking this census will be gathered from registration lists to be submitted by the local administrators throughout the State.

Most of these lists are made up now but it is not too late for women to register as delay in getting the work started has come about through lack of proper charts designating the quota of women to be assigned for each locality.

Not only will unemployment be considered in taking this census, but statistics will be gathered on such problems as school graduates unemployed and effects of the depression on health.

PROVINCETOWN ARTISTS ENROLL FOR C. W. A. JOBS

PROVINCETOWN, Jan. 2—Artists of Provincetown, seeking employment under the C. W. A. art project enrolled today at the local Postoffice for work in the Postoffice and lower Cape Coast Guard stations. Headquarters for artists of Cape Cod have been established here under the supervision of Richard E. Miller, N. A., internationally known artist, and Mrs. Harold Haven Brown, director of the Provincetown Art Association. The new England headquarters of the art project at Worcester today authorized the hiring of seven needy young artists of Provincetown for work here. Assurance has been given that all other local artists in need of help will be given work shortly.

The exact type of work to be done will be decided within a few days. All activities of the art project of the Cape will be directed from Provincetown.

Besides working on Government buildings the artists will be engaged for art work in public schools and town halls on the Cape.

POSTS IN C. W. A. SOLD, IS CHARGE

Gov Ely Hears Charges
Made by Women

Representatives of the Massachusetts Women's Political Club told Gov Joseph B. Ely at the State House yesterday that positions in the Civil Works organization had been sold and that discrimination had been used in appointing directors of the work at various places in the State. The Governor said he would investigate their charges, and, if they proved to be true, would discharge the persons responsible for the misconduct.

It transpired that the Federal Government has assigned two investigators who are now at work here examining the evidence that politics had been played in the administration of the Civil Works projects.

About 50 women went to the State House yesterday, but a small committee conferred with the Governor, Miss Florence Birmingham, president of the club, headed the delegation. With her were Mrs. Catherine F. Griffin and Mrs. Mary F. Rooney of Salem, Mrs. Helen O'Connor of Brighton, Mrs. Florence McShone of Roxbury and Martin J. Barrett of Brighton.

Miss Birmingham alleged that Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, head of the Women's Civil Works Administration in Massachusetts, and Mrs. Anne Page, who is in charge of the State unemployment census, had been using political tactics. Miss Birmingham charged, in particular, that Republicans had been preferred in the placement work in and near Salem. The Governor said that of course there should be no politics in administration of Civil Works projects and the State would cooperate with the Federal investigators in their efforts to learn whether anything improper had been done.

To Survey Bay State Historic Buildings

Washington, Jan. 4 (A.P.)—Appointment of thirty-nine district officers to supervise locally the survey of historic buildings approved by the Civil Works Administration was announced today by Secretary Ickes, who said those wishing to recommend the survey of specific historic buildings should make their requests direct to officers of the districts. The purpose of the program is to gain information about historic buildings in all localities.

The designated districts for the Northeast, appointed district officers and the personnel they will have in their offices follows:

- Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont—John B. Stevens, Portland, Me., 37.
- Massachusetts—Frank C. Brown, 37.
- Connecticut, Rhode Island—H. H. Davis, New Haven, 30.
- Southern New York—William D. Foster, 25 West 45th street, New York, 55.
- Northern New York—N. R. Sturges, Albany, 53.
- New Jersey—Wilson C. Ely, Newark, 35.
- Eastern Pennsylvania—B. P. Bissell, Philadelphia, 42.
- Western Pennsylvania—Charles M. Stutz, Pittsburgh, 41.
- Delaware, Eastern Shore of Maryland—A. H. Kruse, Wilmington, 20.

One for Each 1500 Persons
It is estimated that a total of 3000 Massachusetts women will be given employment through the Unemployment Census. The work is to be distributed according to the lines surveyed in the 1930 Federal Census.

That means that the State is broken up into plots containing 1500 inhabitants, and to each 1500-soul area, one woman enumerator is to be appointed. The local committees will try to appoint women who live right in the area they are to survey, in order to save the women enumerators carfare and lunch expense during their work.

The women will work a minimum of one week, with a minimum of 10 hours a week.

Women, traditionally, are asked to ask questions. They are asked to ask questions to the census, but all information is held confidential.

Gov Ely Hears Charges Made by Women

Representatives of the Massachusetts Women's Political Club told Gov Joseph B. Ely at the State House yesterday that positions in the Civil Works organization had been sold and that discrimination had been used in appointing directors of the work at various places in the State. The Governor said he would investigate their charges, and, if they proved to be true, would discharge the persons responsible for the misconduct.

It transpired that the Federal Government has assigned two investigators who are now at work here examining the evidence that politics had been played in the administration of the Civil Works projects.

About 50 women went to the State House yesterday, but a small committee conferred with the Governor. Miss Florence Birmingham, president of the club, headed the delegation. With her were Mrs. Catherine F. Griffin and Mrs. Mary F. Rooney of Salem, Mrs. Helen O'Connor of Brighton, Mrs. Florence McShone of Roxbury and Martin J. Barrett of Brighton.

Miss Birmingham alleged that Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, head of the Women's Civil Works Administration in Massachusetts, and Mrs. Anne Page, who is in charge of the State unemployment census, had been using political tactics. Miss Birmingham charged, in particular, that Republicans had been preferred in the placement work in and near Salem. The Governor said that of course there should be no politics in administration of Civil Works projects, and the State would cooperate with the Federal investigators in their efforts to learn whether anything improper had been done.

PROVINCETOWN ARTISTS ENROLL FOR C. W. A. JOBS

PROVINCETOWN, Jan. 2—Artists of Provincetown, seeking employment under the C. W. A. art project enrolled today at the local Postoffice and lower work in the Postoffice and lower Cape Coast Guard stations. Headquarters for artists of Cape Cod have been established here under the supervision of Richard E. Miller, N. A., internationally known artist, and Mrs. Harold Haven Brown, director of the Provincetown Art Association, of New England headquarters of the art project at Worcester today authorized the hiring of seven needy young artists of Provincetown for work here. Assurance has been given that all other local artists in need of help will be given work shortly.

The exact type of work to be done will be decided within a few days. All activities of the art project of the Cape will be directed from Provincetown.

Besides working on Government buildings the artists will be engaged for art work in public schools and town halls on the Cape.

WOMEN SEEK CWA JOBS

Part of the line of women who registered yesterday for positions in the CWA.

More than 1000 women have applied to date to the unemployment office of the Civil Works Administration on Congress street. More than 200 of the women will go to work Friday, taking an unemployment census throughout the State at $18 a week or more.

Yesterday those of the 200 who are hardest hit by conditions started in to earn money, some for the first time in four years.

They came in long lines, young women, middle-aged women, old women.

Eagerly Willing to Work

"I haven't worked for a year—for two years—for four years—for so long that I can't take care of my husband, or my little babies," is what they told the women who heard them, who selected them from the line who humbly applied for "something—anything in the way of honest work."

Most of them looked like women who needed little. To the experienced masculine eye, it seemed they were all well dressed.

Yet a woman who worked with them revealed that there were those who stayed away, those who came early in the morning, because they felt—with the justifiable pride—that their clothes were a little too shabby, a little less attractive than the clothes of others who came later in the day.

Neediest Get the Jobs

"Those who want jobs the hardest, those who have sought the hardest, come early," said the woman-in-charge. "Those who feel they ought to get a job, get things lined out at home, then dress up in their best and come sauntering in after noon."

"But we interview each one. We talk to them, we consider each case, and those who get work are those who need it most."

"The cases are pathetic and amazing. We have one woman working here today who has a Ph.D. degree from Cambridge University, in England. She ought to be able to get a university professor's job. But she can't get work at all. She is a fine, intelligent woman with ability to speak several languages. She came in here willing to do anything, rather than do nothing."

X-Ray Specialist Glad to Work

"She taught school in Switzerland. Presumably, she could teach most subjects anywhere in the world. But she has been unable for years to get a job of any sort."

"We had a woman in here today who was an X-ray specialist during the war, who had newspaper clippings to prove her record. But time passed her by and she has nothing. All she wants now is just the opportunity to do something—anything, rather than do nothing."

"We put her to work sorting out blanks, doing the simplest mental task. And, as far as she is concerned, it might well have been a responsible position in the finest hospital in the world. Tonight, she said she was happy, working with young girls who never in the world had the advantages of education and experience which have been hers."

Nothing to Eat for Weeks

"Another woman came in here this morning whose appearance was so striking as to cause general comment. She is all of 60 years old and handsome. Her hair is silver and her general deportment is such that you feel right away she must have lived a serene, happy life."

"And do you know what that woman told us, when she applied for any sort of work we might have? She told us she hadn't eaten regularly for several weeks! She told us she was the widow of a minister who happened to have an invested unwisely in the course of a sane, regular life. There was nothing left, she discovered, after he died, and she couldn't find anything to work at."

"Three times, she told us, she came here looking for work. And each time she saw little girls whose clothes seemed shabby from long wear. And each time she felt that possibly they might resent it if she applied for a job from us."

Her clothes, she told us, were made over gifts from her husband's parishioners. Her skill, her ability to use a sewing machine, made it possible for her to put those gifts together so that the dresses she has from someone else look as though they were made for her."

"Will You Please Give Us Work?"

"One of the girls accepting people said today: 'I must take care of this case. Here's a woman who hasn't even had breakfast?' And do you know what several others told her, all at once? They told her—'What do you mean breakfast?—why, we've had woman after woman who hasn't had a substantial meal for four or five days!'"

"And that's the way it goes. They don't quibble. They don't argue. They don't ask how hard the work will be, or what the nature of the work will be. All they ask, with a sincerity that is heart-rending, is, 'Will you please give us work—any work?'"

Fine Intelligent Women

"They're young women and middle-aged women and old women. But they all have the same idea, and the same request. Some of them, many of them, have families. Many have children. But all they want is work."

"They're women who would appear to have means. If you met them on the street, but they'll show you records where they haven't worked for months. They'll show you where their homes have had no income for months."

"They're sincere, and they're intelligent. Any kind of work is acceptable. College degrees mean nothing. Disvious experience means nothing, they want to work.

"We try to be fair. We try to what we have only to those who it most."

"We feel we may make mistakes, but nothing we make in the way of mistakes can compare with the mistakes this project has done."

"Friday, we hope, we will start taking a census with these women, hoping that those whom they visit receive them properly."

Who knows unemployment from many angles—including the viewpoint of a jobless woman.

By DOROTHY G. WAYMAN

Anne Page was told to mobilize an army of 3000 Massachusetts women; but they forgot to give her postage stamps to send out the orders.

Postage stamps or no postage stamps, in a week she had 150 jobless women at work on the clerical preliminaries, and by the time red tape gets around to delivering the postage stamps, the whole 3000 will probably be out in the field at work.

Massachusetts Unemployed Census, they call it; but the name doesn't quite fit, because this job is going to put 3000 jobless women to work.

Right at the top they began, on that angle. Anne Page, herself, was out of a job when they made her director. With a 16-year-old daughter to support, you can imagine that Anne Page knows from her own heart the problems and feelings of other women out of a job.

Graduate of Radcliffe

Anne Page was appointed director of the Massachusetts Unemployment Census on account of the extensive training and experience that fitted her to organize the vast undertaking.

She was born in Brookline. After a year at Bryn Mawr, she came back to Radcliffe to finish her college work, majoring in economics. Her interest in working women has always been keen and sympathetic. She wrote her college thesis before graduation about the garment-workers' strike of 1913, on facts gathered from personal observation.

She has been connected with the United States Department of Labor, investigating labor costs. She was secretary of a New York State commission studying re-organization of government departments.

Two weeks ago the Massachusetts Commissioner of Labor and Industries, Edwin S. Smith, appointed Anne Page to organize the so-called Unemployment census.

Work That Women Can Do

The first thing that has come home to Anne Page in the job is the tremendous need of some such work—that women can do.

"It would break your heart to see the straits to which some of the women who come to us are reduced," she says soberly.

One girl, just as an example, on that cold Friday last week, with the thermometer at 17 below zero, started at half-past six in the morning and walked in from Dorchester to apply for a job—walked in because she had no car fare.

The thing Anne Page is anxious to make plain to women all over Massachusetts who need jobs is that the jobs will be given out right in their own home towns.

Women should not start for Boston, hoping to get a job through a personal interview with Mrs. Page. She does not make the appointments of enumerators for this census which she is directing.

The appointments, in each district of the State, will be made by the local Civil Works Administration Re-Employment committee. If a woman does not know the office address of her local committee, she should inquire at the City or Town Hall, as the case may be, for information.

"There is no politics or prejudice in these appointments," says Mrs. Page. "The only two qualifications are need of a job and general intelligence."

One for Each 1500 Persons

It is estimated that a total of 3000 Massachusetts women will be given employment through the Unemployment Census. The work is to be distributed according to the lines surveyed in the 1930 Federal Census.

That means that the State is broken up into plots containing 1500 inhabitants; and to each 1500-soul area, one woman enumerator is to be appointed. The local committees will try to appoint women who live right in the area they are to survey, in order to save the women enumerators carfare and lunch expense during their work.

The women will work a week, with a minimum pay of $18 a week.

Women, traditionally, are asked asking questions. They are asked plenty of questions to see if they are suitable, but all information to be held confidential.

The more freely the women enumerate in furnishing the information, the more helpful will be the results of the census which the replies are tabulated.

Questions Regarding Families

One set of questions concerns families—how many, ages, whether the home is owned or rented.

Then come employment questions. The woman is asked whether she is a winner of the family welfare work of Work? On Welfare, C. W. A. or C. C. C. or P. W. A. Has she any temporary job district? Is her regular occupation?

This last point is expected to be future employment very near. To ascertain whether a number of enumerators are unemployed, or working at temporary stop-gap jobs, in a certain district, for example, a woman's fluence location of some new public works project later.

Another group of questions is intended to throw light on the lives of boys and girls from 14 to 18, owing to hard times, are not being absorbed into industry. Officials need to know whether these children are keeping on with high school or other forms of education, and whether they have adequate recreation facilities to keep them from drifting into gang activities and trouble.

Other Questions On Health

Boston's Health department has arranged for a special project to be carried out in Boston by the enumerators, in a set of questions about health. Boston people will be asked to list all the illnesses any of their family have suffered within the last six months and to tell whether they had a doctor, were treated at home, at a clinic or in a hospital. The facts gleaned from these answers will aid authorities in providing needed health measures in Boston.

The project has the approval not only of Washington but of the State department of labor and industry, and it is going to give much-needed employment to 3,000 jobless Massachusetts women.

So when the census lady comes around to your house, and starts asking questions, don't be afraid to cooperate fully by furnishing the information requested. The answers will be held confidential and the results will help everybody.

300 WOMEN SEEK C. W. A. CENSUS JOBS

Many From Out of Town Sent Home to Register

Although about 300 women reported for registration at 169 Congress st. yesterday, seeking to be among those employed in taking the State wide unemployment census, many more women from cities and towns outside of Boston were disappointed at not being allowed to register here and were told that local C. W. A. administrators for women were the proper persons to see concerning registration.

The 300 women who will eventually be employed in taking this census will be gathered from registration lists to be submitted by the local administrators throughout the State.

Most of these lists are made up new but it is not too late for women to register as delay in getting the work started has come about through lack of proper charts designating the quota of women to be assigned for each locality.

Not only will unemployment be considered in taking this census, but statistics will be gathered on such problems as school graduates unemployed and effects of the depression on health.

Investigators Go to Fall River for Inquiry

The last witness to be questioned Everett yesterday was Mayor James Roche. Mayor Roche was before the investigating board for several minutes.

Mrs. O'Connor while Miss Birmingham was describing Mrs. O'Connor's situation to newspapermen.

The fifth member of the group which was seen by the Governor was Mrs. Mary P. Rooney of Salem. All the women were described by Miss Birmingham as "living examples of the alleged abuses of which they complain."

The next incident which provoked Mrs. DeWolfe was caused by the press of the 100 women and 10 men at the entrance to the Governor's chamber, which, combined with the unusually heavy number of persons attending from the start of the legislative session, and the newspapermen and photographers made passage nearly impossible.

"Now ladies," said Mr. DeWolf, "I've been as courteous as possible. You wouldn't want me to call the police would you?"

"If you did," retorted Miss Birmingham, "it'd be in keeping in general with the way the women have been treated in this thing." Mr. DeWolf subsequently apologized for his remark that the police might have been necessary.

In announcing that the matter was under federal investigation, Gov. El said:

Miss Birmingham, and her committee claim that Mrs. Rantoul and her appointees in certain parts of the state, particularly in Salem and Peabody, are playing politics with CWA employment; that they are Republican women and are filling the places with Republicans and marching in with troops of their own supporters. The federal government has sent two investigators here to make a complete report in regard to the matter. If the charges are substantiated the women ought to be fired, discharged, removed, or whatever the term is, because there should be no politics in the CWA program.

They are all looking down at their papers or books, appearing to be in a classroom or study environment. The women are dressed in mid-20th-century attire, including sweaters, blouses, and skirts. The background is slightly out of focus, showing what might be a chalkboard or a wall.

With new jobs and reawakened hopes, dozens of women and girls were put to work at once yesterday counting census blanks at 169 Congress street, getting ready for the census of the State's unemployed, a CWA emergency project.

Feels CWA Leaders Should Be Fired if Charges Proven

Declaring last night that "there should be no politics in the Civil Works programme," Governor Elwell said that if the charges made by a group of women calling on him yesterday in regard to Mrs. Lois L. Rantoul, director of CWA projects for women, and Mrs. Annie Page, recently appointed head of the unemployment census, are substantiated the women ought to be discharged.

Asked if they will be discharged, Governor Ely replied: "If these charges are substantiated, the will be, at a federal matter, not a State matter, and I will not express any opinion as to the accuracy of the charges. I think I'll let the two federal investigators do the work. The federal investigators are in the federal agency organized for just this purpose. They are appointed right from Washington, and we will help them to find out the facts."

The women assembled in the Hall of Flags in the State House, and after waiting for some time finally marched up the stairs to the Governor's lobby. There they were received by De Wolf C. DeWolf, secretary to the Governor, who asked them to step out for a time that a passageway might be made to

At the office of the CWA at 162 Congress street, a dozen women started work yesterday preparing for the census to start in a few days to determine the number of unemployed in the State. More than 2000 women will be used in this work, with a minimum pay of $ a week.

The Congress street office is for residents of Boston only. Women living outside Boston should apply to the local CWA office or to the town hall or city hall for the unemployment census work.

Favoritism Charged—State Board Closes Cambridge, Everett Investigation

An investigation of charges of favoritism in distributing civil works jobs in Fall River was launched last night by the Massachusetts civil works administration after the board had completed investigations into charges of grafting in Everett, and of friction among CWA officials in Cambridge.

Two inspectors from the investigating unit of the CWA will arrive in Fall River today to learn the reasons why David L. Gourse, a prominent businessman who is chairman of the public welfare department of the city, resigned his post as civil works administrator for Fall River.

Gourse resigned in a letter to Bartlett in which he indicated that there was friction between himself and John J. Shea, federal re-employment office in Fall River.

When told that CWA inspectors would visit Fall River to obtain information regarding his charge of "rampant favoritism," Gourse replied that he would "gladly prove all the charges." Shea, too, said he would co-operate with the inspectors and provide all information desired. Bartlett has asked Gourse to name a successor, but Gourse is reluctant to do so.

Charges of favoritism, interference and fraud were bruited about in Cambridge as the result of differences between Charles J. McMenimen, CW administrator for Cambridge, and John M. Kirk, in charge of the federal employment office in Cambridge.

Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the CWA board, conferred at length with both men. Bartlett told McCormick he had no right to discharge a worker except when the man was unable to do the work. He explained to Kirk that if a man in making out his registration made a false statement the worker's certificate could be withdrawn, and, automatically, the man be discharged.

McMenimen explained that he felt that when he knew a man had no dependents he felt the man should have a job, and also believed he had the right to use of his knowledge, to inform Kirk, and the re-employment officer, should co-operate. Kirk asserted that he had rated men on their need and sent them in response to requisition orders on that basis. Both men agreed to co-operate in the future.

Former Gov. Fuller sent a letter of protest to Secretary Ickes, the administrator, Dec. 23, in which he pointed out that although nearly $16,000,000 had been approved and allocated to the commonwealth and Massachusetts cities and towns for many weeks, not one cent of actual money had been received in this state.

Secretary Ickes in his letter, explained that he had ordered an immediate investigation, and specifically ordered the legal division of the PWA, in which bond contracts for Massachusetts projects languished, to make effort to get the contracts out. With the letter came a memorandum from E. H. Foley Jr., assistant general counsel of the PWA, in which it was promised that 10 contracts a day would be sent to

One of the first results of the Fuller letter was the sending of $13,000 to Salem for a project which had been approved a long time, so long, in fact, that the city had completed the project and was waiting for the federal government to make good its share. Nothing was mentioned concerning the $5,650,000 in PWA projects sponsored by Boston which are being checked a

A loan and grant of $115,000 to Newton, was for extensions to sanitary sewer system to serve an unserved area and an extension to existing outfall sewer.

HISTORIC BUILDINGS SURVEY HEADS PICKED

F. C. Brown in Charge of Bay State District

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 (A. P.).—Appointment of 39 district officers to supervise locally the survey of historic buildings approved by the Civil Works Administration was announced today by Secretary Ickes.

At the same time Ickes said those wishing to recommend the survey of specific historic buildings should make their requests direct to officers of the districts.

The purpose of the program is to gain information about historic buildings in all localities.

The designated districts for New England, appointed district officers and the personnel they will have in their offices follow:

Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont—John H. Stevens, Portland, Me. 37
Massachusetts—Frank C. Brown, Boston, 37.

Connecticut, Rhode Island—H. H. Davis, New Haven, 30.

Southern New York—William D. Foster, 25 West 45th st., New York, 53.

Northern New York—N. R. Sturgis, Albany, 53.

New Jersey—Wilson C. Ziv, Newark, 35.

Eastern Pennsylvania—E. P. Bissell, Philadelphia, 42.

Western Pennsylvania—Charles M. Stolz, Pittsburgh, 41.

Delaware, Eastern Shore of Maryland—Albert Kruse, Wilmington, 20.

Frank Chouteau Brown of 9 Mt. Vernon sq., Boston, is the man who is to supervise locally the survey of historic buildings approved yesterday by Secretary Ickes as part of the Civil Works Administration program.

Twelve hundred men, most of whom will be trained architects, will be engaged throughout the country for this task, and of these, 37 are to be employed in Massachusetts under Mr. Brown. An office has already been opened at room 643, 141 Milk st., and several men are already at work.

The work of the survey will call mostly for the taking of complete measurements of historic structures of all kinds in the Commonwealth. Old houses, old bridges, old mills and old public buildings will be recorded in every dimension for the information of posterity. Those buildings most in danger of demolition will be measured up first, so no more valuable landmarks will be hopelessly lost.

Mr. Brown came to Boston from Minneapolis. He has been interested in the theatre, both as critic and designer of stage settings, and for nearly 17 years he has been editor of the Architectural Review. He is 57 and married. He has a unique Summer home at Marblehead Neck.

BIG CWA PROJECTS TO START

Fuller Is So Notified
by Secretary
Ickes

A promise of prompt action in speeding up the public works program for Massachusetts was received by former Governor Alvan T. Fuller, chairman of the Federal Advisory Board for this State, from Harold Ickes, federal emergency administrator at Washington, last night.

BEGIN TO SIGN CONTRACTS
Since Fuller forwarded his protest against delay to Secretary Ickes a week ago, contracts for 20 Massachusetts projects have been signed, and according to word from the law department of the federal administration, they will come along hereafter at the rate of 10 a day.

Although the various Massachusetts boards and the Governor have approved certain projects months ago, and one contract had been signed in Washington up to the time of the Fuller protest, sent forward on Dec. 22.

Under the public works program, these projects are to be constructed with funds, 20 per cent of which are contributed by the federal government as gifts, and the balance of 80 per cent is loaned by the federal government.

Three more projects, to cost an aggregate of $362,700, were approved by Governor Ely yesterday in recommendation of the State Emergency Planning Board. These called for the construction of two bridges and approach roads across Bass River between Yarmouth and Dennis, at a cost of $150,000, and facing of the State highway on Route 122A between Rutland and Holden, at cost $187,000, and reconstruction of a highway in Bradford square, in Randolph, to Braintree Five Cents Hub, 700.

These projects will now have to go to Washington for approval.

Under the public works program, these projects are to be constructed with funds, 20 per cent of which are contributed by the federal government as gifts, and the balance of 80 per cent is loaned by the federal government.

Three more projects, to cost an aggregate of $362,700, were approved by Governor Ely yesterday in recommendation of the State Emergency Planning Board. These called for the construction of two bridges and approach roads across Bass River between Yarmouth and Dennis, at a cost of $150,000, and facing of the State highway on Route 122A between Rutland and Holden, at cost $187,000, and reconstruction of a highway in Bradford square, in Randolph, to Braintree Five Cents Hub, 700.

These projects will now have to go to Washington for approval.

Some may have quit more arduous and less remunerative jobs to get on the CWA 30-hour week, for which the average pay is $1 an hour. This group would probably conceal their former employment, and may create a problem for investigation.

Some may have come from homes in which other members of the family were receiving welfare relief. This group raises the problem of re-examination of certain welfare cases to determine to what extent family burdens have been alleviated by CWA employment.

Horace W. Nelson, supervisor for the overseers of the public welfare, whose services have been borrowed from the city by the federal government to direct the federal re-employment project, said last night that the city of Boston reached its quota of employment, about two weeks ago and has been operating, except for negligible allowances for replacements, or for unprepared projects, at top speed ever since.

Except for the work furnished by Mr. Nelson and part-time supervision by Walter V. McCarthy executive director of public welfare, no welfare department employees are now engaged on the administration of the CWA, whose administrative personnel is now complete, he said. The welfare department is now sufficiently abreast of its work to handle the 50 social workers who are to be engaged to examine its methods.

STATE CHAIRMAN IN CRITICAL MOOD

Bartlett Thinks City Officials Missed Chance to Aid Taxpayers

By EDWARD ALLEN

Although the civil works administration is spending $446,872 a week in Boston and has put 15,827 persons back to work in the city, the public welfare expenditures for December were $50,832 over those of the same month a year ago.

At least three-fourths of those re-employed were not on the city's welfare list, who the CWA program was first announced.

While 6827 of these persons have been transferred from the welfare and soldiers' relief lists, the saving is partially offset by an "intake" of 3808 new applicants and reapplicants admitted to the welfare rolls in November and December after the $4,925,598.32 CWA program was announced.

Joseph W. Bartlett, state CWA chairman, last night declared the Boston officials had not made the fullest possible use of their chance to reduce welfare expenditures.

EXPECTED 50 P. C. MINIMUM
"I should think that as a minimum they would have taken 50 per cent. of the workers from the welfare list," he said. "Some municipalities virtually wiped out their welfare lists when the CWA was started."

"It was never intended that civil works jobs would be filled from persons applying for welfare aid after Nov. 16. Those persons should have been sent to register for CWA jobs and not have been placed on the welfare rolls."

Not all of the 3808 applicants added to the rolls in November and December were scrambling for CWA jobs. Many were after mothers' aid, old age assistance, or regular dependent aid. However, the net reduction in the number of unemployed on the city relief rolls has been only 2620, or about 18 per cent, of the 14,021 listed as unemployed in the peak week ending Dec. 1. About half of the 29,935 aid recipients of all classes are listed as "unemployed."

Complaints that men working on park department projects had not been paid for last week's work caused Chairman Bartlett to telephone Mayor Mansfield yesterday. Deputy City Treasurer Arthur F. Swan told Mansfield that the municipal CWA disbursement unit was working overtime last night to finish the checks. At the CWA paymaster's office, it was said that the personnel had caught up with its work and was "clean with the slate" last night.

STAMPS HOLD UP CENSUS

3000 Women Wait on Red Tape—Will Get $18 a Month

Some of the red tape which has impeded the progress of the CWA's unemployment census was severed yesterday, and as a result the 3000 women who are to get jobs on the project will get $18 a week minimum instead of $15.

NO MONEY FOR STAMPS

But the project is still held up, and the women are still kept waiting, simply because other red tape is still preventing the issue of enough stamps to notify the selected women that it's time to go to work.

The entire business is being operated out of Boston. Because of lack of funds and time it was decided that the mail would be used to notify all workers of the start of work.

But no money has been appropriated for stamps by the government; so no letters can be sent out.

Under Temporary Clause

Prior to raising the amount of the total appropriation for the work—making the lowest week's pay $18 a week instead of $15—the letters couldn't have been sent out anyway. That was the first red tape that had to be cut to get the project underway.

But the stamp money hasn't come along, and the director of the project, Mrs. Anne Page, hasn't yet been able to get a franking privilege.

Under the rules of the Postoffice Department, no temporary government employee is supposed to get the franking privilege. The unemployment census is a temporary project, so Mrs. Page is a temporary employee.

Meanwhile 3000 Wait

That she will eventually get the franking privilege to carry out this government work is assured. But because of the clutter of red tape there is no way of telling whether it will be in ten more days, or a week.

Meanwhile, most of the 3000 women selected throughout the State to do the work are waiting.

Bishop Cannon took exception to a statement by Dr. Steward, a Chicagoan, that "the old dry leadership" had failed. The dry groups after the tilt was over formed "The National Temperance and Prohibition Council," announced acceptance of the repeal verdict, but said the liquor issue in politics had not been repealed. They then elected officers and called a meeting of the council here March 9-10 to map out its policy and plan of campaign.

Leahy, chairman of the Cambridge election commission.

A heavy truck, parked in the garage close to the tank, prevented more serious injuries to the men. In addition to the many windows broken at the large workshop, several windows were broken in surrounding buildings. A small fire which started around the pump was extinguished with chemicals by employees.

The dinner was attended by about 60 of his former office associates, who presented him with a desk lamp and set. George Morley, division superintendent; Thomas Cochran, district manager; Leonard Morrissey, commercial superintendent; and Roger Ather-ton, district manager, were present as guests. Richard Davis, who is to succeed Nelson, was welcomed by his new staff.

HISTORIC BUILDINGS SURVEY HEADS PICKED

F. C. Brown in Charge of Bay State District

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 (A. P.).—Appointment of 39 district officers to supervise locally the survey of historic buildings approved by the Civil Works Administration was announced today by Secretary Ickes.

At the same time Ickes said those wishing to recommend the survey of specific historic buildings should make their requests direct to officers of the districts.

The purpose of the program is to gain information about historic buildings in all localities.

The designated districts for New England, appointed district officers and the personnel they will have in their offices follows:

Maine—New Hampshire, Vermont—John H. Stevens, Portland, Me. 37. Massachusetts—Frank C. Brown, Boston, 37.

Connecticut, Rhode Island—H. H. Davis, New Haven, 30.

Southern New York—William D. Foster, 25 West 45th st., New York, 53.

Northern New York—N. R. Sturgis, Albany, 53.

New Jersey—Wilson C. Ziv, Newark, 35.

Eastern Pennsylvania—E. P. Bissell, Philadelphia, 42.

Western Pennsylvania—Charles M. Stutz, Pittsburgh, 41.

Delaware, Eastern Shore of Maryland—Albert Kruse, Wilmington, 20.

Frank Chouteau Brown of 9 Mt. Vernon sq., Boston, is the man who is to supervise locally the survey of historic buildings approved yesterday by Secretary Ickes as part of the Civil Works Administration program.

Twelve hundred men, most of whom will be trained architects, will be engaged throughout the country for this task, and of these, 37 are to be employed in Massachusetts under Mr. Brown. An office has already been opened at room 643, 141 Milk st., and several men are already at work.

The work of the survey will call mostly for the taking of complete measurements of historic structures of all kinds in the Commonwealth. Old houses, old bridges, old mills and old public buildings will be recorded in every dimension for the information of posterity. Those buildings most in danger of demolition will be measured up first, so no more valuable landmarks will be hopelessly lost.

Mr. Brown came to Boston from Minneapolis. He has been interested in the theatre, both as critic and designer of stage settings, and for nearly 17 years he has been editor of the Architectural Review. He is 37 and married. He has a unique Summer home at Marblehead Neck.

Fuller Is So Notified by Secretary Ickes

A promise of prompt action in speeding up the public works programme for Massachusetts was received by former Governor Alvan T. Fuller, chairman of the Federal Advisory Board for this State, from Harold Ickes, federal emergency administrator at Washington, last night.

BEGIN TO SIGN CONTRACTS

Since Fuller forwarded his protest against delay to Secretary Ickes a week ago, contracts for 20 Massachusetts projects have been signed, and accord-from the C. W. A. funds and not from the Emergency Relief funds. My workers must be delegated from Federal Reemployment Agencies, just as the men, and misunderstanding has arisen as to where the women should apply for jobs." She added a plea that women register quickly if they desire an opportunity to obtain jobs and that they place their names on the proper lists in their own communities.

WON'T LET HUSBAND MIND BABY

Jobless Wives Full of Pride, Census Heads Learn

Boston jobless women have too much pride to let their husbands mind the baby or do the housework.

That amazing fact has been brought out in scores of cases in the last day or two at the office of the Boston Unemployment Census, a Civil Works Administration project which is putting 3000 women to work temporarily.

RETAIN THEIR PRIDE

And the women in question, it develops, are bearing hardship in order to retain their pride and that of their husbands.

Scores and scores of such women have been interviewed in the extension of the project, women with children at home and a husband out of work.

"Will your husband take care of your children while you are working, if you get this job?" they are asked.

And, in every single instance, according to interviewers, the women state that they have no arrangements to take care of the children and the housework.

No Work for a Man to Do

"I'm glad to be able to earn a little money, at last," one married woman told an interviewer. "I'm glad to be able to give my husband a little help. He hasn't had, so he can get a town and look for work."

"I don't expect my husband to work, or mind the children. One of the neighbors can do that. It's no work for a man."

Bake for Neighbor

Many are exchanging with neighbors who will take care of the children during the day while the mothers are taking the census, and getting $18 a week therefor.

One woman who received a job has made arrangements to do housework for a neighbor at night after she finishes her census work, in return for care of her children.

53 ALIENS LOSE CWA JOBS

False Statements Made by Waltham Applicants

After receiving a ruling from the CWA legal department, Waltham administrator, Martin J. Coleman, discharged 53 aliens yesterday. The decision made by the State authorities permitted the Waltham office to dismiss only those aliens who were placed by the national reemployment office. Other aliens given work through the city welfare department could not be displaced, the CWA solicitors stated. Many of the aliens who lost their jobs made false statements when applying for work, officials stated.

Boston jobless women have too much pride to let their husbands mind the baby or do the housework.

That amazing fact has been brought out in scores of cases in the last day or two at the offices of the Boston Unemployment Census, a Civil Works Administration project which is putting 3000 women to work temporarily.

RETAIN THEIR PRIDE

And the women in question develop, are hearing hardships and to retain their pride and that of their husbands.

Scores and scores of men who have been interviewed by the census takers of the project, women who, when at home and a husband out of work.

Winter Misses—Sums Worth a Hundred Dollars

CWA board member, will check the payroll methods to see if the work week can be more efficiently staggered and payments consequently speeded. He will write Col. Harry L. Hopkins, federal CWA administrator, for permission to make necessary changes. Mayor Mansfield promised Bartlett full co-operation and asked that any complaints be sent him for correction.

The net reduction in number of unemployed receiving aid from the welfare department plus the reduction of 1100 from the soldiers' relief list indicate that 12,080 of the 15,927 CWA and CWS workers, nearly 80 per cent., were at least nominally not receiving public relief prior to the CWA. Thus, it would appear that:

1—Some of them previously avoided charity by living on their savings or by living with relatives. This would include those who had been "hanging on" or "just getting by" but who applied for aid when they thought that they might thus be eligible for CWA jobs.

2—Some may have quit more arduous and less remunerative jobs to get on the CWA 30-hour work, for which the average pay is $1 an hour. This group could probably conceal their former employment, and may create a problem for investigation.

The December increase was $30,834 over December, 1932. Total December welfare expenditures of $1,171,637, were $186,000 less than the peak month of April when the city spent than in November. Part of the April excess properly belonged in the March figures, because of the bank holiday. March totals were $999,748.31.

In general, the figures show that the welfare department expenditures are about where they were at this time last year, but are now on the downward instead of the upward trend.

The way in which mounting applications for mothers' aid, old age assistance and regular dependent aid has reduced gains from federal employment is shown in the following comparative table of welfare cases:

TO PAY $60 A WEEK

CWA and CWS workers are now engaged in 89 projects in Boston. The top pay is $60 a week, which is being paid to 10 expert city planners, architects, and engineers on a huge project to chart a future program of needed public works. The minimum pay is $12 to women sewing welfare garments.

Unskilled laborers get $15 and skilled mechanics $36 a week. The average pay for all classes is about $1 an hour, $30 a week.

About 471 professional men, draftsmen, field workers, typists, clerks and messengers are at work on the planning project. There are 1485, including 1400 unskilled laborers, at work on 14 separate park department developments. There are 1200, of whom all but 200 are unskilled, on a public works department project for the repair and construction of 62 streets.

At the public library, six linotype operators are getting $37.50 a week, eight photographers, $37.50 a week, and other skilled workers are included among the 666 persons working on a cataloguing project in charge of experienced librarians.

LARGER PROJECTS

Among the larger projects are:

LAW DEPARTMENT—Typing and bringing up to date dockets, entries, investigations, pleadings in tax appeal cases.

ELECTION DEPARTMENT—Bringing records up to date and filing.

SCHOOL DEPARTMENT—Cataloguing school books, re-arranging supplies and stocks on shelves, painting buildings.

 REPAIR DEPARTMENT—Painting buildings. || POLICE DEPARTMENT—Painting buildings. |
| TRAFFIC COMMISSION—Painting traffic lines. |
| PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT—Painting six bridges; replacing the coal pocket with a recreation pier at the East Boston terminal of the North Ferry; laying out and installing drains in 70 streets. |
| PORT AUTHORITY—Surveying all property on waterfront to develop a waterfront zone. |
| PUBLIC LIBRARY—Remove, clean and replace 700,000 books; painting and restoration work at public libraries; catalogue art and architectural collections. |
| ART DEPARTMENT—Clean and wash statues and monuments. |
| ASSESSING DEPARTMENT—Preparation of a block survey for taxing relief. |
| PARK DEPARTMENT—Restoring and re-landscaping parks and playgrounds; cleaning up and beautifying. |
| BUILDING DEPARTMENT—Removal of dangerous, dilapidated and obsolete buildings. |
| BUDGET DEPARTMENT—Compilation of central personnel index. |
| ASSESSING DEPARTMENT—Compilation of real estate index. |
| STATISTICS DEPARTMENT—Compiling central card index by individuals. |
| TREASURY DEPARTMENT—Payment by check. |
| FRANKLIN PARK—Pruning and thinning |

STAMPS HOLD UP CENSUS

3000 Women Wait on Red Tape—Will Get $18 a Month

Some of the red tape which has impeded the progress of the CWA's unemployment census was severed yesterday, and as a result the 3000 women who are to get jobs on the project will get $18 a week minimum instead of $15.

NO MONEY FOR STAMPS

But the project is still held up, and the women are still kept waiting, simply because other red tape is still preventing the issue of annual stamps to certify the unemployed women that it's time to go to work.

The entire business is being operated out of Boston. Because of lack of funds and time it was decided that the post could be used to notify all workers of the start of work.

But no money has been appropriated for stamps by the government; so no letters can be sent out.

Under Temporary Clause

Prior to raising the amount of the total appropriation for the work—making the lowest week's pay $18 a week instead of $15—the letters couldn't have been sent out anyway. That was the first red tape that had to be cut to get the project underway.

But the stamp money hasn't come along, and the director of the project, Mrs. Anne Page, hasn't yet been able to get a franking privilege.

Under the rules of the Postoffice Department, no temporary government employee is supposed to get the franking privilege. The unemployment census is a temporary project, so Mrs. Page is a temporary employee.

Meanwhile 3000 Wait

That she will eventually get the franking privilege to carry out this government work is assured. But because of the clutter of red tape there is no way of telling whether it will be in two more days, or a week.

Meanwhile most of the 3000 women scattered throughout the State to do the work are a wait.

BARTLETT TELLS SELECTMEN C. W. A. WILL GO ON TILL APRIL

He Advises Them to Start Planning Projects Now—Ely and Saltonstall Address Meeting of State Association

Addressing the annual meeting of the Massachusetts Selectmen's Association in Gardner Auditorium of the State House yesterday afternoon, Joseph W. Bartlett, State Civil Works Administrator, said that the C. W. A. program scheduled to end Feb. 15 will be continued until April 15 and possibly May 1.

This, at least, was Mr. Bartlett's opinion, he said. In giving it he urged the Selectmen to begin planning additional jobs to be performed after Feb. 15.

No alarm should be felt by the people of this country about the deficit of the National Government, Speaker Leverett Saltonstall of the Massachusetts House told the Selectmen. "Our credit," he said, "is in good shape, and we are definitely making progress." He cited England, with a far greater national deficit, as an example of heavy debt without undue worry.

Early Filing Is Urged

He urged the Selectmen to file their Legislative proposals before Jan. 13. In this manner, the Speaker said, the town heads would assist in speedy Legislative action. He complimented the Selectmen on preventing an increase in town debt.

With the use of Federal funds by the Commonwealth and its cities and towns, there is need, Mr. Saltonstall declared, for the establishment of additional Federal bureaus, but, he said, "They should not be made permanent, particularly insofar as they relate to Massachusetts. I am a firm believer in home rule." I referring to the civil works program whereby part of the material costs are paid for by the municipalities, Mr. Bartlett said that while the local treasuries might have to be stretched, the cities and towns ought to extend their help in view of the fact that by far the major cost of the total expense is to be paid by the Federal Government.

In his opinion, more than 130,000 men and women have been given employment in civil works projects, with the financial outlay in wages and expenditures running between $25,000,000 and $30,000,000.

Projects Called Worthy

Mr. Bartlett declared that the projects which are being undertaken are worthy ones and will result in benefit to the cities and towns. More important, he said, is the assistance which will be extended to the unemployed, large numbers of whom have forgotten their discouragement, now that they are receiving a week's pay.

Continuing, Mr. Bartlett discussed the work of the State Emergency Finance Board, of which he is chairman. He said that 63 cities and towns throughout the State have availed themselves of the provisions of the $30,000,000 municipal borrowing bill of the 1933 Legislature and have used the loans in carrying through their welfare programs.

Reminding his hearers that municipalities which borrowed money from the State had placed themselves under State supervision in regard to additional appropriations, Mr. Bartlett said, "It is a dangerous power for the State to have. I have always been a believer in 'home rule' and have felt that the municipalities should take care of themselves.

"While we have a fairly friendly interest in the cities and towns coming before us for approval of increased appropriations, we also owe a duty to the State, and I want to tell you that we will not approve increased expenditures unless they are worthy ones. You cannot run over us and we will not, if we are to continue to exist, run over you."

Ely Speaks to Meeting

Gov. Joseph B. Ely addressed the opening session in the morning and declared that the "important contest" between prosperity and the Federal Government was to be "the race of the year." The outcome, said he, was the difference between prosperity and disaster.

Repeating thoughts contained in his annual message to the Legislature, Gov. Ely again urged the necessity of preserving the financial credit of the State and its cities and towns.

Continuing, the Governor told the Selectmen that tax receipts always run behind the increase in business conditions and, therefore, increased tax receipts will not appear until next year, in his opinion.

"You have got to practice the strictest economy this year if you are going to balance your town budgets," he warned his hearers.

The Governor referred to his recommendation in his message that, if possible, salary cuts of State employees be restored in part.

"In considering an increase in salaries," he went on, "you must weigh carefully the problem of the financial condition of your town. I want to make it plain that in announcing the policy of the State I do not say that it is the policy to be followed by your town, city or county Government. Preservation of credit is most essential."

York and Brackett Speak

Commissioner Samuel A. York of the State Department of Conservation told the meeting of the need of development of a real forest-park-beach system for Massachusetts. He said he knew of 20,000 acres that could be so developed and would make an effort to do so. "We want a forest park reservation for the whole State," he said.

Dr. Jeffrey R. Brackett, chairman of the advisory board, State Department of Public Welfare, representing Commissioner Richard K. Conant, told the Selectmen that where it is possible there should be a board of overseers separate from that of the Board of Selectmen. The board, he said, should be limited to formulating policies while skilled agents should have the power to dictate who should receive aid.

CWA MAY EXTEND TO APRIL 15

Chairman Bartlett Advises Towns to Prepare

Although the CWA programme was scheduled to end Feb. 15, Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the Massachusetts commission told the Association of Selectmen yesterday that in his opinion it will be extended to April 15 and possibly to May 1.

MORE JOBS

With the possibility of such an extension, and the appropriation of additional Federal funds to provide employment, Bartlett called upon the selectmen to begin planning for additional construction jobs after Feb. 15.

He pointed out that although a provision of the civil works programme calls for payment by the municipalities of a part of the costs of materials, the towns ought to stretch their treasuries to some extent. In view of the fact that by far the major total expense is to be paid by the Federal Government.

In summing up the work of the CWA to date, Bartlett said that 130,000 men and women have been given employment in civil works projects in this State, with a financial outlay in wages running between $25,000,000 and $30,000,000.

Benefit to Localities

He said the projects which have been undertaken are worthy ones, which will result in benefit to the cities and towns, but that the more important feature is assistance furnished to unemployed, large numbers of whom had been totally discouraged, by reason of the fact that they are now receiving weekly pay.

Discussing the work of the emergency finance board, of which he is also chairman, Bartlett said that 63 cities and towns have availed themselves of the borrowing bill, under which the State will loan up to $30,000,000 in all to aid municipalities in carrying through their welfare programs. Referring to the fact that municipalities borrowing under this act place themselves under State supervision regarding extra local appropriations, Chairman Bartlett said:

Projects Must Be Worthy

"It is a dangerous power for the State to have under ordinary circumstances. I have always been a believer in 'home rule' and have felt that the municipalities should be allowed to take care of themselves. While we have a friendly interest in the cities and towns coming before us for approval of increased appropriations, we also owe a duty to the State, and I want to tell you that we will not approve increased expenditures unless they are worthy ones. You cannot run over us and we will not, if we are to exist, run over you."

The chairman said that approximately $7,000,000 of Federal emergency funds have been turned over to the cities and towns, entailing supervision of welfare expenditures by the State authorities, and he said that in practically every instance, the cities and towns have carried out the suggestions of his board in the matter of improving their welfare administration.

Ely Urges Economy

He pointed out that under the Federal relief programme, 3,700,000 pounds of pork are being distributed in the State, 200,000 tons of coal and large quantities of clothing, apples, eggs and butter. At the conclusion of his address, Chairman Bartlett and his associates on the CWA and the emergency finance board were given a standing ovation and commended by the town fathers assembled in Gardner Auditorium for their two-day annual convention.

Governor Ely addressed the Selectmen at the opening of their session in the morning, stressing the fact that tax receipts always run behind private business increases, and that the cities and towns probably will not get the benefit of larger taxes until next year. Therefore, he urged them to practice strict economy in municipal finances this year.

To Develop Forest Parks

Referring to the statement in his message to the Legislature as to the restoration of salary cuts for State employees, the Governor said each city and town must stand on its own feet in these matters and consider carefully its own financial problems.

SEEKING LOWER LIQUOR PRICES

The CWA workers, most of them married and the parents of children, are employed in the statistics department at City Hall. A blue week end, without money for food, confronted them until they made their appeal to the Mayor. Upon hearing their story he promptly swung into action with the result that clerks were busy throughout the night last night preparing the missing payroll.

In a sharp order issued personally by the Mayor to Deputy City Treasurer Arthur Swan, the latter was ordered to see to it that the 97 men and women be paid today even if it be necessary to draw up a special payroll over night for their benefit.

Told of It Late in Day

No blame for the missing payroll was attached by the Mayor or the CWA workers to Swan. The latter informed the Mayor that he had not received the payroll from those responsible for drawing it up and therefore could not pay the workers on time.

Word that their payroll had been overlooked or forgotten was sent to the 97 CWA workers shortly after 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon. They were told that because of this they would not be paid before next week. Most of the workers are in dire circumstances. Some of them receive more than $15 a week.

Invited In by Mayor

Realizing that the families might have to go hungry over the week-end the workers decided to march in a body on the Mayor and appeal personally to him for some sort of relief. The march began at 4:30 o'clock. A committee of three men comprised of James McRoughsedge of Dorchester, James McLaughlin of Charlestown, and James McConnelly of South Boston, was selected to do the talking to the Mayor if an audience could be secured.

Arriving at the Mayor's offices in City Hall, 91 of the workers remained outside in the corridors, while the committee sought an interview with the Mayor. As soon as the Mayor learned from one of his secretaries that CWA workers were anxious to talk with him he invited the committee into his office.

Lays Case Before Mayor

Roughsedge, the father of three children, acted as spokesman for the committee.

"Your Honor," he said addressing the city's new Chief Executive, "97 of us have been forgotten and it's the week-end and none of us have any money. As a matter of fact only a few of us have a cent left to get home with. Our wives have been made up and we are appealing to you for some help."

The committee then explained the plight of the families of the CWA workers in the event that they were not paid before next week and cited a dozen of the workers as fathers of large families.

"I'll see to it that you are paid and I'll see to it that none of you have to walk home in the rain," the Mayor is quoted as having said in reply.

He then called Deputy Superintendent Swan, made some inquiries, then ordered that a special payroll be drawn up without delay. He said the 97 CWA workers were to be paid today.

The Mayor then arose from his seat and began emptying his pockets of all his money, on the table.

Gives Them All He Had

"You can have all I've got here with me," the Mayor said. "That's the best I can do right this minute. None of you will have to walk home in the rain, anyway."

The committee started to protest, but the Mayor insisted.

The contents of the Mayor's pockets totalled up to exactly $15 in bills and silver.

"Here take it all and when you are paid in the morning you can pay me back," declared the Mayor.

Reluctantly, Roughsedge gathered up the bills and silver, thanked the Mayor, promised to see that he was paid back as soon as the CWA workers were paid in the morning, and the committee withdrew.

Outside the money was divided among the men and women CWA workers. The men going for coffee and some going for food for the needier ones.

Be Extended Bartlett Predicts

Before us for approval of increased appropriations, we also owe a duty to the state and I want to tell you that we will not approve increased expenditures unless they are worthy. You cannot run over us," he told the selectmen, "and we will not, if we are to exist, run over you."

The chairman related that about $7,000,000 of Federal emergency relief funds had been turned over to cities and towns, which meant supervision of welfare expenses by the state emergency finance board. He reported that community leaders have co-operated with the board of which he is chairman. He added that 3,700,000 pounds of pork and 200,000 tons of coal, and large quantities of eggs, butter and apples will be distributed. He was accorded a rising vote of thanks when he concluded.

MUST MAINTAIN CREDIT

Gov. Ely, in his address, declared that the result of the race between the credit of the federal government and the return of prosperity was the difference between prosperity and disaster. The federal government's credit must be preserved as all cost, he declared, and he added that municipalities must maintain their credit also.

Tax receipts will not increase until business recovery has been in a year, he said. In the meantime, "you've got to practice the strictest sort of economy to balance your town budgets," he added. Referring to the fact that he recommended the restoration of pay cuts to state employees, he explained that each town must make its own decision and he was not citing it as a policy to be followed. "Preservation of credit is most essential," he said.

Referring to the fact that the whole scheme depends on federal credit, he is enough of an idealist, the Governor asserted, to believe that economists can eliminate depressions for all time.

Speaker Saltonstall pleaded for support in a drive to make certain that newly established federal bureaus do not become permanent institutions. "They should not be made permanent, particularly insofar as Massachusetts is concerned," he declared, "I am a firm believer in home rule." He asked the selectmen to file legislative proposals by Jan. 13, or earlier if possible.

Approval by the PWA of the Boston school projects will now mean the intensification of a long, drawn-out battle between West Roxbury and Rosindale citizens as to which district will have the new high school. For years the project was called the West Roxbury high school but recently a large delegation of Rosindale citizens appeared before the Boston school committee urging that the structure be erected in their section. The school committee, which has had $100,000 since 1923 to spend for a site, is in doubt as to where to place the building.

The site for the South Boston Intermediate school will not be so difficult, Dr. Charles E. Massey of South Boston, member of the Boston school committee, has been endeavoring to obtain another intermediate school for that district. He has appeared before members of the state emergency finance board on the project. It is believed that he will ask Mayor Mansfield to sponsor such a school, particularly in view of a statement by Chairman Maurice J. Tobin of the school committee that no school building projects for 1934 be made within the debt limit.

After relating the good done by the CWA to revive the waning courage of tens of thousands of citizens, Bartlett emphasized to the selectmen that 63 cities and towns had borrowed from the $30,000,000 fund established by the state to aid welfare-burdened communities, thus permitting the state to supervise expenditures for two years.

"It is dangerous power for the state to have," he went on. "I have always been a firm believer in home rule and have felt that municipalities should take care of themselves. While we have a friendly interest in the cities and towns coming, we also owe a duty to the state and I want to tell you that we will not approve increased expenditures unless they are worthy. You cannot run over us," he told the selectmen, "and we will not, if we are to exist, run over you."

BARTLETT TELLS SELECTMEN C.W.A. WILL GO ON TILL APRIL

He Advises Them to Start Planning Projects Now—Ely and Saltonstall Address Meeting of State Association

Addressing the annual meeting of the Massachusetts Selectmen's Association in Gardner Auditorium of the State House yesterday afternoon, Joseph W. Bartlett, State Civil Works Administrator, said that the C. W. A. program scheduled to end Feb. 15 will be continued until April 15 and possibly May 1.

Ely Urges Economy

He pointed out that under the Federal relief programme, 3,700,000 pounds of pork are being distributed in the State, 200,000 tons of coal and large quantities of clothing, apples, eggs and butter. At the conclusion of his address, Chairman Bartlett and his associates on the CWA and the emergency finance board were given a rising vote of thanks and confidence by the town fathers assembled in Gardner Auditorium for their two-day annual convention.

Governor Ely addressed the Selectmen at the opening of their session in the morning, stressing the fact that tax receipts always run behind private business increases, and that the cities and towns probably will not get the benefit of larger taxes until next year. Therefore, he urged them to practice strict economy in municipal finances this year.

To Develop Forest Parks

Referring to the statement in his message to the Legislature as to the reduction of salary cuts for State employees, the Governor said each city and town must stand on its own feet in these matters and consider carefully its own financial problems.

"I want to make it plain," he said, "that in announcing the policy of the State, I do not want to say that it is the policy to be followed by your town, city or county government. Preservation of credit is most essential."

Samuel A. York, State commissioner of conservation, said that there is need of development of a real forest park system in the State, and said that he will make every effort to develop some 20,000 acres along that line.

The CWA workers, most of them married and the parents of children, are employed in the statistics department at City Hall. A blue week end, without money for food, confronted them until they made their appeal to the Mayor. Upon hearing their story he promptly swung into action with the result that clerks were busy through the night last night preparing the missing payroll.

In a sharp order issued personally by the Mayor to Deputy City Treasurer Arthur Swan, the latter was ordered to see to it that the 37 men and women be paid today even if it be necessary to draw up a special payroll over night for their benefit.

Told of It Late in Day

No blame for the missing payroll was attached by the Mayor or the CWA workers to Swan. The latter informed the Mayor that he had not received the payroll from those responsible for drawing it up and therefore could not pay the workers on their payroll had been forwarded or forgotten was sent to the Mayor shortly after 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon. They were told that because of this they would not be paid before next week. Most of the workers are in dire circumstances. None of them receives more than $15 a week.

Invited In by Mayor

Realizing that their families might have to go hungry over the week-end, the workers decided to march on the Mayor and appeal personally to him for some sort of relief. The march began at 4:30 o'clock. A committee of three men, comprised of William E. Roughledge of Dorchester, James McLaughlin of Charlestown, and James M. Connolly of South Boston, was selected to do the talking to the Mayor if an audience could be secured. Arriving at the Mayor's offices in City Hall, 94 of the workers remained outside in the corridors, while the committee sought an interview with the Mayor. As soon as the Mayor learned from one of his secretaries that CWA workers were anxious to talk with him he invited the committee into his office.

Lays Case Before Mayor

Roughledge, the father of three children, acted as spokesman for the committee. "Your Honor," he said addressing the Mayor, "we are in a very bad way. Our city's new Chief Executive, 37 of us have been forgotten and it's the week-end and none of us have any money. As a matter of fact only a few of us have any money left. Our families are starving and we have no money to buy food. We are appealing to you for some help. The committee then explained the plight of the families of the CWA workers in the event that they were not paid before next week and cited a dozen of the workers as fathers of large families.

"I'll see to it that you are paid and walk home in the rain," the Mayor is quoted as having said in reply. He then called Deputy Superintendent Swan, made some inquiries, then ordered that a special payroll be drawn up without delay, if necessary. He made it plain to Swan that the CWA workers were to be paid today.

The Mayor then arose from his seat and began emptying his pockets of all his money, on the table.

Gives Them All He Had

"You can have all I've got here with me," the Mayor smiled. "That's the best I can do right this minute. None of you will have to walk home in the rain, anyway." The committee started to protest, but the Mayor insisted.

The contents of the Mayor's pockets totalled up to exactly $48 in bills and silver.

"Here take it all and when you are paid in the morning you can pay me back," declared the Mayor. Reluctantly, Roughledge gathered up the bills and silver, thanked the Mayor, promised to see that he was paid back as soon as the CWA workers were paid in the morning, and the committee withdrew.

The money was divided among outside the money was divided among the 37 men and women CWA workers who were going for clothes and some going for food for the needier ones.

Before us for approval of increased appropriations, we also owe a duty to the State and I want to tell you that we will not approve increased expenditures unless they are worthy. You cannot run over us," he told the selectmen. "And we will not, if we are to exist, run over you."

The chairman related that about $7,000,000 of Federal emergency relief funds had been turned over to cities and towns, which meant supervision of welfare expenses by the state emergency finance board. He reported that community leaders have co-operated with the board, of which he is chairman. He added that 3,700,000 pounds of pork, and 200,000 tons of coal and large quantities of eggs, butter and apples will be distributed. He was accorded a rising vote of thanks when he concluded.

MUST MAINTAIN CREDIT

Gov. Ely, in his address, declared that the result of the race between the credit of the Federal Government and the return of the Federal Government's credit must be preserved at all cost, he declared, and he added that municipalities must maintain their credit also.

"Tax receipts will not increase until business recovery has been in a year, he said. In the meantime, 'you've got to practice the strictest sort of economy to balance your town budgets,' he added. Referring to the fact that he recommended the restoration of pay cuts to state employees, he explained that each town must make its own decision and he was not citing it as a policy to be followed. "Preservation of credit is more essential," he said.

The CWA has helped towns by reducing welfare burdens, but the whole scheme depends on Federal credit. He is enough of an idealist, the Governor asserted, to believe that economists can eliminate depressions for all time.

Speaker Saltonstall pleaded for support in a drive to make certain that newly established Federal bureaus do not become permanent institutions. "They should not be made permanent, particularly insofar as Massachusetts is concerned," he declared. "I am a firm believer in home rule." He asked the selectmen to file legislative proposals by Jan. 13, or earlier if possible.

Approval by the PWA of the Boston school projects will now mean the intensification of a long, drawn-out battle between West Roxbury and Roslindale citizens as to which district will have the new high school. For years the project was called the West Roxbury high school but recently a large delegation of Roslindale citizens appeared before the Boston school committee urging that the structure be erected in their section. The school committee, which has had $100,000 since 1923 to spend for a site, is in doubt as to where to place the building.

The site for the South Boston intermediate school will not be so difficult. Dr. Charles E. Mackey of South Boston, member of the Boston school committee, has been endeavoring to obtain another intermediate school for that district. He has appeared before members of the state emergency finance board on the project. It is believed that such a school, particularly in view of a statement by Chairman Maurice J. Tobin of the school committee for 1934 be made within the debt limit.

Mayor Frederick W. Mansfield, disturbed by the failure of an official to provide for the payment of 97 C. W. A. workers in the statistical section of the Department of Records at City Hall, yesterday personally gave $45 to be divided among 40 unpaid workers who appeared in his office and protested the nonpayment of wages. "You should have received your money," the Mayor told the men. Then he passed over most of the money he had in his pocket. He suggested that it be divided among those who needed it most. The Mayor learned, after the men ordered an immediate investigation, that an official in the Statistical Department had failed to send the payroll sheets for the C. W. A. workers to the city treasurer's office.

Orders Full Pay by Monday
He immediately ordered that the 79 men be paid in full not later than Monday morning and that, in future, they receive their wages on the regular pay day each week.

The committee of 40 that waited on the Mayor yesterday was headed by W. E. Roughsedge, who until the depression was assistant superintendent of a telephone company. Out of the Mayor's $45, Mr. Roughsedge got about $150. The Mayor told the committee that he did not believe the C. W. A. workers were being paid enough. The minimum pay for clerks in the Statistical Department, under N. R. 7, is $18 a week. Mr. Roughsedge said his 78 associates have been receiving $15 a week.

Last week the payroll sheets also failed to appear in the treasurer's office and Mayor James M. Curley will promptly ordered the treasurer to pay the men and look into the reasons for the clerical delay.

Impeded by Stills

(Special Dispatch to The Herald)
WARE, Jan. 6—CWA workers today ran into an obstacle that recalled the recent prohibition period when they began to paint the basement of the town hall, one of the local CWA projects.

Piled high in one of the larger cell rooms was an assorted collection of stills, more than 50 all told, material evidence of the efficiency of Chief Benjamin W. Buckley in the days when raids were in vogue. Before the painters could go to work the stills had to be removed to a vacant storage space in another town building.

Close on the heels of the investigation of the scandal in the civil works projects in Everett came the revelation yesterday that petty officials of the civil works project at the Boston City Hospital have been exacting tribute from laborers and that John J. Power, director of the Massachusetts CWA, has turned over to the Department of Justice the names of five men for federal action.

Over to the Department of Justice for action yesterday. Director Power felt certain that the actions of these five men as well as others not yet fully checked up on, constitute a violation of federal law. Department of Justice officials who took the matter up yesterday with United States Attorney Francis J. W. Ford were in doubt last night that any federal action can be taken against the men. United States Attorney Ford is expected to give his opinion to the Department of Justice officials tomorrow. One question appeared to be whether the funds which CWA workers are paid are federal funds, since they were turned over to the State for disbursement.

"Meanest Chiselling"
The scandal in Everett resulted from an investigation made by Fire Chief James J. Evans of complaints that a worker in one of the fire stations was not receiving the full amount of money due him. It was charged that payments were being exacted from the workers to be contributed as a Christmas present to a certain politician for allegedly having got some of the workers their jobs in the CWA.

Full details of the tribute-taking at the City Hospital were withheld by Director Power, who said six of his investigators working since Thursday at the City Hospital as the result of a complaint had discovered that two foremen on a job there had for the past two weeks been receiving tribute of $5 a week from men under them. "This is the cheapest and meanest kind of chiselling that has yet come to my attention," Director Power declared last night. "Some of these workmen had babies and small children and the money that those crooks were demanding from the men was the same thing as bread and milk taken out of the children's mouths."

Workers Should Tell
"I ordered the names of the foremen and the facts in the matter turned over at once to the Department of Justice and that was done this morning. Not only do those men lose their jobs, but they should be prosecuted, and I am positive that it will be found that they have violated federal law."

LOWELL, Jan. 6—More than 40 CWA workers, most of whom were recently suspended because of lack of funds, stormed City Hall here today in a vain effort to see Mayor James J. Bruin, to seek more work and alleviation of reported wrongs.

A squad of police was rushed to the building as the workers filled the corridors, but no disturbance of any kind was reported. Eighty-five of the crowd were from the project at Fort Devens. These claimed that they are forced to pay transportation between Lowell and the fort each day, and that this takes most of the money they earn.

The other workers had been on a street construction job in the city, but were laid off when Mayor Bruin took office, this week, because of lack of funds.

Later, the workers moved on to the postoffice building, where they were seen by Augustus J. Power, official of the State employment service.

Power stated that his department will look into the matter of transportation for the Fort Devens workers.

As fast as possible more artists will be put to work. Ten were to be added to the Boston list last night and some in Provincetown. The latter are to be under the direction of Richard E. Allen, N. A., and Mrs. Harold Haven Brown, director of the Provincetown CWA station. By the end of the week New England's full quota of 141 will be employed, it is believed.

Arrests of five men, three in Everett and two in Boston, who are said to have attempted to extort money from civil works employees by threats to have them discharged, are expected tomorrow when data on the cases will be turned over to U. S. Atty. Francis J. W. Ford for action.

It will be the first action of this sort started by Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts civil works administration, who ordered the investigation. Bartlett last night declared that any one with a similar complaint should communicate with him, and he would ask the department of justice to prosecute.

Secret investigations in communities throughout the state where complaints have been heard will be authorized by Chairman Bartlett, it was understood yesterday. Politicians in Boston and other cities are reported to have demanded money from men at work on CWA projects, and Bartlett intends to stamp out this form of thievery. He has authorization to hire as many investigators as are needed.

Investigation of the Boston cases was completed yesterday by John J. Power, chief of the investigating unit of the CWA. He disclosed that two foremen on projects in a Boston hospital institution had threatened two men, fathers of very young children, with instant dismissal unless they contributed $5 weekly to them.

Both Bartlett and Power were indignant at the bold attempt to exact tribute from the former welfare recipients. Only the possibility that the complainants might suffer bodily harm prevented them from revealing the case in all its details. They decided to turn over the data to Ford without further publicity as a protection to the men.

HAS BEEN HANGING FIRE

The Everett case has been hanging fire for some time. An investigation was launched by Bartlett several days ago. The investigators returned a report which was sent back by Bartlett with an order to include recommendations. The recommendations were that all three be permanently discharged, and the data turned over to the department of justice.

Several CWA workers in Everett gave affidavits that they had been told that unless they contributed money to a certain individual they would lose their jobs. One man who refused found that his pay had been cut from $36 weekly to $15, the wages of an unskilled man. Money collected for a welfare department clerk did not reach him until after a story had appeared in the newspapers.

Chief James J. Evans of the Everett police, discharged one man when he heard the threats. Federal CWA investigators conducted a three-day hearing and submitted their report to Bartlett.

brings the Boston approvals to $5,500,000, and will provide employment for several thousand men for several months. Lois B. Rantoul, in charge of CWA women's activities in Massachusetts, refused last night to discuss allegations by Miss Florence M. Birmingham that the women's director is "building a Republican machine in this state."

Asked to give her version of the situation, Mrs. Rantoul said: "I have absolutely no comment to make." When it was pointed out that Miss Birmingham's statement contained direct questions which she sought to have Mrs. Rantoul answer, the women's director again replied: "I have absolutely no comment to make."

Regarding Gov. Ely's statement that federal inspectors were investigating Mrs. Rantoul, she said: "Ask the Governor, he appears to know." Miss Birmingham charged that the CWA in Norfolk county is "virtually 100 per cent. managed by the Republican machine," and further asserted that "130 social workers were chosen from a certain women's college."

SEVERAL SHARP DENIALS
Sharp denial from several of the persons named by Miss Birmingham were made at once. It was charged that the Massachusetts Women's Political Club contained "people who aspire to political honors" by the Women's Trade Union League, which defended the CWA.

Lawrence K. Dewar said he had been appointed CWA administrator of Medford because he was chairman of the public welfare board of that town. He resented, in view of the free time he has given the CWA, "accusations from people never heard of." Miss Frances Crocker, in charge of a knitting group at Foxboro, said politics was not mentioned when she took the job. Russell T. Bates, county CWA supervisor, said he doesn't know Mrs. Rantoul and did not believe the women had anything to do with his appointment. His job consists of notifying towns of where projects are about to start so that workers can get jobs, he said.

Miss Birmingham's statement follows in part: "If the Women's Trade Union League is really interested in seeing justice dealt to working women, in seeing justice to find out if it have they investigated to find out if it is true that about 130 social workers were selected for the most part from one certain women's college and a paid employment agency, although they were paid out of CWA funds? Did these investigators investigate whether or not these social workers were actually in need of social workers which began the Tuesday after Christmas under the direction of Miss Flora Burton of the state department of aid and relief, not open to the public?"

"Why were those on the outside of the direction clique, who insisted on joining because in some way they learned of the class forming and were pushed by dire need of a job, permitted to go there without being told that the list of the select was already drawn up those on the preferred list already under salary, while those who needed work, but had no friend in the selecting judges, paid carfare and bought lunches while the course lasted with hopes of a job that those in charge knew they would never get. Were examinations taken? Was experience considered?

"Or was it left to Miss Burton to choose from the faces of those in her lecture course the fortunate job getters? Certainly the list of social workers should have been chosen according to the needs of those applying after public advertising, not according to political belief or to benefit one particular college or association."

"Starting off with the Norfolk county administrator, Russell T. Bates, who is Republican county commissioner and leader of the Republican machine for Norfolk county, it embraces the following group:

County supervisor of apple pest control, at a salary of $30, Herbert R. Bond, Westfield street, Westwood, a Republican. His cousin, with a salary of $22.50, Jerry Bond of Needham, is town foreman of Dedham, Dover, Needham, Norwood, Wellesley, Westwood, on the sanitary milk production. In Medford, Lawrence K. Dewar, Republican selectman and turnkey at the Dedham jail, is in charge, assisted by James Atherton, Ernest Koch, who by the way employed an alien while citizens were idle, and Mrs. Samuel Mitchell, all of whom are Republicans."

"In the town of Millis, Moody Richardson, relative of Evan Richardson, former Norfolk county commissioner, remove as agricultural agent at the State House, is a foreman in charge of the towns of Millis, Medfield, Norfolk and Walpole on the sanitary milk production."

"The Women's Knitting Project No. 626 is headed by Mrs. Archie McFarland, a Republican, whose husband is reported to be working while she gets a salary of $30."

"Some of the other Republican town foremen, at a salary of $22.50, are: in Bellingham, Fred Howes, who lives by the way in Weymouth; R. J. Everett, the way in Weymouth; Howard Bates of Cohasset; Kenneth Hicks of Foxboro; E. F. Ingraham of Millis; James Wyllie of Norfolk."

"Albin K. Parker, Republican postmaster in Norwood; E. S. Coombs of Plainville; A. E. Drake, of Sharon; Vaughan Dill, of Medway; J. W. close friend of Evan Richardson; Fred B. ## SCOFFS AT CWA GRAFT STORIES

Chairman Bartlett Has Faith in People

Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the State Emergency Finance Board, declared last night in a talk before St. John's Church Forum, North Cambridge, that he believed there was very little "graft" or "favoritism" in the distribution of CWA jobs.

"The press has carried many stories recently about charges of graft and favoritism and, while there undoubtedly are some real causes for complaint, I'll wager the number is very small," he said.

He added, however, that investigations were being made of each case of reported graft or irregularity.

"Because of the haste that has been necessary to put this tremendous programme into effect it has been pretty much of a good faith proposition," he said. "Again and again I have had to put my faith in the elected officials of the cities and towns, and I have yet to find that an official has failed me."

URGES CWA WORKERS TO AID PROBE

State Director Asks
Information on Grafting

A plea for CWA workers who have been forced to pay tribute to foremen and supervisors in order to hold their jobs to come forward and tell their stories was issued yesterday by John J. Power, director of the Massachusetts CWA, whose investigation of recent complaints has resulted in information which has been turned over to the federal authorities for prosecution.

MAY PROSECUTE

An opinion on the possibility of prosecution of three Everett men and two foremen of Civil Works jobs at the Boston City Hospital will be given to Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett today by United States Attorney Francis J. W. Ford.

Evidence that workers on Civil Works projects at the City Hospital and in Everett were forced to pay as high as $5 a week to foremen and other petty officials in order to hold their jobs was presented to United States Attorney Ford by Power, Saturday, and action is expected to develop today. Power said yesterday there are probably other cases of a similar nature, in which employees are afraid to report for fear of losing their jobs.

"I want to assure any person who has been victimized by these cheap tricksters that they will not only be given protection and his job safeguarded, but his job will be even more fully secured as a result," Power said. Chairman Bartlett declared no effort will be spared to eliminate the extortionists.

VIOLATION OF CWA CHARGED

Labor Leaders Take Complaints to Washington

E. A. Johnson, president of the Massachusetts Building Trades Council, and Robert J. Watt, legislative agent of the Massachusetts State Federation of Labor, left last night for Washington. They will place before William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, Michael J. McDonough, president of the Building Trades Department of the A. F. of L., and Harry Hopkins, federal administrator of the CWA, complaints against the working of the same. They allege Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts CWA, failed to recognize in any way the committee named by the building council. The charges include:

"Unskilled labor employed to do work that without question is classified as skilled labor.

"On several projects, one skilled workman would be employed and paid the regulation rate of $1.20 per hour, and other skilled, competent and experienced workmen were then rated as assistants, helpers or semi-skilled labor and paid rates ranging from 50 cents to $1 per hour.

"Men were being placed on work for which they have no qualifications, and no effort was being made to check the statements of applicants as to experience and competency.

"Men who registered properly had waited three and four weeks to be notified of employment and had later learned that others had been given employment within a period of one day to one week after registering.

"No effort has been made by the CWA Board in Massachusetts to enforce some of the labor provisions of Rules No. 10, issued by Director Harry Hopkins of the FEWA in charge of the CWA nationally."

CWA WORKERS TO PAY BOY'S FUNERAL COSTS

Saugus Group Honors Hero Who Gave Life for Sister

The 850 men and women CWA workers of Saugus will pay the costs of the funeral of Leo A. Farley, Jr., 9, of 80 Heper street, Saugus, son of a CWA worker, who was drowned Monday in the East Saugus river.

The workers yesterday asked the director of the Saugus public works program, Dexter Pratt, to assume the expenses of the boy's funeral and to take the money from their pay.

Young Farley drowned in order that his sister, Annette, 11, might be rescued. Both had slipped through the ice and the boy shouted to a rescuer not to bother about him but to save his sister.

The funeral will be tomorrow morning, with a requiem mass at 9 A. M. in St. Margaret's Church, Cliftondale.

STATE MAY ACT IN CWA SCANDAL

Ford Doubts Extortion Charges Are Federal Concern

LABOR DELEGATION OFF TO WASHINGTON

The cases of five men working on civil works projects who are said to have attempted to extort money from other CWA workmen by threats of causing their dismissal may be turned over to state authorities for prosecution, it was learned last night, as federal authorities seemed doubtful that a federal law had been violated.

Decision on the matter was held up by U. S. Atty. Francis J. W. Ford until he can complete his examination of the facts presented to him by John J. Power, chief of the investigating unit of the Massachusetts civil works administration, who presented Ford with evidence obtained after an inquiry in Everett, involving three men, and in the Boston City Hospital, in which two foremen were named.

Aside from the angle of prosecution, the disposition involves a fundamental point: whether the federal government, having turned money over to the state and its political sub-divisions, still exercises jurisdiction when men working on a federal project attempt to extort part of the money by threats.

Power feels that it is for the federal government to prosecute, while Atty. Ford refuses to give his opinion. Joseph W. Bartlett, chairman of the Massachusetts civil works administration, is prepared to abide by the decision of Ford.

LOCAL CONCERN

After a lengthy examination of the testimony, U. S. Atty. Ford said last night:

"It appears from the facts presented to me up to date in the present civil works investigation, that there is not sufficient evidence of a violation of a federal law. It appears that the matter is one of local concern."

Chairman Bartlett admitted his surprise when informed that the cases of the three Everett men had been sent along to Ford. "I didn't know that the affidavits were sent to Mr. Ford," he declared. "The recommendations were that the men should be discharged, and that was done."

Representatives of labor in Massachusetts protested that they were unable to get admittance to Chairman Bartlett and the other members of the Massachusetts board. State Treasurer Charles F. Hurley and William B. Coy, a Boston banker, and a delegation went to Washington to tell their story to CWA authorities there.

George Carmody, head of the engineering section of the federal CWA at Washington, communicated by telephone with Bartlett yesterday and asked for the chairman's stand. Bartlett agreed to meet the state representatives of labor at a conference at CWA headquarters, 49 Federal street, Thursday at 3 P. M.

Defending Mrs. Lois B. Rantoul, director of CWA women's activities, and her administration from charges of "building a Republican machine" in the state by the appointment of women to handle CWA matters, the Boston Women's Trade Union League, struck back yesterday at the Massachusetts Women's Political Club, which first made the allegations.

Mrs. Mary Gordon Thompson, president of the league, praised Mrs. Rantoul. "She has always been independent in politics," Mrs. Thompson said of Mrs. Rantoul. "She voted for La Follette, Smith and Roosevelt. She does not care whether a woman is a Republican, Democrat or Socialist. Mrs. Rantoul is one of the finest, most capable women I know of."

Criticizing the political club as being "comprised of about six women," Mrs. Thompson called the charges of favoritism stupid, utterly uncalled for and unfounded, and said, "you don't have to apologize for putting in your friends. It's the common practice in public positions. But I am sure that Mrs. Rantoul would be convinced that a woman needed a job and was in straitened circumstances before she would give her one."

TYPISTS EMPLOYED ON CWA PROJECT AT LIBRARY HERE

The civil works service gave these unemployed women a chance to earn a living bringing the card index system at the Boston Public Library up to date. All cards dated before 1899 are being renewed to standard filing size. More than 600 persons have been placed on library projects jobs.

50,000 VAINLY SEEK CWA JOBS

Mayor and Council Try to Find Solution of Problem---Appeal Made to Roosevelt

Climaxing a stormy session yesterday, when 200 men stormed City Hall seeking in bewildered fashion the Mayor's "O. K." for CWA jobs, Mayor Mansfield declared that neither he nor members of the City Council can have anything to do with putting men to work under the Civil Works programme.

Of equal import was the admission of city and State officials, attending the same hurried conference, that more than 50,000 men are registered for CWA work in Boston and that it is doubtful if even 100 can be put to work.

Plan yesterday that the Mayor explain how some men on the CWA projects in the city were aliens, while citizens with dependents, supposed to be preferred, had been unable to obtain employment. He bluntly questioned the Mayor as to why it was necessary to get an "O. K." from the Mayor's office before the men could start on CWA projects.

President John H. Dowd stemmed the tempest, at least temporarily, when he announced that the Mayor would confer in 10 minutes with a special committee from the council in an effort to iron matters out, and that this committee would report the matter in full after the conference.

Mayor Mansfield declared he had just been apprised of the confusion concerning an "O. K." from his office, and wanted to confer with the Council and others to straighten this out. He said he knew nothing about it.

Councillors Dowd, Robert Gardner Wilson, Clement A. Norton and Martin H. Tobin met with the Mayor in his office, as did CWA Administrator Walter V. McCarthy and Director Joseph M. McCarthy of the State employment bureau in CWA activities.

The Mayor was ignorant of the fact at the time, he said, that 200 men were storming the doors of his office, demanding to know why they should be forced to receive approval from his office before starting to work. Secretary McNary had stopped stamping the CWA cards for the men by this time, but had placed an assistant in the outer office of the City Council chamber, listing the names of the applicants, with addresses and other available information.

The Mayor declared, at the outset of the conference, held in conjunction with members of the press, that he knew nothing of CWA workers having to receive an "O. K." from his office. He said the only explanation he could give for this misunderstanding was instructions he had given to departmental heads to advise him as to what their quota was for CWA projects and how nearly filled their quotas are. He said he did this in the hope of hurrying along work for the unemployed.

"There have been so many men and women coming here seeking work under the CWA that I wanted to know when the various quotas were filled, so that we would not be sending unemployed men to seek jobs where the quotas were completed. I consider this cruel handling of people."

Not City Council Work

It was made clear that the Mayor and members of the City Council have no authority to allot CWA work or assign plan whereby all CWA applicants could be approved in a uniform, quick way, without working at cross-purposes.

Another "Bombshell"

When it appeared that order would be restored Councillor Henry Selvitella of East Boston threw a verbal bombshell into the chamber. He declared that at the City Hospital in the morning he had seen a typewritten order, signed by someone in the Mayor's office, ordering Joseph Norton, civil works superintendent at the City Hospital, to put no more men to work on CWA projects until they had been approved by the Mayor's office.

The Council sent for both Secretaries McNary and Gilmore and interrogated them. McNary explained he had stamped the cards for the unemployed men, thinking it the best thing to do to get them working, that he knew nothing about it being necessary or unnecessary. He said he could not reach Webster at 182 Tremont street on the telephone to straighten the matter out.

He made no claim to having authority to approve CWA jobs, which are State and Federal emergency projects, and only placed an "OK" on the cards to show Webster that he knew of no objection to the men working.

More Confusing Statements

Gilmore denied sending any communication to CWA Superintendent Norton at the City Hospital, as alleged. He said he had asked Norton not to fill any more jobs before he heard from the Mayor's office. Later he said he had not intended to say even this, as he had in fact not asked Norton such a thing. Rather, he said, he asked Norton simply to let the Mayor's office know when the jobs had been all filled.

Mayor Mansfield was astonished later to learn how far the confusion had been carried. He said that evidently somebody had felt they would lose their own jobs, and misinterpreted a request of his to departmental heads for information as to quotas filled and unfilled on CWA projects.

"This office has nothing to do with putting men to work on the CWA projects, and our only hope was that we might help those applying here for information," he said.

C. W. A. GRAFT UP TO STATE

Ford Gives Ruling After Application for Action

Cases of graft within the Civil Works Administration are local affairs and do not come under Federal jurisdiction, according to a ruling made yesterday by United States Attorney Francis J. W. Ford when he was asked to consider charges of alleged tribute levying by foremen in charge of projects in Boston and Everett.

After consulting with Department of Justice officials, Ford declared that while the funds originated with the Federal Government, they were granted to the States, to be spent through State agencies, and therefore all legal problems arising under the program must come under the jurisdiction of State courts.

Ford also added that from the facts gathered to date in the investigation of alleged graft, "there is not sufficient evidence of any violation of a Federal law to warrant an investigation from this office. It appears to be purely a local matter."

Few Charges, Says Bartlett

"Cases of graft within the C. W. A. are in the great minority throughout the State," Chairman Joseph W. Bartlett of the State Board said last night. He intimated that wherever cases of this sort were discovered, the offenders would be dealt with in a manner which they deserve.

The report on conditions in Fall River will be given to Chairman Bartlett early today and he will take definite action as soon as he has read it carefully, he said last night.

A telephone inquiry regarding conditions existing between the State C. W. A. Board and local labor leaders was received by Chairman Bartlett from Washington yesterday, following protests sent to Administrator Harry L. Hopkins charging that local labor in Massachusetts and that local labor leaders were unable to gain interviews with members of the board.

Bartlett pointed out that he had received Robert Watt, secretary of the Massachusetts branch of the American Federation of Labor, and other labor leaders at the State House some weeks ago. "At the time, in the presence of newspapermen, I sent out a telegram to 39 cities in the Commonwealth instructing them to wage schedules which must be maintained. The labor delegation expressed itself at the time as being perfectly satisfied with the way I had handled their complaint."

"Furthermore," declared Chairman Bartlett, "I do not know of any fact that any representative of organized labor who has tried to see me has been denied. In fact I met Watt the other day and he made no complaint to me. To try and clear up the entire situation, I am inviting all labor leaders to confer with the board here at 3 o'clock Thursday afternoon."

George Carmody, aid to Federal Administrator Hopkins, who called Bartlett, asked him if he wanted a Federal conciliator to help him straighten out labor difficulties. Bartlett thanked him, but said he was ready to cooperate with labor at all times and didn't think he would need further aid.

INQUIRY ON C. W. A. BY CITY COUNCIL

Mansfield and Secretary Deny "O. K." Of Mayor's Office Required For Jobs

Unemployed men, numbering about 200, in receipt of C. W. A. work cards from the Federal-State Employment Bureau at Nashua st., reported yesterday at the office of Mayor Mansfield to be certified for the jobs. They stated that they had been informed by the official in charge of the Planning Board project, 182 Tremont st., that before they could be taken on they must have the approval of Mayor Mansfield's office.

Secretary Herbert L. McNary, according to his own statement later in the day before the City Council, without receiving any orders to do so, imprinted on the cards with a rubber stamp, "Mayor's Office, Boston, Mass." and initialed the print. He declared that he merely did it after the men began to arrive and it was with the intention of helping them to get the work.

Stopped After Stamping 70

Secretary Gilmore before the City Council flatly denied that he had signed any notice to any department head stating that the Mayor's office "O. K." was necessary before a man or woman could get C. W. A. employment. He said in answer to a question by Councillor Peter Murray of Jamaica Plain that he notified department heads to notify the Mayor's office before any more places were filled.

Later in the presence of Mayor Mansfield he said that if he made the latter statement it was because he was called in suddenly and what he really intended to convey was that "the Mayor's office must be notified when the vacancies are filled," and that was the notice to department heads. He said that he telephoned Mr. Norton and that the latter said the memorandum was written in the hospital from a telephone message.

Before the affair reached the attention of the City Council yesterday afternoon, City Hall reporters had been informed of the card stamping going on downstairs. To a Globe reporter Mr. McNary replied, when asked what it was all about, to the effect that "the Mayor's office had concluded that possibly more men had been certified than the project would warrant; that he stopped after stamping 70 cards until the project could be investigated. Before the City Council, Mr. McNary said that the office had been informed by Nashua-st. authorities that too many men had been sent out for the job."

54,000 on List, 100 Jobs

The city planning job for which the men were certified, the registering for which is under the direction of Secretary Elizabeth M. Herlihy, is said to call for 300 field workers, 20 female typists, 30 male clerks, 15 messengers, 60 draftsmen, engineers, architects and city planners, housing experts, 15 head draftsmen, three job captains and 15 architect engineers.

It was said yesterday that 200 men in the field worker class had been given their C. W. A. working cards by mail from the office of M. J. McCarthy, the State supervisor, and it was presumed that they were the ones who went from 182 Tremont st. to the outer office of Mayor Mansfield where Secretary McNary is in charge of the Licensing Bureau. After stamping cards the remaining men were directed to an antechamber of the Council, where a man set to work taking down the names and addresses of those who did not get the "red ink O. K."

One development of the Council affairs yesterday was the information from Mr. McCarthy of the State Bureau that there are listed about 54,000 men and women. According to Executive Secretary Walter V. McCarthy of the Welfare Department, in all about 15,000 persons have been given employment in Boston under the C. W. A. Of that number, 500 are women, and 6800 are from the welfare rolls or the Soldiers' Relief Department.

Telegram to President

So serious did it appear to President Roosevelt that he sent a telegram to President Roosevelt last night to President Roosevelt and signed by Chairman Wilson.

Notice on "Mayor's Office"

During the Council meeting when the matter of the Planning Board project and rubber stamp were under consideration, Councillor Henry Selvitella, new representative from East Boston, arose and declared that at 11 yesterday morning at the Boston City Hospital he was shown a typewritten

EIGHTY ARTISTS ON C. W. A. WORK

Decorating Interior of Public Buildings Portraits of Officials Also Included in Program

About 80 artists were at work in all parts of New England under the auspices of the Government yesterday and assignment of others is proceeding rapidly, said John Davis Hatch Jr., assistant regional chairman, at regional headquarters today.

About 65 other artists are on a preferred list, he said, and would be given work as rapidly as plans for suitable projects matured.

A painter and a sculptor have been assigned to the central office of the School Committee to execute under the direction of Miss Helen Cleaves, director of manual arts, work badly needed for teaching purposes in the field of archaeology. Others are representing the "passing scenes" in original work which may well prove to be important social documents in the future.

The tendency in Boston and throughout New England is to depict the industrial and historical background of New England in the decorative panels and murals now under way for schools, libraries, Town Halls and other public buildings in various centers.

Three artists making designs for corridors and the auditorium at Boston Teachers' College are proceeding with these New England themes. Among high schools to benefit are the Brighton High School, where the walls of the library are to be decorated; the East Boston High School, where the stage curtain is being repainted, while at the South Boston High School wall spaces in the assembly hall are to have murals, probably of local historical subjects. The Boston Latin School will add a portrait of the present head master, Joseph L. Cowers, to the series of head master portraits.

checkup from the Mayor's office or from the State House.

Councillor Selvitella said he had contacted the City Hospital and the name signed to the memorandum was that of Gilmore. The chair then instructed that Mr. Gilmore be called.

When McNary joined Pres. Dowd on the platform Councillor Norton wanted to know how the official at 182 Tremont st. happened to send men to McNary. The latter replied he thought "the gentleman there was trying to protect himself and would not like to take my word over the phone." It appeared that Mr. McNary put the stamp on as an official note from the Mayor's office.

"What right did you have to rubber stamp the cards?" asked Norton. McNary answered, "None, except the men came to me."

It appeared that McNary was formerly employed at the Nashua-st. office. McNary said: "We were told that too many men had been sent out for the job." Nashua st. he said, told him that.

Councillor Norton said he did not believe that McNary or any department head had any authority to OK a work card of the C. W. A.

Councillor Murray said McNary should have gone to Nashua st. Councillor Doherty charged that the same thing about OKs had been put up to women.

Gilmore's questioning followed. Councillor Selvitella charged Gilmore with directing Joseph Norton more with directing Joseph Norton to "hold up any more cases until 'O. K.'d' by the Mayor's office," which Gilmore denied.

Adjournment was taken without further argument after the committee's action.

Telegram to President

So serious did it appear to Pres Dowd and Councillors Wilson, McGrath, Finley, Selvitella and Donovan, constituting a special committee, that there remain but 100 jobs in Boston on C. W. A. projects, that the following telegram was sent last night to President Roosevelt and signed by Chairman Wilson:

"Dear Mr President:
"The following resolution is forwarded to you by committee appointed on action of the Boston City Council today, due to storming of the City Hall by the unemployed of Boston.

"A conference held by the committee, the Mayor of Boston, and Mr M. J. McCarthy, director of the Massachusetts State Employment Service, discloses the fact that although there are now over 50,000 male residents of Boston registered for possible work under the Civil Works program, and despite the fact that additional applications are being accepted daily, less than 100 jobs remain available for approved projects now existing.

"May we respectfully request advice as to possible plans for the immediate speeding up of all projects now before your departments affecting the city of Boston?"

Mayor Visits Council

Mayor Mansfield paid an unexpected visit to the City Council after it had adjourned but the Council was reconvened. The Council had passed an order that the Council floor and all executive offices were to be kept free from others than members of the body or the press. Later when the official information had been obtained from Messrs McCarthy and McCarthy at the Mayor's office, the floor was thrown open.

The Mayor in a few words said that his visit was a gesture of friendliness and courtesy. He said that he had an open mind and was free from all prejudices and simply wanted to act for the best interests of the city. Mayor Mansfield asked the Council to undo in 20 minutes what had taken 20 years to create. That would be too much, he said. He asked the Council not to be too harsh in its criticism.

Councilor Murray in accordance with custom asked through Pres Dowd if the Mayor was aware of non-residents working on C. W. A. jobs and also what was the story about the OK of work tickets. Pres Dowd bridged the gap instantly by replying to Councilor Murray that he, Pres Dowd, had an appointment for a conference with Mayor Mansfield; that he would have it immediately and then report back the results of the meeting.

Committee Asks Purpose

Pres Dowd was accompanied to the Mayor's office by a committee consisting of Councillors Norton, Tobin and Wilson. The committee later was enlarged. At the conference the committee, representing 22 Councillors who have been harassed day and night by unemployed who appeared at homes or offices calling for cards or help, declaring that they were told at Nashua st, "See your Councilor and get a card," sought some information.

Councilor Norton asked Mr. McCarthy, "What can I do to help out a constituent?" He was informed that he could not help other than that members of the Council were known and respected while the unemployed were not known. Hence a card from a Councilor would be in nature of a recommendation of character and worthiness. The same would happen in the case of a card from Mayor Mansfield, Councilor Norton was informed.

Another angle is that priority of registration was not the sole consideration in awarding a work card. Qualification and fitness for a particular job was said to be the test. Mr. McCarthy said that at a recent meeting in Washington that there was no necessity of giving priority in the matter of registration.

Mayor Told Him to Approve

Mr. McCarthy declared that he never heard of the office of Mayor Mansfield or his predecessor holding any job up. The Mayor then asked if it would help if he notified heads of departments to put men to work immediately.

It was admitted there might be some duplications in the 54,000 names on the list, inasmuch as many individuals registered several times and at each headquarters. Mr. McCarthy said a statistical force was at work at present on the registration.

Mayor Mansfield said that he had sent a notice to heads of departments to learn if their quotas had been filled or if they had any jobs open. He said it was a fact that he told Secretary McNary to approve anyone coming to the Mayor's office seeking a job. He did that because of the personal appeals he is getting daily by mail and in person. In the opinion of the Mayor that might have created the impression that all needed an OK.

Mr. McCarthy said that it was never intended that anyone get preference because of political influence. "If it has been done," said Mr. McCarthy, "I was not done with my knowledge."

Council Questions McNary

When the Council reconvened on the appearance of the special committee that had waited upon the Mayor, Councilor Murray wanted to know why, if a man got a working card and went to Tremont st, he could not have a job until he got an O. K. from the Mayor's office."

Pres Dowd replied: "The Mayor is in receipt of many letters asking aid and he appointed Secretary McNary to care for them."

Councilor Selvitella declared he saw a first speech. He declared he saw a typewritten notice on plain paper notifying that the "O. K." was necessary. He was uncertain whose name was signed to it, but thought it was that of Secretary McNary.

City Messenger Leary was then directed by Pres Dowd to have Mr. McNary come before the Council. Before he arrived Councilor Joseph McGrath of Dorchester, last year's president, said: "Mr. McNary did not assume that position that only those could go to work on the Mayor's sayso. I feel someone higher than him gave him that task. He started to take over a Federal project and then someone warned him to stop." "I served notice," said Councilor McGrath, "no matter how high in position they had better stop fooling the poor and the hungry. Stop playing cheap politics. Stop this

The tendency in Boston and throughout New England is to depict the industrial and historical background of New England in the decorative panels and murals now under way for schools, libraries, Town Halls and other public buildings in various centers.

Three artists making designs for corridors and the auditorium at Boston Teachers' College are proceeding with these New England homes. Among high schools to benefit are the Brighton High School, where the walls of the library are to be decorated; the East Boston High School, where the stage curtain is being restored and the asbestos curtain painted, while at the South Boston High School wall spaces in the assembly hall are to have murals, probably of local historical subjects. The Boston Latin School will add a portrait of the present head master, Joseph L. Cowers, to the series of head master portraits.

checkup from the Mayor's office or from the State House."

Councilor Selvitella said he had contacted the City Hospital and the name signed to the memorandum was that of Gilmore. The chair then instructed that Mr. Gilmore be called.

When McNary joined Pres Dowd on the platform Councilor Norton wanted to know how the official at 182 Tremont st happened to send men to McNary. The latter replied he thought "the gentleman there was trying to protect himself and would not like to take my word over the phone." It appeared that Mr. McNary put the stamp on as an official note from the Mayor's office.

"What right did you have to rubber stamp the cards?" asked Norton. McNary answered, "None, except the men came to me."

It appeared that McNary was formerly employed at the Nashua-st office. McNary said: "We were told that too many men had been sent out for the job." Nashua st, he said, told him that.

Councilor Norton said he did not believe that McNary or any department head had any authority to OK a work card of the C. W. A.

Councilor Murray said McNary should have gone to Nashua st. Councilor Doherty charged that the same thing about OKs had been put up to women.

Gilmore's questioning followed. Councilor Selvitella charged Gilmore with directing Joseph Norton to "hold up any more cases until 'O. K.'d" by the Mayor's office," which Gilmore denied.

Adjournment was taken without further argument after the committee's action.
